The same line of comment is applicable to an increase in the cultivation of wheat. Our production of this staple has augmented enormously in the past two years. The extension of farm lands to the Northwest and Southwest, and the recuperation of certain States east of the Mississippi River, as growers of Winter wheat, together with the employment of machinery in its cultivation, have resulted in the growth of wheat in such quantities that, but for the comparative failure of the crop in Great Britain and in the West of Europe, prices would have fallen to ruinous rates, and the very excess caused disaster. Corn, notwithstanding a large export demand and a partial failure of the crop at the South, causing a demand upon the surplus of the West to supply the deficiency, has fallen to a price in this market which, after deducting the cost of transportation and other expenses incident to its transfer from the grower to the consumer, must leave no adequate return to the farmer. Pork-packing is a pursuit somewhat incidental to the extent of the corn crop, and the number of swine slaughtered has became so enormous that their products are forced down to very low prices.

It is evident, however, that a greater diversity is needed in the pursuits of agriculture. We have excellent lands on the Gulf coast for the production of sugar, yet we are compelled every year to import large quantities, and the price in our markets is much too high, as compared with the cost of other necessities of life. With rice lands of unrivaled excellence, the production is deficient and the price high. With several great States rentable for the growth of hemp, large quantities are imported annually. With vast territories rentable for grazing sheep and producing the best grades of wool, we are now almost entirely dependent upon foreign wools to keep our mills going. The prices of beef cattle and butchers' meats are nearly double their cost when grains sold for more money than they will now bring; yet large tracts near the seacoast that would afford good pasturage remains unoccupied. The résumé of branches of farm industry whose results are inadequate to the demands upon them might be extended. But this will suffice. Undoubtedly the field of agricultural industry might be extended. There is no good reason why we should not produce large quantities of silk. Nothing but experience and skill and business enterprise are needed, and these ought to be available at any time. Can we not grow coffee and tea in considerable sections?

Without, however, entering upon anything new, there are abundant opportunities for a greater diversity of agricultural activity, which our farmers and planters and graziers will do well to heed, before serious disaster, from the over-production of a few staples that are favorite articles of growth, shall overtake them. "Don't put too many eggs in one basket," is a piece of practical wisdom that is too often forgotten, but of which we occasionally get a reminder in a serious "smash-up."

THE TARIFF QUESTION.

IF nothing definite can be accomplished by the present Congress in the direction of a modification of the existing tariff, perhaps it may be well to create the commission of nine experts to investigate the entire tariff question as proposed in the Bill of Mr. Eaton, now before the Senate. The members of this commission are to be appointed from civil life by the President, and are to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relative to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests. For the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before them, they are empowered to visit such different portions of the country as may be deemed advisable. They are to report to Congress the results of their investigations and the testimony taken from time to time, and make their final report not later than the first Monday in December, 1881. The Bill is said to have met the approval of many friends of tariff revision, and has been indorsed by the American Iron and Steel Association, which, while advocating a high tariff, desires one that will not discriminate in favor of or against any particular industry. It is believed that the Bill will pass the Senate, and should it do so, all consideration of the subject in the House will, no doubt, be postponed, especially as in the latter body it has been referred to a sub-committee which is not likely to agree. It will be a point gained to collect positive and trustworthy information as to the great variety of interests affected by tariff legislation, but it is not at all certain that Congress will avail itself of the information so obtained if it shall conflict with local prejudices or sectional feeling.

OUR FOREIGN TRADE.

THE importations at this port for the month of March amounted to about $45,598,729, being an excess of $17,360,722 over those of the same month last year, and $19,033,088 greater than those of 1878. As compared with last year, entries of dutiable goods direct for consumption show an increase of $11,030,887, while in entries for warehousing there is a gain of $3,570,107, and in free goods an increase of $2,578,041. For the first quarter of the calendar year the importations were $126,661,267, against $80,864,500 for the same period last year. Of the aggregate imports during the past three months, 66.8 per cent. consisted of general merchandise (other than drygoods), 31.2 per cent. drygoods, and the remainder of specie and bullion. Of the total for the corresponding period last year 31.45 per cent. was drygoods and nearly 65 per cent. general merchandise. The aggregate imports for the last nine months were $302,889,868, being $163,239,725 greater than for the corresponding period last year, and $163,925,017 in excess of 1878.

Our exports for the month of March amounted to $35,239,172. The total for the last three months reached $85,471,827, and for the first nine months of the fiscal year were $287,065,479, an increase over the same period last year of $21,835,063. Commercial authorities regard the prospects of the export trade as more favorable than for some time past, and from present appearances it is believed that our shipments of merchandise for the entire fiscal year will not fall short of $380,000,000, exclusive of specie.

DO THE PEOPLE RULE?

IT has been the habit of American citizens to felicitate themselves that sovereignty resides in the people; that by inherent right and constitutional declaration they are the rulers; that the public judgment is all-potent in the selection of public servants, and that Governmental policy in its relation to the nation, to the States and municipalities, depends wholly upon the expressed will of the masses. However well-founded this boast may have been in the past, there seems to be but small cause for maintaining it in the present. Theoretically the people still make and control the Government; in reality they are merely machines to register the will of their masters. The private caucus and machine politics have usurped the power once enjoyed and exercised by freemen. Of the more than nine millions of men legally entitled to suffrage, but a mere handful assume to determine who shall, or shall not, administer public affairs, and so in respect to the policy which is to affect the interests of at least fifty millions of people. The commonalty, in fact, have quite as little to do with the choice of rulers, and giving direction to public affairs, as with determining the courses of the planets. True, there is a specious show made of consulting their wishes. They are invited to primaries or mass-meetings, and go through the form of choosing delegates or naming candidates for this, that and the other office. But, bless their innocent souls, the caucus or the managers of the machine have been ahead of them and scored the music to which they have danced. Even the men who never put in an appearance at a primary, and shun a mass convention as they would some deadly infection, meekly submit to the tyranny of the "machine." They shrug their shoulders and whiningly argue that resistance would be futile.

The evil of machine politics intrenches itself everywhere. It has given "bosses" to our municipalities, and self-perpetuating demagogical dynasties to the several States, as well as to the country at large. As the evil has grown the people have proportionately lost in power. They are no longer the rulers but the ruled. Political sovereignty has given place to political vassalage, and, as a consequence, the country suffers from bad government and festering corruption. Congress affords a fair illustration of how the machine works. There the Democrats are slightly in the ascendant. In caucus a mere majority of the dominant party decides the fate of great questions pertaining to the well-being of the country. Who, in this case, governs legislation? The answer is plain. The Senate consists of seventy-six members, of whom the Democrats have forty-three. In caucus twenty-two constitutes a majority. The House of Representatives consists of 146 Democrats, 134 Republicans, and 13 Greenbackers. Seventy-two Democrats, if all are present, constitute a majority in caucus. Thus, through the pernicious caucus system, less than 29 per cent. of the Senate and about 24.5 per cent. of the whole House are enabled to dictate legislation for the entire country. As is the caucus to Congress so is the "machine" to the country. It is the government of the many by the few. It is the concentration of power in the hands of men bold enough to seize it.

Thomas Jefferson may have been right in claiming that party spirit was wholesome to a republic, but that illustrious citizen firmly believed in the right of the people to rule. So, in like manner, did all the early statesmen of the country. They were careful not to trench upon the prerogative of sovereignty; this invasion has been left for more modern times. Party organization has landed the people in the toils of the politicians. It is the same with both party organizations. A few men, anxious for the spoils, assume to give direction to party affairs, and this is called "creating public sentiment." Is it necessary to call in crafty politicians to create public sentiment for Thurman, Sherman, Tilden, Blaine or Grant? We do not think so. The people should be capable of judging each upon his merits, and determine for themselves who is best fitted to serve their purposes. No man has a personal claim to public office, and no man should arrive at that distinction except through the untrammeled will of the people

But there is a growing spirit of unrest abroad in the country. The more intelligent among the people begin to see that they have been the dupes, if not the vassals, of designing men. This, so to speak, is the awakening of public sentiment from a long lethargic sleep. When that sentiment shall have grown strong enough to smash the "machine" and re-establish the old order of things, then will the country have honesty and efficiency in the public service; then will our currency be placed on a basis of permanent security; then will our systems of taxation, national and State, be simplified and made more equitable; then will the Government recognize its obligation to act in the interest of the whole people and seek to promote the prosperity of the whole country. To have peace, happiness and increasing prosperity the people must rule.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE extraordinary result of the elections in England has been the main topic of interest abroad during the last two weeks. Not only in the British Isles, where, of course, the defeat of the Conservatives is a matter of paramount importance, but also in Germany, Austria, Russia and France, the Press and the leading statesmen have been expressing their views, and generally, it may be added, their regret at the course of events.

Although the elections are not as yet quite over, it is already outside the possibility of any doubt that the Liberals have an overwhelming majority over both the Conservatives and the various Irish parties together. Indeed, the very hugeness of the Liberal majority will probably, in time, prove a source of weakness; for a large majority in the House of Commons is apt to divide into parties and another "Cave of Adullam" may again be found. Still, for the moment, the Liberals have full control, and they will have a chance to pass measures of home legislation that the Conservatives have, in the opinion of the country, neglected. Queen Victoria, who has been absent at Baden-Baden and at Darmstadt, where her daughter, the late Princess Alice died, has reached London, and Lord Beaconsfield having placed his resignation in her hands, the question of the succession will soon be determined. Prince Bismarck, who years ago was credited with saying that if "Turkey was the sick man, England was the sick woman," has been openly avowing his dislike to the Liberal victory, and, of course, France is disgusted at the victory of the men who left her to the tender mercies of the Germans in 1870. In the German Reichstag, in a debate on the Army Bill, it was alleged as a reason why Germany should prepare for possible war that the insecurity of the political situation throughout Europe was increased in consequence of the inevitable changes in the English Cabinet consequent upon the result of the recent elections. "Mr. Gladstone," said one speaker, "was a visionary, romantic and prejudiced politician and partisan; he was not a safe ruler or guider of men, and in his hands England would become a source of constant anxiety and danger."

One thing that the elections has brought strongly before the world is the falling off in the social position of Members of Parliament. The Ballot Act has taken away the humors of elections and electioneering, so that no "Eatanswill" jokes are any longer possible. But all the old ruffianism is still extant, and the intelligent English voter continues to propel dead cats and rotten eggs at the legislators of his country. Members of Parliament, unlike Members of Congress, are not paid for their services, so that many of the men returned to the present Parliament must either be supported by their party or their constituencies. This is particularly the case with the Irish contingent, most of whom will be more or less dependent for their breakfasts upon New York servant-girls and other subscribers to the Home Rule and Fenian funds.

Mr. Parnell's dictatorship has received a heavy blow in the defeat of Mr. Kettle, his nominee, in Cork County. The programme of the Irish members of the new Parliament, who have arrived in London, is said to be moderate. They ask the equalization of the Irish franchise with the English, and the extension of the Ulster tenant right to the whole of Ireland. This is the substance of their demands.

In France the quarrel between Church and State continues, and the Governmental decrees against the Jesuits and other unauthorized congregations form a subject of much discussion and trouble. The first decree gives the Jesuits notice to break up and leave their establishments within three months, except in the case of educational institutions, when two months more are allowed. The second decree contains full directions respecting the manner in which other unauthorized institutions are to qualify themselves and to apply for legislation. The general sentiment in France seems to be in favor of the Government, and even Prince Jerome Bonaparte has expressed himself against the Jesuits. Not so, however, the other members of the Bonaparte family, several of whom have denounced Plon-plon's manifesto. Père Didon, the monk who lately drew all fashionable Paris to hear his eloquent sermons against the divorce laws, is gone to Rome, and, according to some persons, he will be reprimanded by the Pope for the freedom of some of his utterances. Meantime the champion of free thought, M. Ernest Renan, has left Paris for London, where he is delivering a course of lectures on the influence of Rome upon the early Christian church.

Cuban affairs still occupy the attention of the Spanish Congress. General Martinez-Campos strongly urges liberal modification in the Cuban budget of receipts, but he does not seem to have any considerable backing. It is stated that the Cuban debt amounted, on the 1st of April, to 113,000,000 pesetas (about $21,000,000).

The Army Bill has passed the German Reichstag, with the Ultramontane amendment exempting priests from service in the Army Reserve.—Russia is about to issue, through the Rothschilds, a new railway loan of £15,000,000.—James Russell Lowell, the American Minister to England, is still at Biarritz, France, where his wife is ill.

The latest novelty in railroad engineering is the railway that has been constructed on Vesuvius. A depot has been built at the spot where the carriage-road ends, and from this point up to the cone of the old crater trains are run upon a grade that is at times as much as sixty-three degrees. Unlike the famous railroad on the Rigi, which is worked by a middle rail of "cogs," the track of the Vesuvius line is like that of an ordinary road with an up and down track. The cars only hold six people, and as one ascends the other descends. The ascent will only take ten minutes, while in former times it was a weary climb of over an hour. Strong walls have been built to divert any flow of lava, and a fine restaurant and café ornament the plateau where the depot is built. But an upheaval of the old volcano would sadly disarrange the construction account and cause a stampede of waiters.

French imitations of English sport have always been a theme for humorists in spite of the great improvements that have taken place of late years. The victory of Gladiateur in the "Derby" some sixteen years ago avenged Waterloo in the eyes of many Frenchmen, and some French stables have since then been remarkably successful in carrying off the principal prizes on the English turf. But an attempt to introduce the thoroughly English amusement of coursing hares with greyhounds has not proved equally successful. There was a meeting at the Enghien racecourse, near Paris, a short time since, at which all sporting Paris was present. The hares, however, turned out to be only rabbits, which have neither the speed nor staying powers of the real hare, and they all fell ready victims to the swift greyhounds. One, however, escaped by taking refuge in a clump of brushwood, where the dogs could not follow him.

THE Mapleson Opera troupe quitted these shores for England, April 17th, to return to us in August next, with the two additional bright particular stars—Nilsson and Gerster. Colonel Mapleson's troupe will then be "simply perfect." We wish the gallant colonel and his human aviary of sweet singers "God speed" and au revoir.

WE greet Il Repubblicano, the first number of which, printed in the "sweet sounds of Italy," lies upon our table. This most recent recruit to the lists of journalism, is dedicated to politics, science, art, industry, the army and navy and commerce. In appearance it is highly prepossessing, while the matter will be of "whelming interest" to those who love Sunny Italy.

THE enormous emigration from Germany to the United States is accounted for on the ground of the aversion which exists to the arbitrary features of the new Army Bill. It is stated that from the 4th to the 11th of April, 5,800 persons left Bremen for this country and England. Among the emigrants are many skilled workmen, who seek in new fields an opportunity for the profitable use of their genius and abilities.

THE statistics of our grain production in 1879 are full of interest. The aggregate production of corn in the whole country was 1,545,000,000 bushels, of which 1,228,500,000 bushels were produced by eleven States, Illinois alone contributing to the grand total 309,000,000 bushels. Of wheat, the total production was 449,000,000 bushels, of which 341,500,000 bushels were grown in eleven States. Illinois produced in all 44,900,000 bushels.

THERE died in Washington the other day a fourth-class clerk in the Treasury Department, who had served in that capacity for forty-three years, and who in that time had never taken but five days' vacation. His father before him had been a clerk in the Comptroller's office for forty-two years. The average modern official might profit by this example of industry and fidelity, so strikingly in contrast with latter-day indolence and self-seeking among public officials.

JUSTICE in Pennsylvania is slow, if not blind and erratic. Ex-State Treasurer William H. Kemble, who pleaded guilty to corrupt solicitation in connection with the Riot Bill before the Legislature last Winter, and who ran away when he should have appeared for sentence, has been again admitted to bail, and will now have another opportunity to disport himself at the seaside, or wherever sweet fancy may lead him. If Kemble had been a poor man he would have been sent to jail long ago, but being wealthy and a political "boss," he is permitted to snap his fingers in the face of the courts and defy the laws under which he is liable to punishment. There is, after all, a difference "'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee."

THE committees of the House of Representatives have laid out more work than Congress can dispose of in five years at the present rate of progress. So far the present session has been practically barren of results of real value. The Bills relating to the tariff, to finance and to other important subjects, are no further advanced than they were four months ago, and there is now no reason to anticipate any final action on any matter of actual importance to the country.

FOUR hundred and forty-seven poor children have been provided with homes in the West through the aid of the Tribune Fund. In some cases, whole families have been placed comfortably in Kansas and Iowa. Mr. Thurlow Weed, in a note on this benevolent work, says truly: "There is not any form in which charity can express itself so truly bright, beautiful and beneficent as in providing homes for destitute orphan children. Bread cast upon such waters is sure to return in blessings." Our wealthy citizens cannot use their means more wisely and usefully than in contributing to this fund for the rescue of homeless children from destitution and degradation.

IT has been the fashion among "stalwart" Republicans to speak of the solidity of the South as to political measures as constituting a deadly menace to our institutions and the principles vindicated in the civil war. But these same persons find nothing to condemn, but everything to commend in the effort now making to consolidate the Southern delegations to the Republican National Convention in favor of General Grant. If the ex-President shall be renominated, it will be by the support of delegations from Southern States which cannot possibly give him a vote in the electoral college. It may thus turn out that a "solid South" will prove, indeed, the ruin of the Republican Party, but in a way not at all anticipated by the "stalwarts"—a way, in fact, for which they will be themselves responsible.

The business of illicit distillation in the Southern States has attained a magnitude, and is marked by a murderous defiance of the laws, which may well challenge the attention of the national authorities. An official report just submitted to Congress shows that from the 1st of July, 1876, to the 1st of February of the present year, the agents of the Treasury Department have seized in South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, Arkansas, Alabama, Georgia and Kentucky, 3,043 stills, and arrested 6,153 persons. In this work twenty-five men have been slain by the violators of the law, and forty-nine wounded. As a result of the Government efforts, the receipts from distilling have been nearly doubled in the districts where the work has been done, and the number of honest distilleries nearly trebled. As to the effect of the illicit manufacture and sale of spirits and tobacco, it is said that the Government has lost at least $4,000,000 of revenue.

THE speculative and artificial prices in the iron market have given way, and the trade may now, possibly, be established on a stable basis. The reduction in prices was a matter of necessity to keep English iron out of the market. Nine months ago pig-iron sold at $16 per ton; in January it was advanced to $28 per ton, and two months later was forced up to $35 and $40 a ton. The result was a decrease of sales and paralysis in the market. Plate and rail manufacturers complained that they could not continue operations at profitable figures, and railroad men postponed their orders for rails until a more convenient season. Then English iron began to pour in, and it was found that the British and Scotch manufacturers, after paying all expenses, including freight and $7 for the duty, could land their product on our wharves and undersell our own manufacturers. Thus the foreign iron trade has prospered from the folly of the American manufacturers. The probability now is, that the error of artificial prices being demonstrated, the trade will resume its normal condition.

A PITIABLE and distressing picture of the condition of the Jews in Morocco is given in a recent despatch from Minister Noyes, who visited the country in his late Eastern tour. He states that, while numbering 300,000 in all, they constitute the best part of the population; they "are regarded by the Mohammedans as unclean dogs, entitled to no respect and unworthy to live. A few of them, it is said—the more wealthy and influential, in fact—enjoy the protection of foreign representatives, notwithstanding international laws in this regard. But this excites jealousy and a spirit of revenge, so that the condition of the great mass, the unprotected, is all the worse on account of the privileges enjoyed by the few." The Government is a simple despotism, and human life is held cheaply in the hands of the ruling monarch. Minister Noyes declares that, "in the interest of humanity, it would be well if the Christian nations of the world could in some way intervene, by way of a mixed commission or otherwise, to establish in Morocco greater equality of rights and a better and more impartial method of administering justice." It is gratifying to learn that a conference of the leading European powers on this general subject is shortly to be held in Madrid, and it is to be hoped that our Minister at the Spanish Court will unite with France and Italy in insisting upon such measures as will give adequate protection to the classes now so outrageously oppressed.

MIRAGE.

A TAWNY, yellow sea of sand, stretching onward, without a single lonely well or pool, until it meets the dim horizon where the sun still lingers in the red haze that binds the desert and the sky together.

Here and there a worn and blackened rock rises above the plain, gazing with mute triumph on the sterile waste around it, where countless ages before rolled another sea whose waves, now turned to endless billows of burning sand, even yet in some fierce wind-storm dash against its seamed and wasted sides with deathless enmity, striving to wear away or bury it out of sight.

Above, in the copper-colored sky, the sun rolls sullenly upwards, mocking the silent conflict below as it burns and blackens both rock and sand with its scorching rays.

In the distance, a few dark specks hang motionless above the desert, as if watching something beneath them. As the sun rises higher and its glare grows more intense, a few bright-colored lizards crawl from beneath the rocks, and, seeking the hottest place in the sand, curl themselves up for their noon-day sleep—the only living creatures in the dead, parched solitude, whose silence seems almost audible.

But the black spots in the distance draw nearer, and by noon grow to be buzzards, slowly wheeling round and round above something below, which seems to be also advancing, although yet hidden by the sand billows which rise and fall between. The lizards moved lazily in their sleep, working deeper into the burning sand which trickled in tiny cascades from the nearest ledge of crumbling rock, never resting in its silent, conquering march from this old-time dried up sea towards Egypt and the East.

Over the nearest hillock at last appeared the objects which the buzzards had so steadily watched since sunrise: a single camel, followed by three shadows which once were men, tottering on in single file with bent heads and wavering footsteps.

On the back of the camel were fastened a few articles of baggage which swayed to and fro as the wretched animal toiled through the sand down the hillock. The ropes which bound them to its back needed tightening, for a gun slipped off and fell beside the first of the three figures behind it.

The man slowly turned a ghastly face, through whose blackened skin the bones seemed protruding, hesitated for a moment, and then, dropping his head, staggered on without an effort to save the weapon. The two behind him followed automatically, without a sign of life except the moving of their withered limbs as they dragged them on.

Now the camel gave a greater lurch, vainly strove to recover itself, and then, with a low, hoarse moan, sank upon its side and lay with shriveled tongue hanging from its mouth, while the short, quick gasps for breath ceased almost at once. It has borne its last burden across the desert. The leader stopped as if awakening from a dream, gazed for a moment at the fallen beast before him, and then—with a last look at the copper-colored sky above, from which the sun each moment beat down more fiercely upon their heads, and at the silent waste of shining sand from which the heated air rose in waving clouds—turned towards his companions, who had also halted and were staring at the camel with dull, indifferent eyes. He strove to speak, but his swollen tongue refused to shape the words; so he drew a knife, and, kneeling beside the camel, cut into its side towards the water-reservoir in its stomach which, filled at the beginning of their journey, had enabled it to travel for days without drink. The others gathered round him, and watched with a little interest in their glassy eyes. A few drops of blood flowed sluggishly, but the reservoir was empty: the camel had struggled as long as any remained.

The man rose to his feet and gazed for a moment at his companions with a strange gleam in his eyes; then flung himself, like a wild beast, upon the neck of the camel, and commenced to drink the little blood left in its veins. The others followed, almost falling over each other in their weakness as they strove for a share in the bloody feast. For several minutes nothing was heard but the flapping of the wings of the buzzards that circled lower and lower above the prostrate group.

Then one after another the three arose and looked into each other's faces, with eyes that had in them the glare of a tiger's eyes as he bends above his prey. They had tasted blood.

Silently they divided the provisions in the pack which the camel had carried. Food they had had, but no water since the morning of two days before, and to eat the dry bread and dates unmoistened had been impossible.

They started on again, leaving the camel behind them for the buzzards, part of whom swooped down upon it; but some flew on over their heads, as if preferring to wait a few hours longer for their prey. The leader noticed their singular perseverance, and with a shudder quickened his steps a little as he dragged his swollen feet through the slippery, yielding sand.

For several hours they staggered on until a long ledge of crumbling rock was reached, before which they halted. It was a little higher than the plain immediately around them, and over which the three gazed backwards.

The sun hung almost above their heads and cast no shadow as they stood looking across the vast death-haunted desolation behind them, where one by one their comrades had fallen without a word from the caravan, or had sank down in huddled heaps, dead and dying beneath the faded moon or the flaming sun as it rushed on day after day, until these three alone were left of a mighty company that had ventured into this land of living death.

"Shall we go on?" the first man asked, in a hoarse, faint whisper that sounded strange and far off in the silence.

The one nearest him looked upward at the ledge of rock, which ordinarily he could have scaled in a moment, but which now seemed an insuperable barrier, and, listlessly shaking his head, dropped his pack by his side, while the other staggered and fell face downwards, his claw-like hands burying themselves in the sand. The two still standing looked for a moment at the prostrate figure and then at each other; but each turned away horror-struck at what he saw in the other's eyes.

The taller man, who had led the little party to this last halting-place, tottered away a few steps and sank against the ledge, his face turned from his companion, who, stooping, turned upward the face of the man who had fallen. He was dead! His eyes wide open in a ghastly stare.

After a moment's hesitation, he commenced to drag the body towards a projecting spur of rock, casting crafty glances at the other, who did not notice him, but sat staring with dull, unheeding eyes across the desert before him. The living and the dead disappeared behind the rock, while the buzzards, who had lighted and were standing round them in a hideous circle, followed with hoarse croaks in seeming protest against losing their rightful prey.

Left alone, the leader sat waiting, in dull apathy, for the death he knew would sure come. His gaunt body was propped up against the ledge behind him, at whose base his bones were to bleach and molder through the never-ending years until, perhaps, the sea once more rolled over its ancient bed—when Time was old and Earth was feeble.

His limbs were half-buried in the drifting sand, which seemed to creep and cling about him. He closed his eyes at last to shut out the glare before him, and the buzzards, sitting round, staring with red, evil eyes at what he knew would, before sunset, be their prey.

Thinking him dead, one, bolder than the rest, hopped on the tattered rags which covered his breast and struck his face, but flew away as the man opened his eyes with a start and grasped a fragment of rock by his side. It seemed like lead, so heavy, that, as he flung it, it barely reached the nearest bird. His arm fell, and once more unconsciousness began to steal over him. Then the sound of far-off music came—of such unearthly sweetness that he listened spellbound, though filled with a vague wonder that he should hear such strains in such a place. As he listened the sound grew louder, thrilling him with strange, new joy that banished hunger, thirst and despair. He slowly opened his eyes, almost fearing that he should awake from what he thought must be a dream such as foreruns death, but half-rose in amazement. Before him no longer stretched the burning sand-waste but a sea of water, rippling beneath the light breeze that now began to blow towards the little island where he sat.

Instead of the vast sheet of molten copper above, there smiled a sky of clear, light blue, flecked with white clouds, whose shadows chased each other in the clear water that almost touched his feet.

As he gazed the strains grew louder, seeming to come from behind the spur of rock at his right, round whose point, as he looked, a stately ship, or barge, appeared; such as might have sailed that dried-up, desert sea when Time was young and Atlantis ruled, before the Sphinx sat down or the pyramids rose upon its ancient ocean bed. The prow was in the shape of a huge sea-serpent's head, covered with iridescent scales of green that glittered in the sun like great emeralds, covering also the body of the serpent, which formed the vessel's hold. Two high masts rose from the deck, with vast silken sails puffed outward with the wind. A hundred long oars, like multitudinous arms, slowly beat the waves in harmony with the song, which he now saw came from a band of maidens in the high prow, with white loose robes and flowers garlanded about their long dark hair, which the breeze lifted gently as the ship came onward. The middle of the deck was filled with men in glittering mail, and musicians, whose harps and trumpets joined with the song. A feast was spread upon long tables, covered with jewel-studded plate of gold, beneath a canopy of silk. As his gaze wandered from group to group, the ship advanced abreast of where he sat—so near that he might have leaped on board; and the stern, which had before been hidden by one of the sails, now lay before him. A vacant space, in which children, with wings and bows as Cupids, played before a high-raised throne, on which lay a woman, before whose perfect beauty his eyes sank dazzled. Her form was half-hidden beneath a thin, pearl-colored fabric, shining beneath her hair, which fell about her like a halo. A great gold serpent circled one finger with fiery eyes that glowed and glistened as she turned and stretched both arms toward him on the shore. Drawn by some irresistible power he rose, but the ship sailed onward near the ledge. He followed on the bright sand, glistening with the ripples from the great prow that silently clove the water, until the ledge of rock and the new-born island ended, round the point of which the galley turned and floated from him. The serpent's eyes gleamed fainter on the wrist of the queen upon the throne, who stretched her arms once more toward the wretched being on the shore. With a despairing cry, he flung himself into the sea towards the receding galley. Then sea and galley dissolved and disappeared as suddenly as they had come, and he lay face downwards in the dusty, barren sands, the burning sun glowing above him in silent mockery.

* * * * *

When he awoke from the swoon in which he had fallen the moon was shining above him. The shadow of the ledge fell black and impenetrable near by on the sand, that shone like sea-salt in the pallid light, which bathed the still, white wastes of the land of ghosts around him. The wind blew cooler from the dim edge of the desert, giving him a little strength, as he rose upon his stiffened limbs and gazed around with a vague wonder. Dim shapes seemed to haunt the white solitude that stretched dream-like in the uncertain distance, as if they were waiting for his death; but as he tottered forward, he found them only shadows of some rock or hillock. He gained the ledge again and rested; then with new strength toiled onwards round the point. He found a level stretch of snowy sand; beyond, a sand wave, on whose crest rose something before which he sank upon his knees with hands covering his eyes.

"Am I mad yet?" he cried, remembering for the first the vision of the afternoon.

At length he rose and approached the object, drawn onwards against his will. It seemed the skeleton of some vast ship of ancient time before the flood. Its bare ribs, where the side was broken, rose high and black from the mighty keel, like the bones of some great monster of the Silurian age. Two masts rose high above the bulwarks which hid the deck. As if in a dream he tottered along beneath it until he reach the prow.

It was the huge sea-serpent's head he had seen in the mirage, now so grim and terribly lifelike that he shrank back in terror. Was he still dreaming? He put his hand out doubtfully and touched the side. It was covered with hard, smooth scales of some metallic substance, even yet faintly gleaming in the moonlight with the iridescent emerald hue he had seen before now, dimmed by ages, but not yet wholly lost. He made his way down the other side until he circled it and reached the great breach where the ribs and scaly sides were crushed in as if by some great blow. He rested for a time, and then with great difficulty clambered up and reached the deck, from which still rose the masts, whence the yard-arms stretched that once had borne the silken sails. Across the deck, in the high stern, still sat a shadowy throne, and on it something which he could not see, in the dim light of the moon. But he knew what—in some strange way he felt that the ship he had seen the day before and this one were the same, though this had sailed a thousand centuries before. Around him lay huddled heaps and masses of débris, with cups and plates of gold gleaming from their midst, and coin and heavy goblets strewn upon the dusty deck. But these were scarcely noticed; he stood gazing towards the stern for a time; then, drawn by a burning haste, hurried across the deck over the strange mass in which his feet sank as if in dust and gained the level open space, where, in his dream or vision, he had seen the Cupids playing before the queen, the memory of whose face and form still shot through his veins like fire.

The throne or couch was covered with a mass of what seemed glittering cloth, from which gold and jewels still gleamed faintly above something he must see. He clambered up the steps across the dais, and tried to raise the fabric, but it crumbled and fell to ashes beneath his touch, disclosing the delicate skeleton of a woman stretched before him, with both arms extended, as if luring him to a ghastly embrace.

On one finger gleamed a great gold ring, in the form of a serpent, with eyes of fire that burned upon him as he stood before her.

As he gazed, some subtle power drew him towards her arms, shining white and ghastly in the pale light which lay so still upon her. He advanced a step, but, with a cry, turned from the figure and flung his arms before him. One hand met hers, and the ring dropped into his palm as her arm fell crumbling by her side.

He staggered backwards to the breach, among the strange heaps which he now saw had the bones of what had once been living creatures.

Filled with a wild terror lest these long dead revelers should rise and hold him there among them, he clambered down, he knew not how, to the sand, and fled over the desert, leaving behind him, in the shadowy distance, the ghastly ship, stranded on the wave of sand.

* * * * * *

On the iron-bound coast of New England a storm was raging with unparalleled fury. November had passed without a gale to ruffle the fair sea that had stretched so peacefully from the rocky shore. But now the Winter, with strength long husbanded, leaped from the ocean upon the land with the crash and din of a tempest that was long remembered in the thousand homes that night, bereft of dear ones swallowed up in the seething caldron of the storm.

On a rocky cape, that runs far out into the Atlantic, the inhabitants of the fishing hamlets were gathered on the beach, feeding great fires whose ruddy glow strove to pierce the murky blackness that smothered sea and land, and warn the ships of their fate if they drove too near the shore.

Near one of these great fires was gathered a little group of men, cowering beneath a rock which partially sheltered them from the blinding wrack, that drove in upon the land from the chaos seaward. Now and then a few would make their way to the fire with fresh fuel, and then retreat, breathless and exhausted. As the night wore on the storm increased until the fury of the wind and waves seemed about to sweep away the land before their onslaught. Such a night was not remembered by the oldest of the little group who sat watching in the darkness just outside the ruddy glow the fire cast upon the sand and dripping rocks.

In one of the blinding flashes of lightning that lit up shore and sea with a phosphorescent glare, a figure was seen by one of the watchers advancing over the rocks towards where they sat.

"See!" he cried, stretching his hand towards the newcomer. "There's somebody swum ashore from some wreck."

The party started to their feet and gazed into the darkness. But, as the figure reached the ring of light around the fire, they saw it was a woman, advancing over the slippery rocks with feet that evidently were at home upon the coast.

"Great God, it's some one come to join us from the village!" said another. "P'r'aps one of them as has husbands out to-night."

A dozen sprang to meet her, and helped her to their shelter beneath the overhanging ledge.

"It's Widow Crawford!" cried several, as the bent, thin form of an old woman stood before them.

"And what has brought you here, mother, such a night? You haven't any one out in the storm?" asked one of them, with rough tenderness, as he took off her cloak and hung it by the fire.

"Ah, James Alden, you know better than that," she answered, in a thin, eager voice—"it's my son! He's been gone, you know, for eight years last Easter; but he's coming home now. I knowa it, and he's bringing his bride with him. I've come down to welcome them when they come. We felt it for a long time," and she sank down before the fire and held her withered hand towards the blaze.

The men looked at each other in silence, with a tear or two upon their hard, weather-beaten faces before this bent, old woman, who had been watching for so many years.

Soon the dull sound of a heavy gun was heard, followed by another and another—a dread signal that a ship was drifting helpless towards the shore.

"Their firin' guns to let us know he's comin' with his bride, and such a bride—such a bride!" she said, in feeble triumph, peering into the darkness as she rocked to and fro.

For half an hour they waited, listening to the dull booming, which grew more distinct as the ship, still hidden by the storm, drifted towards the shore.

At last one came so near them that the flash of the powder was seen.

With a glance at each other the men took up their coils of rope, and one after another went down to the edge of the sea, followed by the Widow Crawford.

Then came a crash as the ship struck a rock, a great cry filled their ears, and then—nothing but the crushing of the waves and the roaring of the wind.

The widow sat upon the sand in the blinding rain in patient silence, her dripping cloak drawn tight around her.

The bodies began soon to drift in, and, through the night, the little band worked at their task with grim devotion.

Two sailors were the only persons saved, and these towards morning helped in turn.

When the sun rose a few fragments of wreck and a row of still drenched figures lying on the sand were all the sea cast up of its prey.

The silent watcher in the cloak had waited for her son as yet in vain. As each body was washed ashore she had crept to it and carefully examined its face, only to each time shake her head and watch with yearning eyes until the next came in.

The first rays of the sun were reaching through a great rift in the clouds, touching the gray dull rocks and foam-flecked sand when the last corpse was washed ashore.

The fishermen gathered round it silently as the slight figure in the cloak knelt before it, and, with a low crooning cry, clasped its head in her arms, and sat rocking to and fro, her wet gray hair falling over its face—her son was found.

One of the rescued sailors peered curiously over her shoulder, then cautiously lifted the left hand of the corpse. Around the third finger was a deep purple indentation as if a ring much too small had long been worn there.

One of the fishermen grasped him by the shoulder and angrily drew him away. "Can't ye leave her alone with her dead?"

"No offense, mate," he answered, apologetically. "But you see, I was lookin' for somethin' as was there last night," lowering his voice. "He came aboard at Alexandria, and we heard about him then, how as he was the last one left of a caravan that was swallowed up in the desert. Some say he was saved by the ring he wore, as was a charm. Howsomever, from the hour he came aboard ill luck followed us, and such weather that we nigh sunk a dozen times. He used to walk the deck all night, and talk to himself, and look over the side into the sea. When the moon shone he was worst. And he kep' growin' thinner and more like a corpse all the time, till the men said he was cursin' the ship with that serpent ring of his; and, sure enough, it did. But it's queer, mate, for it was there last night, a shinin' and gleamin' on his finger, where it had growed on, being too small, and now it's gone—clean gone!" he muttered, as he walked away shaking his head, leaving behind him the little group of fishermen around the gray figure with the drenched head in her arms.

The sea had once more woo the ring. Had its last wearer won the first?

POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE.

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE, United States Senator from Maine, comes from an honored ancestry. His great-grandfather, Colonel Ephraim Blaine, of Carlisle, Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, was Commissary-General of the Revolutionary Army from 1778 till the close of the struggle in 1783. The high esteem in which Colonel Blaine was held by Washington and his great compatriot leaders in the Revolution is attested by numerous letters from them, official and unofficial, still in the possession of Colonel Blaine's descendants in that State.

Mr. Blaine's father was born and reared in Carlisle, and, after an extended tour in Europe, South America and the West Indies, returned to spend the greater portion of his life in the adjoining County of Washington, where he died before his son was fully grown. He had the largest landed possessions of any man of his age in Western Pennsylvania, owning an estate which, had it been preserved, would have amounted to-day to many millions.

James G. Blaine was born in Washington County, Pa., January 31st, 1830. In his earlier years he was under the best attainable tutorage, and at the age of eleven was sent to Lancaster, Ohio, to school, where he lived in the family of his relative, the Hon. Thomas Ewing, at that time Secretary of the Treasury. In November, 1843, Mr. Blaine entered the Freshman class of Washington College, and graduated in September, 1847, at the age of seventeen years and eight months. In a class of thirty-three members Mr. Blaine shared the first honor with John C. Harvey, now Superintendent of Public Instruction at Wheeling. He was a diligent, ambitious student, specially excelling in mathematics and Latin, and was marked also for his proficiency in Logic and Political Economy.

After teaching school for a time in Tennessee, Mr. Blaine became a teacher in the Pennsylvania Institution for the Instruction of the Blind, leaving that position to accept that of editor of the Kennebec (Maine) Journal. Subsequently he was editor of the Portland Advertiser. He was a member of the Maine Legislature in 1859, '60, '61, and '62, serving the last two years as Speaker of the House; was elected to the Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses (serving in the Forty-first, the Forty-second and Forty-third as Speaker.) He was re-elected to the Forty-fourth Congress as a Republican, and was subsequently elected to the United States Senate to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Lot M. Morrill, appointed Secretary of the Treasury, and being re-elected for the ensuing term which will expire March 3d, 1883. In 1876 Mr. Blaine was a candidate for the Republican nomination for President, and on the seventh ballot in the National Convention at Cincinnati received 351 votes, only 28 short of a majority.

Mr. Blaine's public career has, from the first, been exceptionally successful. A man of intense convictions, of high courage and resolute purpose, he has ranked for twenty years as one of the foremost leaders of his party, impressing himself largely upon the policy and legislation of the country in every great crisis and exigency of its recent history. In the crucial period following the civil war, he contributed quite as much as any other man in public life to that compact concentration of Northern sentiment which had its outcome in the constitutional amendments, under which the fruits of that struggle were securely garnered and definitely established. In more recent days he has been prominent as representing what is called the "stalwart" Republican sentiment, and it is that portion of his party which to-day so vigorously demands his nomination for the Presidency.

Mr. Blaine's personal appearance marks him everywhere as "a king of men." He is in the prime of life and the full flush of health. He is above the middle height, and yet is so compactly and strongly built that he does not seem tall. Upon his powerful trunk is set a large and well-developed head, with a full, handsome and expressive face, on which is expressed the confidence which comes from conscious ability and continued success. The eyes are keen and bold; the lower part of the face is covered with a full, neatly-trimmed gray beard, in which the trace of its original dark color may still be detected. His movements are quick and agile; his style of speaking clear, rapid and vigorous. The magnetism of his audience and the spirit of the occasion thrill and enkindle him, and he dashes impetuously on in his argument. He is at his best before a popular audience, especially in his own State, where almost every face is familiar to him. He has remarkable power of memory; no incident that claims his attention fails to impress itself upon his recollection, and he has the power to recall it whenever the same associations or conditions are renewed. He has prodigious working capacity, and, as a political organizer, is perhaps without an equal. The Republican canvass in Maine, always directed by him, touches the minutest details, and is far more complete and thorough than that of simple wards or townships in many other States.

Mr. Blaine is now prominently named for the Republican nomination for President, having apparently as many and as earnest supporters as four years ago. He is especially strong at the West, and has many supporters in Pennsylvania, New York and Ohio, but it is possible that the "unit rule" adopted in the two former of these States may prevent their vote in the National Convention being cast in his favor. Should he be nominated and elected, he would, no doubt, maintain in his executive policy the most advanced sentiment of his party.

THE SEAL FISHERIES.

AS a supplement to our recent illustration of the departure of the seal fleet from St. John's, Newfoundland, we give, this week, a sketch of the men of the fleet at work and shooting seals on broken ice. The extreme wariness of these creatures renders it necessary to exercise the utmost caution in approaching them, the slightest exposure of the hunter causing them to betake themselves to the water and under the ice. The plan adopted by the hunter is to lie hidden behind some pinnacle of ice within gunshot of a hole, and then, as the old seals—it is of them exclusively we speak—come out of the water to bask in the sun, to shoot them. It is mentioned as a singular circumstance that if a number of them come up together the hunter may, if a good and experienced stalker, shoot them all consecutively, it being a fact that they, although sharp hearers, pay no attention to any cracking sound such as that of a rifle or sealing gun, while the slightest exposure to sight will frighten thousands off the ice. This mode is not so destructive as that of killing in the water, when it is said, by old hands, only one out of five shot is secured, the rest sinking when life expires.

The vessel shown in our illustration is the steamer Arctic, of Dundee, Captain Adams, which, with four others, takes out Newfoundland crews, the Scotchmen not being accustomed to the danger of taking seals on broken ice, and, therefore, of little use.

THE WHITTAKER OUTRAGE AT WEST POINT.

AS the official investigation of the alleged outrage upon the colored West Point cadet, Whittaker, progresses, the public interest in the mystery becomes more general and engrossing. The method of conducting the inquiry has been severely commented on as being an assumption of the theory that the wounds were self-inflicted. Detectives have been employed to follow up a number of clews. Assistant United States District Attorney Fiero has been instructed to watch the proceedings by orders from Washington, and a reward of $1,000 is offered through Hon. Martin I. Townsend, who is investigating the mystery at the instance of the Secretary of War, for the detection and conviction of the person or persons engaged in the binding and mutilation. Young Whittaker, while on the witness-stand, deported himself in a manner to gain the sympathy of all the spectators, answering every question put to him without hesitation or contradiction of any of his prior assertions. He announced his belief that the officers of the post bore him no ill-feeling, but that the white cadets were against him. He lived perfectly isolated, never receiving a friendly call or act from any cadet, and never participating in the outdoor sports. He had often been ignored in the messroom by the waiters, who would pass him by in handing many of the dishes around. One cadet had been court-martialed and dismissed for striking him, and there were two others whom he believed had a grudge against him.

The latest rumor was to the effect that three cadets who had been drinking in a saloon in Highland Falls, were overheard speaking of "fixing the nigger Whittaker," a short time before the alleged outrage was committed. This clew was being followed up by the various detectives at the time of writing, and it was suggested that several who had been at work on that line expressed the strongest belief in the truth of Whittaker's narrative of the outrage.

The Court of Inquiry consists of the following officers: Major Alfred Mordecai, president; Captain Charles W. Raymond, lieutenant; Samuel E. Tillman, lieutenant; Clinton B. Sears, recorder. Lieutenant John G. D. Knight was originally assigned to represent the interests of Whittaker.

THE HAHNEMANN HOSPITAL FAIR.

THE grand fair in aid of the New York Hahnemann Hospital, which opened at Madison Square Garden, April 12th, was in every way a remarkable success. The arrangements and decorations of the Garden were superb, and the display of articles of beauty and utility was at once varied and brilliant. The principal booths were most artistically arranged, and a floral temple, which occupied a position near the centre of the building, was not only one of the first but one of most interesting objects which attracted the attention of visitors. This temple was especially attractive on "Connecticut night," the second of the fair, being handsomely decorated with flowers from private conservatories in that State. The booths, of different styles of architecture and elaborately decorated, extended down either side of the building from the entrance. Numberless Chinese lanterns and umbrellas hung from the ceiling and produced a pleasing effect, and over the promenade that encircles the main floor was suspended a line of bird-cages containing singing canaries. Among the more attractive tables and booths were the Cornucopia Table, a large Moorish temple in design, draped in crimson; the Pansy Table, constructed in the Queen Anne style, with deep purple drapery; the Rainbow Booth and the Eureka Booth, octagonal in shape, the posts trimmed in blue, and the sides decorated with large red and white roses. The Art Gallery was another point of special interest to visitors.

A striking feature of the fair was the gypsy encampment, situated at the east end of the building, near the place formerly occupied by the grotto. The mouth of the grotto was closed up with a large piece of mountain scenery, which served the double purpose of closing up a great gap and forming an effective background. In the centre of the camp was a tent made of bright-colored material. On the inside, at a table, a young lady, arrayed in gypsy costume, told the fortunes of young persons anxious to know their future. Near the door of the tent stood a large moving wagon covered with white canvas. Little girls, picturesquely attired in Spanish gypsy costume, scarlet dresses trimmed with gilt spangles and coins, ran through the encampment selling little trinkets of every description. Several young ladies, also dressed in gypsy costume, attended tables where cigars, pipes, outdoor games and archery articles were sold.

The opening proceedings of the Fair were informal in character and judiciously brief. Mr. Salem H. Wales, the treasurer of the Fair Association, having read a brief address in eulogy of the ladies who had so disinterestedly come forward with their services and their gifts in the cause of so deserving a charity, introduced Mr. Chauncey M. Depew, who spoke at some length. In the course of his remarks he said "that to the ladies was undoubtedly owing the introduction of hospitals in the United States; for," said the speaker, "in the old archives of the Assembly of the Colony of New York two hundred years ago Margaret McDaniel petitioned the Colonial Assembly to reimburse her for moneys expended during twenty years in taking care of sick strangers in New York." In England also the speaker said that Guy's Hospital owed its existence indirectly to the acts of women, and he recited some merriment by relating how old Guy had, shortly before his death, contemplated marrying his housekeeper, but taking offense at some orders she gave contrary to his own to workmen who were engaged in making alterations in his house, he relinquished his matrimonial projects and executed his will, leaving all his wealth for the purpose of establishing the magnificent hospital that bears his name. The gentleman concluded his remarks by an eloquent panegyric on the hospital system of New York, and spoke in fitting terms of the noble generosity displayed by the ladies on this occasion, as on all others, when the cause of charity stood in need of pleading.

The fair, the proceeds of which will be applied to the free-bed fund of the Hospital, will remain open for two weeks.

THE SWISS COLONY AT MOUNT AIREY, GEORGIA.

BREAKFASTING at the Kimball House, Atlanta, Ga., at 6:30, and a capital breakfast to boot, the artist and I crossed the street to the depot of the Piedmont Air Line, and, taking our seats in the cars, started at 7 o'clock for the new Swiss Colony at Mount Airey, distant from Atlanta about sixty miles. The original merry Swiss boy who selected this locality for an abiding place had a lively regard for the picturesque, nor had he in any way relinquished his fondness for climbing—Mount Airey being 1,700 feet above the level of the sea, and commanding a panoramic view almost Mexican in its richness, beauty and extent. Stretched in "lingering sweetness long drawn out" is the vale of Nacoochee—a quiet loveliness, while in the hazy distance the Blue Ridge Mountains seem to form part of the azure sky.

The Swiss Colony at Mount Airey was established three years ago by Mr. J. Staub, a sturdy little pioneer, bearded like a pard and agile as an antelope. This gentleman, forsaking the land of the glacier and the chamois, came to the United States in 1873, and, ere he decided upon a site for the colony, visited Columbus, O., St. Louis; went up the Mississippi to Davenport, Iowa, then to Chicago, then to St. Paul and back to Columbus and Cleveland. Florida next attracted his attention, and he passed thither through Kentucky. The Government of Florida offered the Swiss Government, through him, 800,000 acres of land if settlers would be guaranteed. Mr. Staub eventually struck Georgia, and, coming to Mount Airey, pitched his tent. He published an account of his wanderings and final halting-place in a Swiss paper called Landbote, with the result that in a few weeks an instalment of colonists were en route, consisting of eleven young men and four families, twenty-nine in all.

"Emigration," said Mr. Staub, to me, "is a political necessity in Switzerland. America has killed our watch trade; our silk and cotton trade, too, have been terribly crippled. I have over two hundred letters now from people in Switzerland seeking information about this place, and I look forward to making the Nacoochee Valley like one of our dear valleys in the Oberland. I'll see my people settled from Mount Airey to the Blue Ridge. I will have no one come here who has not money to buy tools and to set up farming. Pauper idlers are the ruin of a colony. Each family should bring $800. This will enable them to buy their land and not to rent it. I suggest that four or five families club together and raise $1,500. This will enable them to purchase a farm of 250 acres. The farmers here only sell for cash. We don't know anything about mortgage," and he added, somewhat tewily, "don't want to know."

After my interview with Mr. Staub I strolled over to the farm of another Swiss colonist, a Mr. Bleiderman. I met this gentleman horseback-riding with his wife, a splendid specimen of the daughters of the land of Tell. Mr. Bleiderman farms 300 acres, and seems to "handle the land" with the dexterity of an expert. The colony is rapidly increasing, and the ring of the ax and the thring of the horrow tells of "busy, thrifty husbandry." Gold is found in the Valley of Nacoochee, and some of the richest mines in Georgia are yielding their wealth to careful toilers. Unlike the deposits of other sections the gold is found in veins, not pockets. Mining is not, therefore, so hazardous as elsewhere.

North Georgia has a splendid future, and the attention of the tens of thousands of immigrants who are daily arriving in the United States should be earnestly drawn to its pine-clad hills and fertile vales.

POLITICAL NOTES.

THE Louisiana Democratic Convention has declared in favor of General Hancock for President.

THE Charter election in Albany, New York, April 13th, resulted in a decisive Democratic victory.

SPEAKER RANDALL has written a letter in opposition to the enforcement of the unit rule by the Pennsylvania Democratic Convention.

THE Iowa Republicans have elected Blaine delegates to the National Convention. In the Kentucky and Missouri State Conventions the Republicans instructed their delegates for General Grant. The Kentucky Convention was marked by great turbulence.

IT is gratifying to know that Mr. Acklen has failed of a nomination for Congress from the Third District of Louisiana. He has been anything but an ornament to the House.

A REPORT that Mr. Tilden had prepared a letter withdrawing from the Presidential race is authoritatively denied.

THE Massachusetts Republican Convention has elected a delegation favorable to the nomination of Senator Edmunds for President.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Spanish Thanks for French Charity.

The gratitude of the Spaniards to the French people for the relief afforded to the sufferers by the floods of Murcia has shown itself not only in Spain, but in the Spanish South American States. In Buenos Ayres in January last, a manifestation by Spaniards in favor of France was made, which was most enthusiastic. On January 6th the Spanish Club began the demonstration at 8 P. M., and it continued through the evening. Cries of "Viva l'Espagne," "Vive la Republique Argentine," "Vive la France," came from the streets and balconies. The different societies in the procession sang the "Marseillaise" in French, and toasts were made to the Latin race.

The New Bridge at Basle.

This beautiful structure of stone and iron, the second bridge over the Rhine at Basle, was opened last year. A peculiarity of it is that it crosses the river diagonally, and has but three short spans, with narrow road arches. It is highly ornamented, and each of the four stone abutments supports a classical figure in white marble.

A Lesson in Bandaging.

The frequent accidents which occur when it is impossible to get a physician or surgeon at once, make it peculiarly necessary that the lay people should be instructed in the art of dressing and bandaging wounds. To illustrate this necessity the following incident may be told: The other day a poor lad fell down a steep shaft in the docks in England—nearly seventy feet. The "navvy" working at the bottom thought it was a lump of wood at his feet, and kicked him; finding that it was a boy he said: "What are you doing down here?" Further, finding that the boy was insensible, he hollced to his mates up the shaft, "What d'ye chuck the boy down here for?" He knew nothing of ambulance appliances and the delights of triangular bandages. Dr. Crookshank has begun a series of lectures before St. Agatha's Workingmen's Club on this subject. Already fifteen members of the club have passed the necessary examination and obtained the certificate.

The Landing of the Danube Steamboat Company.

This powerful company controls almost all the steamboat navigation on the Danube and its affluents, running fine boats on the Danube from Ratisbon to Sulinarmiding, 325 miles; on the Isn, from Simbach to Passau, 8 miles; on the Drave, from Barca to Draneck, 29 miles; on the Theiss, from Tokay to Szenkemeed, 116 miles; on the Save, from Sisseck to Savespitza, 60 miles, and, finally, from Sulina, on the Black Sea, to Odessa. In 1878 they carried more than three million passengers. The appointments of the vessels and of the various landings are good and well-regulated, and the view of the main landing at Vienna shows that they look both to display and to the convenience of travelers.

Visit of the ex-Empress Eugenie to Zululand.

The ex-Empress Eugenie left England, Thursday, March 25th, on her mournful errand to South Africa. Traveling incognito under the name of the Countess of Pierrefonds, she left Waterloo Station in a carriage, which, on reaching Southampton, was detached from the train and run into a shed in the Docks, so that the arrival and departure might be kept as private as possible. The ex-Empress was received by Sir B. Phillips, Chairman of the Union Company, and at once led on board the steam tender, which conveyed her to the Union Company's steamship German, in which the voyage will be made. Among the company which assembled to witness Her Majesty's departure were Prince Charles Bonaparte, the Duke of Bassano and Fernand Nunez, the Princess Anna Murat, the Duchess de Mouchy, M. Pietri, and Uhlmann, the valet of the late Prince, who identified the body on its arrival in England, and to whom the Empress presented, in the German's saloon, a photograph of her son. There were also present the Bishop of St. Alban's and the Hon. Mrs. Claughton, Lord Dorchester, Canon Wilberforce, Sir Owen Burne, Sir Lintorn Simmonds, and Messrs. G. Mercer and H. Maynard, two of the directors of the Union Company. Her Majesty is accompanied by the Hon. Mrs. Ronald Campbell (who goes out to visit the grave of her husband, who fell at Ziddaine), Sir Evelyn and Lady Wood, the Marquis of Bassano (son of the Duke of Bassano), Dr. Scott, Lieutenant Slade and five servants, two of whom were the English servants of the late Prince. The cabins occupied by Her Majesty are on the port side of the vessel, and are luxuriously and tastefully fitted and furnished. The wildest dream never surpassed the romance of the widow of the third Napoleon sailing from England to touch at St. Helena on her way to look upon the spot in Zululand where fell the fourth and last Napoleon. The Empress is said, as she left, to have looked sadly broken, and her hair has turned gray.

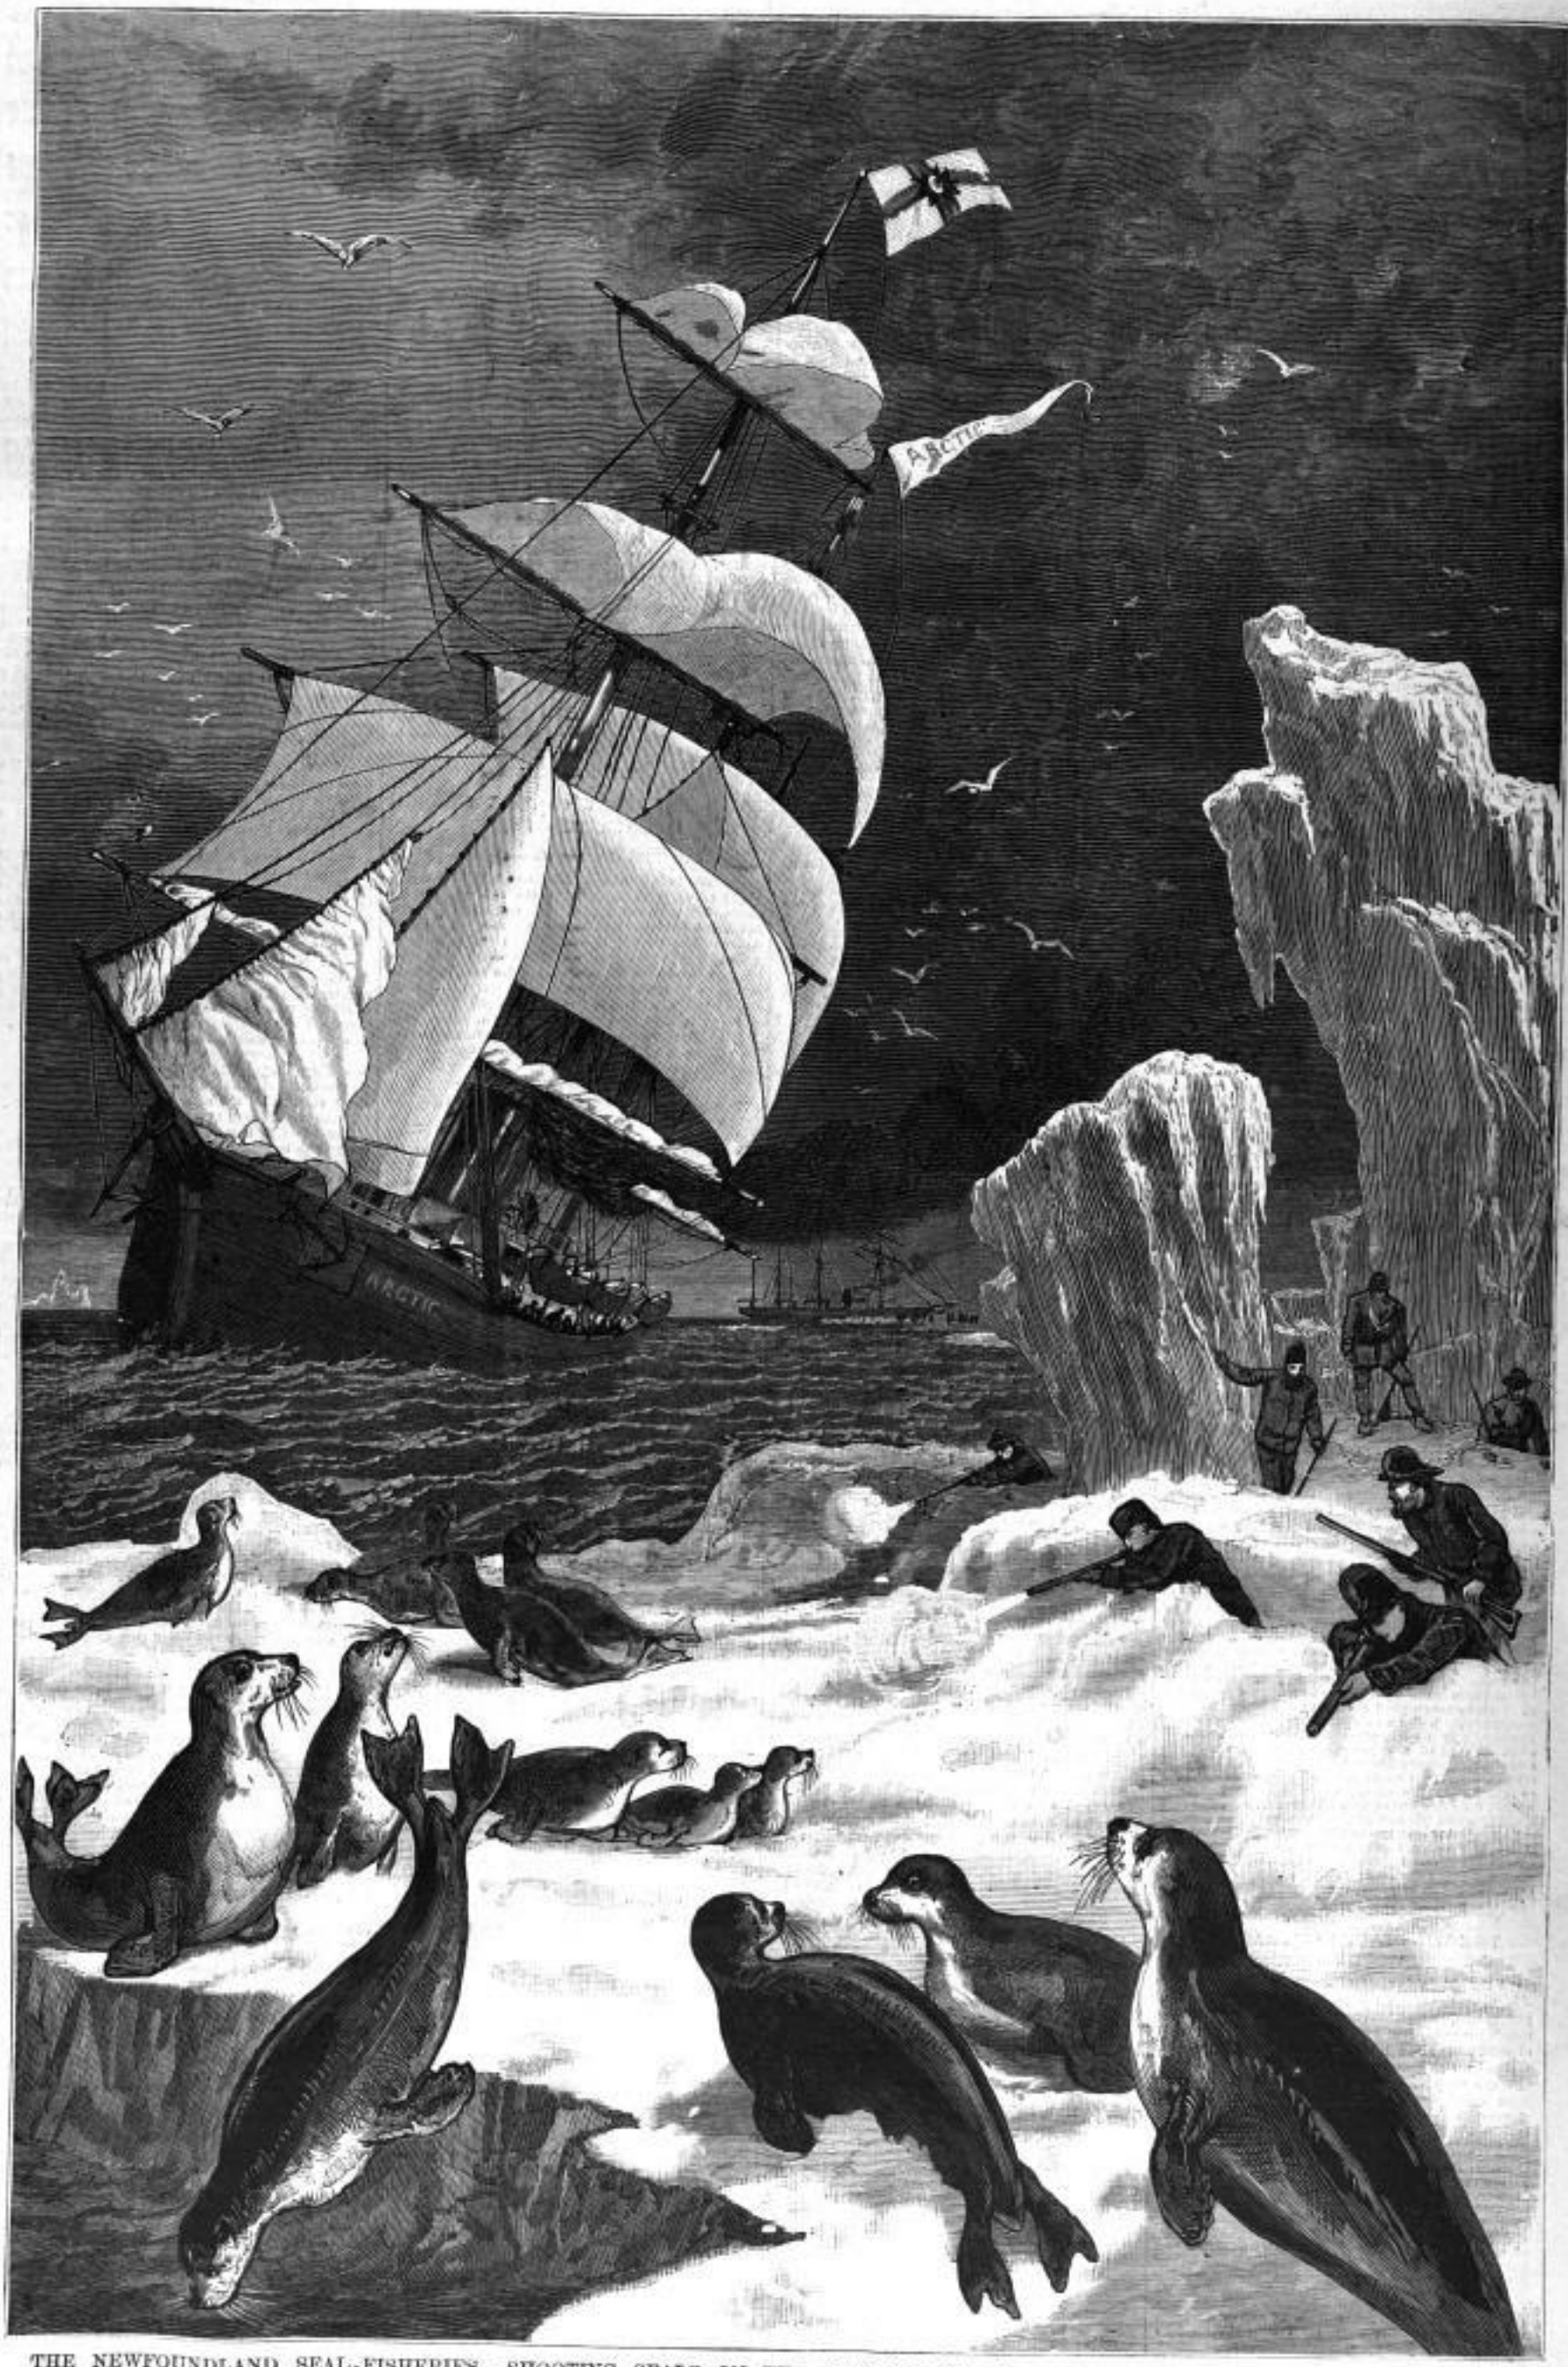
—OUR Consul at Tien-tsin reports that American manufactures can secure the trade of China by sending out only unadulterated and perfect goods. The English put on the Chinese market cotton goods more or less adulterated with sizing, which weigh much less after washing than before, while the American retain their integrity. Within three years the consumption of American cotton goods has gained immensely on the English, and the Consul imputes this almost wholly to their superior character.



—AMONG the gifts lately received by the Louvre is a mosaic tile pavement covered with arabesque ornaments in the style of the Italian Renaissance, which formed the altar steps in the chapel of the Chateau of La Riste in the Forez. It bears the date of 1557, and is said to form a magnificent specimen of French ceramic art of the time. His body was taken by the Polish King Boleslas to Gnesen, whence the Duke of Bohemia, Bretislav I., brought it among his trophies, after a campaign against the Poles, to Prague. The coffin bore the date 1346. It has been conveyed to the cathedral and placed in the reliquary.

—GLADSTONE, in a recent interview with a newspaper correspondent, explained what he meant by his denunciation of Austria in one of his late speeches. He said that he understood perfectly well the difference between the old and the present régimen in Austria, but he hated Metternich, and, he added, "I hate all that recalls in the slightest his system of interference in the affairs of the people who are working out their own freedom. The freed Slavic races should be permitted to build their future without molestation. Whoever among the Austrians knows the significance of the English expression 'hands off,' knows my policy. 'Hands off!' I repeat."

—THE annual report of the Trustees of the Astor Library shows that in the year 1879 $10,995.52 were spent for books, binding, catalogues, shelves and equipment, and that its income was $27,597.99; 5,569 volumes were added, making the whole number now in the library 189,114, 1,100 of the accessions being works on Oriental history and literature. The total number of visitors was 50,042—a daily average of about 214. In November last Mr. John Jacob Astor conveyed to the library by deed of gift three lots of ground adjoining on the north, 75 feet front on Lafayette Place by 100 feet in depth, and announced his intention of erecting thereon an addition to the present library building 65 feet in front by 100 feet deep, which will increase the capacity for books by 120,000 volumes. It is noticed that although the attendance of general visitors last year fell short of what it was in 1878, the number of sleove visitors, who generally are engaged in some particular research, considerably increased.

OUTRE TOMBE.

ONE pale and perfect twilight eve in May,
Pensive of mood, I sought her cherished tomb;
The air was redolent with a suave perfume,
The earth had woven into flowers the way!
With saddest thought I knelt me down to pray,
Wondering how nature, lacking her, could bloom,
When, oh, most strange, a rose-bush from the gloom,
Caught in my sleeve, as if to bid me stay!

I dared not doubt; her fond soul at my feet
Breathed in the beauteous bosom of the flowers,
And charmed my sense, as when in bliss complete,
Upon the blue Garonne, near feudal towers,
Her white, soft, jeweled hands and kisses sweet
Were wont to lure me back in vanished hours!

A NOVEL.

BY CHARLES DEMITRY.

MELCHIOR and Reginald walked rapidly towards the albergo near which stood their carriage, with the driver walking, as before, in front of his horses and cutting at the grass with his whip.

An intelligent look came into his eye as they approached, and a cunning smiled played on his lips.

"All is well, then, with the signor?" he said.

"Yes," replied Melchior, shortly.

"And the other signori who joined you at the palazzo an hour ago?"

Melchior shrugged his shoulders. "Drive back," he said, "to where we met you this morning." And so speaking, he and Reginald entered the carriage, leaving the driver, before he should take his seat, to chuckle and to make a pass or two with his whip at an imaginary enemy.

As the vehicle rolled away in the direction of Milan, the friends looked back at the palazzo. Near the entrance to the avenue they perceived Vellani's party. Vellani was walking apparently without assistance, with Rodolfi and the surgeon on either side of him.

"He is not much hurt," said Reginald, as he marked this fact. Then he put his arm around Melchior's neck. "Thank heaven it is over!" he exclaimed.

For a moment Melchior was silent.

"I am glad," he said, finally, "that it fell to me to meet Vellani. He was no mean antagonist, I assure you, and had it been your lot to encounter him, I doubt not that he would have killed you with as little compunction as he would kill a fly. The man is an assassin at heart, and I saw when we crossed swords that he would have slain me if he could."

"You were his superior with the sword—why did you not disable him at first, if you understood his purpose so plainly, instead of disarming him merely?'

"I don't know. My original intention was to inflict the wound which later, under the pressure of necessity, I was compelled to inflict; but when it came to the test, I could not do so."

"With the courage and skill of Sir Galahad you have the heart of a tender and loving woman, Melchior!" exclaimed Reginald, with admiration. "Ah, my friend—for you are, indeed, the best and noblest of friends!—I never can forgive myself for having been the cause of your peril this morning! It seems to me, too, that I should not leave Milan without enforcing some sort of accountability on this Vellani."

"Pshaw! this is mere sentiment. The man will be disabled for a long time, and you cannot afford to wait here until he chooses to get well. Rodolfi is right. The sooner we leave Milan the better. You have your manuscript, and Vellani has proved himself unworthy of your notice. Let us consider that he has been sufficiently punished."

"Circumstances seem to have decided for me," said Reginald, throwing himself back moodily in his seat. "I suppose I should feel grateful that my life has been spared from the murderous thrust of that fellow's blade, but——"

"But what?"

"I cannot help remembering that it might have been at the price of yours, Melchior."

"You are a little vexed," said Melchior, with a smile, "that it was I that crossed swords with Vellani instead of you. Is it not so?"

"Yes. What shall I tell Manuela—I beg pardon, I should say, Miss Waring—when I see her? Must I tell her that I allowed her brother, brave and generous as he is, to be drawn into a duel on my account with a man to fight whom I had journeyed from New York to Milan?"

"You do not state the case exactly as it stands," Melchior answered, lightly. "When you see her—if you should see her before I do—tell her that the susceptible Marchesa di Lupo fell in love with Melchior at their first interview, although he did not reciprocate her passion, and that Mr. Luigi Vellani, suspecting the fickleness of his fair betrothed, and mad with jealousy, forced a duel on him, in which virtue, fortified by skill, was triumphant. Tell her also that Melchior and Vellani's own friends applauded your resolution to decline any further notice of Vellani. But, above all things, do not fail to tell her of the marchesa."

The thought of his adventure with the marchesa seemed to amuse him highly, for he laughed to himself in his corner of the carriage. His mirthfulness was contagious, and soon Reginald, forgetful of his self-reproachful thoughts, found himself echoing his friend's merriment.

When the carriage reached the city, after paying the driver and dismissing him, the friends, arm-in-arm, walked with rapid steps towards their hotel.

They spoke little on the way. Each was occupied with his own reflections, and each was thinking of the separation now so near at hand.

As they approached the hotel, Melchior said, as if answering his own thoughts:

"Yes, Rodolfi was right. The stroke of noon must not find us in Milan. We shall meet again, Reginald, in New York or at Albuquerque."

Reginald made no reply, but walked by his friend's side with his eyes fixed on the pavement.

They entered the vestibule of the hotel, and Melchior again spoke. "Let us at once arrange our trunks, so as to take advantage of the departure of the first trains for Genoa and Paris. I have some writing to do which will detain me for half an hour. It is now half-past ten o'clock. Meet me in the sitting-room at eleven."

They separated, each going to his own room.

The few preparations that Melchior had to make were soon completed. When his trunk was packed and ready for the porter, he seated himself at a table and began to write.

The letter that he had written he sealed and placed in his pocket. From the same pocket he took several written sheets of paper, which, together, formed quite a bulky package. Then he lighted a match, held these pages to the flame, threw them into the fireplace, and watched them until they were converted into a heap of black ashes. These ashes he stirred around and crushed until they were reduced nearly to a powder.

For a minute or two he stood leaning against the mantelpiece, gazing at the cinders in the fireplace and seemingly lost in thought.

He came out of his abstraction at last, sighed faintly, and, turning, rang the bell.

When the waiter came in answer, he directed the man to take his trunk down-stairs.

Reginald was awaiting him in the sitting-room.

"Are you ready?" asked Melchior.

"Yes."

"Then let us go."

As they were leaving the room a man, dressed in the garb of a private soldier, who had been conversing with the hotel clerk a moment before, advanced to Melchior, placed a note in his hand hurriedly, and with the brief remark in Italian, "For Signor Waring, from Signor Rodolfi," bowed, and stood as if awaiting an answer.

Melchior opened the note, and translated its contents to Reginald as follows:

"SIGNOR WARING—The meeting of this morning is known to the Chief of Police. He informs me, privately, that if you and your friend will depart from Milan at once, the matter shall go no further; otherwise, you will be arrested. Take my advice; leave Milan without delay. V. is in no danger. In two weeks, the surgeon tells me, he will be off the sick-list. Intelligence of the affair was sent to the police by the Marchesa di Lupo, who manifests great bitterness against you. Yours,

"Caserne Grande, Milan. RODOLFI."

Melchior wrote in reply, thanking the officer for his warning, and explaining to him that they were on the eve of departure from the city.

"The marchesa, it seems, was determined to revenge herself on me for having slighted her charms," he said, laughingly, after Rodolfi's messenger had gone. "But, fortunately, we shall be beyond any danger from her malice in an hour."

"We owe our immunity from arrest to the good nature of the Chief of Police, I suppose," said Reginald.

"Yes, and probably a little to Rodolfi's promise to get us out of Milan immediately. It would not surprise me if Vellani and the marchesa were prepared to hatch up some plot against us, by which Vellani would have been enabled to escape all responsibility, and we should have been put to serious inconvenience."

"The idea is a disagreeable one. Come, let us be off!"

The trunks were on the respective carriages, and the two friends stood on the sidewalk, exchanging farewells.

"Here, Reginald," said Melchior, handing him a letter, "here is something that I wish you to refrain from reading until you are aboard the steamer on your return to the United States. Promise me that you will do as I wish."

"I promise it. But what does this envelope contain? Why this mystery, my dear boy?"

"That is my secret. The contents will interest you, I dare say. All that I ask is that you will not be offended if I am not more explicit on the matter treated of in this letter. Some day I may explain it to you more fully."

"Do not fear that I shall feel offended," answered Reginald, pressing his hand affectionately. "Nothing that you could do could offend me."

"Farewell, mio caro."

"Farewell, Melchior."

Melchior walked with quick steps to his carriage.

At the door he paused and turned.

"You know where to find me when I am at home?" he exclaimed. Then, with a wave of his hand he sprang into the vehicle.

In the next half-minute the driver had closed the door and seized the reins, and the carriage was speeding towards the station of the Milan and Genoa Railway.

Reginald watched it as it receded in the distance, and as it turned a corner two squares away he saw a white handkerchief fluttering at the window.

There was no time to return the salutation, for the vehicle in the same moment disappeared.

A sudden sense of solitude came over him as he appreciated the fact that he was alone. It seemed to him now, for the first time, that he really had parted from his friend.

"How strange an impulse of affection I have for Melchior!" he exclaimed, following his train of thought. "I feel in this separation, that I love him almost as men love women. But is it for his sake alone, or for the sake of Manuela, whose brave, pure soul seemed to be looking from his eyes?"

The driver of his carriage snapped his whip slightly and cast an inquiring glance in his direction.

Recalled by this little by-play to the necessity of hastening his movement, he took his seat in the coach.

"To the Turin station," he said.

In a half-hour thereafter he was on his way to Paris.

Three days later he left Havre in a steamer of the French line on his homeward journey.

CHAPTER XII.—MELCHIOR'S REVELATION OF THE PAST.

FAITHFUL to his promise to Melchior, Reginald waited until the two towering lighthouses that mark the sea approaches to Havre had dwindled into mere specks on the watery horizon before he opened the letter that his friend had left with him, and the contents of which were to be read only when he should be fairly out at sea on his return to the United States.

The steamer was moving rapidly through the water, vibrating through all her length with the motion of the revolving screw and rising and falling in the long swell of the ocean; on the deck the passengers were sitting in groups or were promenading under the wide awning which screened them from the rays of the sun.

Reginald sat apart from the rest, and, with his arm resting on the railing, silently watched the diminishing line of the coast, and when, as has been said, all signs of land had vanished save the lighthouses of the cape, fixed on their lofty promontory, he began the perusal of what Melchior had written:

"You will be surprised, my dear Reginald" (his friend's letter began) "to read what follows, and you will marvel greatly when you see how I have restored your old manuscript. You will say to yourself, 'Can Melchior be in earnest, or is he only playing on my credulity?'

"Let me say to you in the beginning that in all that I have written I have given facts that I have every reason to know are true. But, alas! the most important links in the chain I cannot supply, and that is the name of the pueblo and of the church that holds the hidden treasure. However familiar to me may be the story as related in the manuscript, the name of the pueblo never has been known to me. As to the rest, you must feel too assured of my honesty and my regard for you to think for a moment that I would deceive you.

"'What riddle is this?' I think I can hear you saying to yourself. Well, let it remain a riddle until time and circumstances, which decide the fates and fortunes of all of us, shall, perhaps, read it aright to both our understandings. I wish to see you possess that treasure. A million and a half of dollars, my dear Reginald, will then come into your hands, and you will enjoy all that the possession of such a fortune can give. I will not envy you—as if I ever could envy you any good!—for I am rich enough by inheritance to satisfy my utmost needs.

"When I suggested to you the theory of Vellani's possible course if he should endeavor to find the treasure, I was thinking more particularly of what I knew myself regarding the facts of the case. I was only contemplating a journey—the journey to Madrid and thence to the place of the arrest of the writer of the manuscript—that might result in the solution of the mystery. So you see, I was not so much inspired after all, and it was very easy for me to point out the road when I was familiar beforehand with all the milestones. How this knowledge came to me need not concern you. If you are very curious about it, however, I will tell you: A little bird sang it in my ear!

"I must confess that your venerable manuscript made some points clear to me that had before been vague and unsatisfactory. I knew, for instance, that its writer was arrested somewhere in the north of Mexico, but where, was always a mystery to me. But now I feel certain that the place was Durango. In supplying the deficiencies of the document I have written words and phrases that may be somewhat different from the originals, but the facts, Reginald, were as I give them to you. The words that I have added, as you will see by comparing my version with the manuscript itself, are underscored.

"In conclusion, let me advise you to go to Durango—if you still intend to pursue the matter to the end—and gather there any information—whether traditional or documentary evidence—that you may obtain of the most unhappy Chevalier St. Evremond Deville—he who died in the castle of San Juan de Ulua, at Vera Cruz, in the year 1700, and left that old letter as a memento that he had lived and suffered. At Durango some clew may exist to the now unknown pueblo; and the name of that pueblo once discovered, the rest is clear; for, if the ancient church be still standing, the treasure of gold, diamonds and precious stones must still be awaiting the hand of its discoverer. The conviction grows on me hourly that Vellani will begin his researches as soon as he is convalescent of his wound. This will be in a few days' time. Should he go to Madrid—and it would be the most natural thing in the world for him to do so—he may find the clew to the name of the prisoner and the locality of the arrest; and then by one of those chances that sometimes so mysteriously occur to make or mar a man's destiny, he may discover the name of the pueblo. Should he ever acquire that knowledge, he will know where to go better than either of us know at present.

"Farewell, my dear Reginald. Remember me as one who would do much to serve you.

"MELCHIOR WARING."

When Reginald had finished the perusal of this letter, with its unexpected contents, he leaned his forehead on his arm for several minutes. When he again looked up, his eyes were moist as though tears had wet their lids. It was not alone what he had just read—unselfish, just and affectionate as it proved Melchior to be—that had aroused this display of feeling, for his nature was not one to give way easily to tears; but in that interval he was thinking with renewed tenderness and gratefulness of the devoted youth who so generously had espoused his cause in a critical moment, and even had imperiled his own life—purposely, as he now began to believe—to preserve his from the danger of a meeting with Vellani.

With strangely mingled feelings he prepared to peruse the manuscript as restored by Melchior's hand. Unaccountable to him as was his friend's knowledge of the hidden facts related in it, he nevertheless had so much confidence in his assurance that what he had written was strictly true, that he did not for a single moment enter into self-argument on the subject, as he read what follows:

"In Prison.

"DEAR BROTHER CLAUDE—In the wall of the church of the pueblo, the name of which you know well, is the treasure in gold dust, diamonds and other precious stones, which I brought with me from Brazil in the year 1678, when I fled from it at country to escape the persecutions of the Viceroy Oliveira. This treasure is of the value of three hundred thousand louis d'ors, and of the suggestion of Fra Pablo, the Franciscan friar, during my stay at the pueblo, as a means of securing its safety while I should remain there, I hid it in the wall of the church, behind the altar, about a man's height from the ground. The good padre himself removed the material of which the wall is composed, and in this receptacle we placed the leaden box that contains the treasure. When all was completed, we repaired the wall, marking the place of re-entrance with the inscription "Juxta intra muros," which was cut by Fra Pablo into the adobe. Then, having washed the spot over with lime, no trace of our work remained. The circumstances that led to the abandonment of the pueblo it is unnecessary to recapitulate. In order to escape the fury of the heathen who, doubtless inspired by the Evil One, threatened our destruction, we left the place one night suddenly and secretly. I could not venture even to remove the box from the wall. Fra Pablo—alas; the venerable man, my old and good friend!—was slain and I alone survived with the secret. It was impossible thereafter for me to return. The danger of captivity and death was too extreme, and while awaiting an opportunity to recover the treasure from its place of concealment, I was put under arrest in Durango, because of certain words uttered in a moment of exasperation against His Catholic Majesty, and brought a prisoner to this Castle of San Juan. I shall never depart from my cell alive, my brother—I feel it. Go, then, to the church and obtain the treasure which I leave as my legacy to you and your children! I am childless. And to you, now that the path is open, I give it with a brother's benediction. I will send the letter at the first opportunity by a trusty hand, hoping that it may escape the scrutiny of my jailers. Remember that within the wall of the church, behind the inscription, the box is to be found. May heaven bless you and your family. Farewell, my brother, farewell.

"ST. EVREMOND DEVILLE."

Thus was it that Melchior had cleared up the mystery of the manuscript, and as Reginald read what his friend had written, he felt the conviction that it was a faithful, if not an exact, reproduction of the original document, as it had come from the hand of the writer. There was one point, however, on which he still was dubious, and this was in connection with the date 1678, and the diamonds of which the treasure was in part composed.

He knew that the first public discovery of diamonds in Brazil was made in the year 1728, although long previous to that time the natives had been aware of their existence in the country, though ignorant, of course, of the value attached to them by their conquerors. One of two things, therefore, was evident; either St. Evremond had taken the diamonds with him to Brazil, or, what was more likely, he had discovered them sixty years anterior to the Portuguese authorities' knowledge of the presence of diamonds in the province, and had kept his discovery a secret from all. It was a suspicion, perhaps, on the part of the Viceroy of his possession of the diamonds, thought Reginald, that caused the persecutions which had obliged him to flee Brazil.

The impression produced on him by the story, as revealed by Melchior, engendered in his mind an impatient desire for the ending of the voyage in order that he might set out at the first opportunity for Durango.

With the sanguine confidence of youth he already felt himself the master of the last secret in the solution of the only remaining mystery—the name of the pueblo.

But the process by which this knowledge was to be obtained took a most misty shape in his mind.

He saw himself, moreover, the possessor of St. Evremond's treasure, free to share it with Melchior, now doubly endeared to him.

Thinking of these things, he falls into a reverie, and a vision of the past comes before his eyes, the central figure of which is the vague pueblo with its church, and in it the shadowy forms of St. Evremond Deville and Fra Pablo, holding the leaden box between them. They dig into the adobe, betriended by the uncertain light that barely steals through the barred shutters of the rude edifice and is reflected in a faint glimmer from the surface of the gold and silver altar ornaments. The box is deposited in the cavity and the adobe is replaced. Then Fra Pablo engraves in the sun-dried brick of the wall the Latin line which marks the place of deposit, and the spot is carefully whitewashed, so that no curious eye may detect that the wall has been tampered with.

The scene changes, and in his reverie he sees the spectacle of the sudden rising of the angry Indians against their Spanish oppressors. The latter fly, saint as well as sinner, and among them Fra Pablo and Deville, leaving the treasure-box behind them. But the former is overtaken by the avenging natives and dies in his tracks, while the latter succeeds in reaching a place of safety.

Another change and the picture of Deville's arrest in Durango passes before his mind, followed by the captive's long journey to the dungeon of San Juan de Ulua, in Vera Cruz. Then comes the years of Deville's imprisonment; the hopeless expectations of release; the writing of the manuscript; the depository of the paper in the binding of the old book, while the writer awaits an opportunity to send it out of the castle; the failure of the captive's hopes; the final death of St. Evremond in his prison house, and the varied adventures of the ancient volume up to the moment when it fell into his—Reginald's hands—in the Nassau Street bookstore.

From this point his vision includes events of the present. He has journeyed to Mexico and has discovered the name of the pueblo. He seeks the spot and stands at last in the church before the inscription cut into the wall, the lines of which are so worn away with the crumbling of the adobe that they are scarcely discernible to the eye or palpable to the touch. He removes the adobe, and before him lies the leaden box as unchanged as when the hands of Fra Pablo and St. Evremond had placed it there two centuries before. He stretches forth his hand to grasp it, but at that moment another hand seizes it, and a malicious face, distorted into the features of a Mephistopheles, looks over his shoulder.

It is the face of Vellani!

A sudden noise arouses him from his rapt forgetfulness. He looks around him. The noise is caused by the passengers rising from their seats and hurrying to the saloon, the signal for dinner having just sounded.

This awakening is like the bursting of a glittering, fascinating bubble.

"Ah!" he says to himself, as he joins the rest and descends the stairway to the saloon, "it was only a day-dream, after all! But the appearance of Vellani at the moment I was about to obtain possession of the box—can that vision be prophetic?"

THE PRESENT EXTRAORDINARY EMIGRATION.

SCENES IN AND ABOUT CASTLE GARDEN.

THE good ship City of Brussels having been warped into dock, a couple of tenders come alongside and the emigrants step gladly on board, for is not the tender but a floating gangway leading to the eagerly longed for terra firma. The luggage is dis-gorged from the hold and transferred to barges in waiting, under the supervision of the obliging luggage-master, Mr. Madan; and the passenger-agent, Mr. Williams, having given the starting word to the pilots of the tenders, in a few seconds the sturdy little vessels are scooting down the river en route to Castle Garden. What a bright and bustling scene! The river studded with craft of every description, from the huge ocean steamer to the tiny sailing-boat, from the richly-laden and dignified argosy to the impudent little tug, scooting hither and thither and audaciously darting beneath the very bows of some leviathian, in momentary danger of being crushed like an eggshell. White-sailed sloops and schooners, ferry-boats speeding from shore to shore with their living and anxious freight, the Battery and Bedloe's and Governor's Islands, backed by the Narrows and Staten Island, all this does the emigrant take in as he is borne onwards; but Castle Garden is his Mecca, and every eye is fixed upon the longed-for spot of earth where the foot is to be planted after ocean incarceration.

The tenders speedily reach their destination, and the landing is effected. In single file the newcomers filter into the enormous rotunda, and Mr. George Morrel, the courteous police officer in charge, ushers them towards the registering clerk. Here each one is asked his or her name, place of birth and destination, the replies being entered in an enormous ledger. Then comes the question of departure, trains, boats, etc., and the queries uttered in French, Italian, Irish, Danish, Finnish, Russian, and fifty different dialects, are briefly but courteously responded to. Those who propose remaining in New York emerge into the Battery Park, and are cared for by the agents of the Inman line, who see them safely housed in respectable boarding-houses. Those who are compelled to wait for the evening trains for the West and South encamp in the rotunda, gypsy fashion, and sit, sprawl, crouch and lie in every attitude of indolent nonchalance. Some of these groups are intensely picturesque. The quaint costumes of Danish and German villages, the rich colors of Connemara cloaks, and the thousand and one hues of the bedizoned hassles of many climes, blend in glowing contrasts. Meals are partaken of; the "tay" is wet and the lager is foamed; children romp and play; the old people doze, and the younger take up the thread of the flirtations commenced on the bounding billows, and resolve to make the most of their time ere the bitter word of parting. The hour at length arrives when it becomes necessary to move towards the train, and then there is a mighty upheaval of human forms and human impedimenta. An employé musters the various parties, calling out names and destinations, and, still under the protecting ægis of the agents of the Inman Line, our emigrants march to the railway depot, enter the cars, and—Go West!

In a few brief months the almighty dollar rolls across the pond, and the dear ones left behind follow in the footsteps of the pioneers.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME AT ERIE, PA.

WE give herewith an illustration of the Wayne Block-house and Marine Hospital and grounds at Erie, which are proposed to be transferred by the State of Pennsylvania to the General Government to be used as a home for the indigent soldiers and sailors who are not comprehended under the general laws governing our national homes. A Bill is now before Congress providing for the establishment of such a home, conditioned on the transfer of the property by the State of Pennsylvania, and there is reason to believe that it will be passed at an early day. The history of the Wayne Block house goes back to the first settlement at Presque Isle, and is full of interest. The treaty of AIX La Chapelle in 1748, which closed the war in Europe, left the boundaries of the French and English possessions in America undefined. In the opinion of the French, the discovery of the St. Lawrence and Mississippi entitled them to the territory watered by those streams, while the claim of England was founded on a grant of King James dated 1606 to divers of his subjects, of all the countries lying between north latitude 45° and 34°, and westward from the Atlantic Ocean to the South Sea. Early in 1753 the French sent out a detachment from Montreal to make good their claim by force of arms, and to oblige all English subjects to evacuate, and in the April of that year they built on garrison grounds a fort of logs about one hundred and twenty feet square, with a log house in each corner, which they called Fort Presque Isle. In March, 1759, the garrison consisted of two officers, two merchants, a clerk, a priest, and one hundred and three soldiers, under the command of Burnicot. A few months later all the regular troops which could be spared from Presque Isle were ordered to Fort Niagara, which had been besieged by the English, under General Prideaux. After the defeat of the French at Niagara the utmost confusion prevailed at Presque Isle, and by the middle of August all the stores were sent away, and the garrison only waited the arrival of the French at Forts Venango and Lebœuf to join them, when they would all set out in batteaux for Detroit. A tradition prevails that at this time large quantities of treasure were buried either in the fort or on the line of the old French road. The French departed in great haste, and in 1760 Major Rodgers took formal possession of the fort in the name of the King of England, though it was not until 1763 that a definite treaty of peace was signed at Paris.

When Pontiac formed his plan for restoring to his people their homes and hunting grounds, he called about him the great Indian chiefs, and appealed to the love and gratitude they owed to the French and their hatred to the English, and by his eloquence secured the co-operation of all the neighboring tribes—the Ottawas, Chippewas, Pottawattomies, Miamies, Sac and Foxes, Wyandots, Mississaques, Shawnees, Menominees and the Six Nations joining actively in the campaign. All the British posts, from Niagara to Green Bay and the Potomac, were comprehended in the proposed attack, and so well arranged and executed were their plans, that nine out of eleven of the forts were captured.

The fort at Presque Isle was the point of communication between Pittsburg and Niagara and Detroit. It was in itself one of the most tenable, and had a garrison of twenty-four men, and could most easily be relieved. On the 22d of June, after a two days' defense, the commander, out of his senses with fright, capitulated, giving up the sole chance of saving his men from the scalping-knife. The history of savage warfare nowhere presented a scene of more heartless and bloodthirsty vengeance than was exhibited on this occasion. The few who were taken prisoners were doomed to the various tortures devised by savage ingenuity, and all but two were murdered—one a soldier, who escaped to Niagara, the other a soldier's wife, who was taken prisoner, but was ultimately ransomed.

On the 12th day of August, 1764, Colonel Bradstreet and his army landed at Presque Isle, but after a short stay marched to Detroit.

In 1795, by an Act of the Legislature, the town of Presque Isle, now Erie, was laid out, and a company of infantry sent to protect the commissioners, who were building a stockade on the site of the old fortification. In December, of the following year, General Anthony Wayne, commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, having concluded a treaty with the Northwestern Indians, embarked at Detroit for the purpose of returning to his home, but soon after leaving port he was violently attacked by his old malady the gout, and, becoming very much prostrated, landed at Erie. When General Wayne was brought into the garrison, he expressed a wish to be placed in the northwest block-house, the attics of the block-houses being comfortably fitted up and occupied by the families connected with the garrison. Captain Bissel was in command, and the sufferer met with every possible kindness.

A fit death-bed and silent resting-place for a brave officer and patriot was the old military post of Presque Isle and its picturesque bay. He named the spot for his grave at the foot of the flagstaff, and here died and was buried the great soldier of Pennsylvania, the idol of the people and the man who, next to George Washington, was instrumental in giving the colonies their independence.

On the breaking out of the war of 1812, the construction of ships and the organization of a military force was commenced at Erie, and a block-house built on Garrison Hill, on the site of the old fortification, which protected the entrance to the harbor, leaving Commodore Perry free from intrusion of the British fleet in the offing until his fleet of ten vessels was equipped and ready for action. Commodore Perry's flagship, the Niagara, now lies in "Misery Bay"—Presque Isle Harbor. The naval station was discontinued in 1825.

When the town of Erie was laid out in 1795, the tract of land, containing about 102 acres, now known as Garrison Hill, was set aside for military purposes, and in 1871 the State of Pennsylvania built upon it a marine hospital, which was never used, at a cost of $100,000, in addition to $10,000 donated by the citizens of Erie. This is the structure of which we give a picture. A large wing extends to the rear, arranged for chapel, offices, etc. The grounds overlook the bay, and are finely located for a soldiers' home; and the flat under the brow of the Hill might, in the future, be useful to the Government for a navy yard or military station. The property is very valuable, having a water frontage on the bay, being within the city limits, and having direct railroad communication.

In 1873 the State made an appropriation to erect a monument to General Anthony Wayne, which has just been completed. It is a duplicate of the old blockhouse, and incloses the grave of General Wayne. A battery of four Parrott guns, presented by the State, gives to Garrison Hill the old-time military character, and assures its perpetuity as one of the old landmarks of American civilization and American liberty.

THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO BEACONSFEILD.

ON Monday, January 12th, the Prince of Wales paid a visit to the Earl of Beaconsfield at Hughenden Manor, remaining over night. The entrance of the manor is situated on the north side of the mansion overlooking a beautifully-wooded park, known as the "German Forest," the complete solitude of which is broken only by the screech of the royal peacock. The library is situated on the south side of the mansion, the windows looking on to a very handsome terrace, tastefully ornamented with statuary, which is the favorite walk of Lord Beaconsfield when at Hughenden. Following the example of the Queen, the Prince signalized his visit by planting a tree on the grounds. Respecting the engraving of the drawing-room, it is only needful to call attention to the magnificence of the furniture and decorations, and to note that the portrait on the mantelpiece is that of the late Lady Beaconsfield, while that of the Queen, which hangs on the right, is the one presented by Her Majesty to Lord Beaconsfield on his seventieth birthday. As the party of the Premier has been signally defeated in the late elections, and as the distinguished statesman must now give way to another, this engraving of the Prince's visit possesses more than ordinary interest, and may well be considered a truly historical picture.

THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.

HER Imperial Majesty Marie Alexandrovna, wife of his Imperial Majesty Alexander II., was born August 8th, 1824. Her maiden name was Maximiliana Wilhelmina Augusta Sophia Marie, daughter of Ludwig II., Grand Duke of Hesse, and of the Grand Duchess of Hesse, whose father was heir to the Grand Duchy of Baden. Her marriage to the then Grand Duke Alexander of Russia, son and heir to the late Emperor Nicholas I., took place April 28th, 1841. They have six children, one of whom, the Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna, born October 17th, 1853, married his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, in the early part of 1874.

Her Majesty has been ill for a long time, and during the past Summer she resided at Cannes, France, in the hope of regaining her health. As the symptoms of approaching dissolution increased, she was removed to St. Petersburg in time to participate in the festivities of the late celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Czar's accession. Although in the Winter Palace at the time of the explosion, she heard nothing of it. The strictest orders were given that she should not be informed of the diabolical act. Thinking, however, that she might have heard the noise, the grandchildren and a number of young folks in the palace were profusely sprinkled with perfumed waters, and taken to her chamber. She at once inquired the object of the visit, and remarked the agreeable perfume, never surmising that it had been used to overcome the smell of gunpowder and dynamite that pervaded every apartment and every article of clothing.

As Her Majesty's life is rapidly drawing to a close, we present an engraving of her, taken from a photograph that her family regarded as the best extant.

THE KINGS OF SIAM.

THE first King of Siam, who, during the coming Summer, will visit Europe and the United States, was born on the 21st of September, 1833, and succeeded to the throne October 1st, 1868. His name is Choulalonkorn, though in the books of his palace it is written Phrabat Somdetch Phra Paramendo Mahah Choulalonkorn. He is a spare young man, active and nervous in his movements, with a full, clear, almost coal-black eye. He is said to possess high intelligence, and to be fully equal to the responsibilities of his kingly station. He commands the army, the navy, the treasury, and can dispose as he pleases of the lives and property of his subjects. He administers the government by the advice of a Council of Ministers, at the head of whom is the Regent. He has a sort of rival in the person of the second king, who is entitled to royal honors and lives in a palace, with troops, a court, a harem and a foreign minister, but the real power is lodged with Choulalonkorn. There is also a third king in Siam, who is ordinarily called by the title of British Consul-general, and who, though neither a celestial prince nor even of ordinary tissue, is generally more highly considered than either of the other kings. The name of the second king, who is thirty-nine years of age, is Chnaphya-phra-chroma-un-ra.

When General Grant visited Siam, he invited the first king to visit the United States, and, urged also by the Regent, he will make his contemplated tour with a view of acquainting himself with the customs of Europe and America preparatory to their introduction into his kingdom. He will leave home on April 23d on a Siamese man-of-war for Singapore, thence by steamer to Marseilles, thence to Berlin, where he will arrive about June 5th, and be received by the German Emperor. From Berlin he will go to Brussels and London. On July 1st he will embark at Southampton on an American man-of-war for America. He will be accompanied by a splendid retinue, among whom will be several royal princes, the Minister of War and Foreign Affairs, and a dozen prominent noblemen. He will remain three weeks in America, going South as far as Richmond and West as far as Chicago. He will visit Lisbon late in August, staying at Rome in October, and returning to Siam in December.

Our Export Cattle Trade.

THERE has been a remarkable growth in the American export of cattle and fresh beef to Great Britain. From a venture by dealers in this city and Boston, it has grown in a few years to be a prominent and profitable feature of our export trade. In 1875 the exports of American fresh beef aggregated 4,000,000 pounds; in 1879 the shipments amounted to 84,000,000 pounds—an increase of 80,000,000 pounds in four years. For the first three months of the present year the shipments have been heavy, and indicate an increased business during the coming Summer. Only the best American cattle are shipped. These can be landed at the docks of Liverpool at a cost of $40 per head, and are worth on their arrival an average of $150. The dressed beef can be shipped at a cost of two cents per pound. It is claimed by shippers here that, under anything like favorable circumstances, American beef can be put upon the English markets two cents a pound below what the English producer can possibly afford to sell at.

Parnell on the Home Rule Policy.

A LETTER from Mr. Parnell on the result of the English elections outlines the policy of that section of the Home Rulers to which he belongs. He says: "Our party will scarcely cross to the Ministerial side of the House of Commons, even though that side shall be occupied by Liberals instead of Conservatives. Our presence in the Opposition will be understood as a constant reminder of the slender nature of the tenure by which the Ministers hold their power. We expect that a good land Bill will be introduced and passed immediately. We also anticipate the early passage of a local government measure, as well as a household franchise Bill. The latter would enable us to carry every Irish seat in Parliament, with very few insignificant exceptions. Should the Liberals refuse to accede to our just demands, they can be very promptly reduced to order by a determined stand on the part of our members. The present Irish Party is an immense advance in every respect upon the previous representations, and sufficient men have been returned—of a class that know what they want and are determined to have it—to render it practically impossible that the most powerful Ministry can withstand them."

A Manuscript Psalter has just been discovered at Freiburg, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, which archæological experts assign to the second half of the eighth century. It presents all the characteristics of the later Merovingian and early Carlovingian period, and is presumed to have been originally the property of some monastery on the left bank of the Rhine.

The Smithsonian Institution has received from M. W. Harrington, of Ann Arbor, an announcement of the discovery, by J. M. Schaeberle, of Ann Arbor, on April 6th, 1880, at 12 o'clock P. M., Ann Arbor mean time, of a comet with a tail three minutes long in Th. 20m. right ascension, and 84° 25' north declination, with a daily motion of 30' in right ascension and 45' south.

In regard to the tunnel connection between France and England, it appears that the boring operation undertaken at Sangatte, on the French side, is not the beginning of the shaft from which the tunnel is to be bored, but is simply an experimental bore hole, some 500 or 600 yards above the village, and about 100 yards from the shore. It was found necessary, however, to suspend the work because of the too rapid infiltration of water, rendering essential the construction of a new pump of double the capacity of the first one—that is, one which can raise about 700 gallons a minute. The shaft for the tunnel, when it is begun, is to be sunk in the village itself, and to such a depth as the experiments now making shall show to be requisite. The experimental shaft is to be sunk to a depth of some 260 feet, the diameter of the bore being eleven feet.

OBVERSE OF KENTUCKY LIFE-SAVING MEDAL.

HONORS TO LIFE-SAVING HEROES.

ON Friday, April 23, the Hall of the Kentucky House of Representatives at Frankfort was crowded with fair women and gallant men to witness one of the most interesting scenes ever enacted in the capital. In February last a joint resolution passed the Legislature providing for an appropriation of $150, to be expended by Governor Blackburn in the purchase of three gold medals, to be suitably inscribed and presented to three Kentuckians for heroic daring in saving from drowning in the treacherous waters at the Falls of the Ohio more than fifty persons. The 23d of April was chosen as the day for the presentation ceremony. At 1:30 Governor Blackburn and Lieutenant-Governor Cantrill entered the hall arm-in-arm, followed by the Senators. The House rose to receive them, and the chief officers of the State occupied the Speaker's stand. Then came Mr. W. B. Fleming and General Baker, of Louisville, with the heroes of the Falls—Devan, Tully and Gilooly—in the rear. Mr. Fleming presented the men to the Governor in an impressive speech, and His Excellency addressed them briefly upon the object and honor of the ceremony. The response to the Governor in acceptance of the medals was made by General Alpheus Baker, of Louisville, in most eloquent language, and at its close Governor Blackburn stepped down to the floor and pinned the medals upon the heroes.

The medals are worthy to have been given by the State. They were designed and engraved by John P. Watson, of George Wolfe's establishment, and reflects great credit on his skill. They are all alike. The medallion proper is surmounted by a pair of oars, over which an eagle is perched with wings extended. On one side is the emblem of Kentucky and the words: "L. P. Black born, Governor. Life-saving medal. Act of General Assembly, February 13th, 1880." On the other side is the inscription: "The State of Kentucky to ——, for heroic deeds in saving many lives from drowning in the Ohio River, near Louisville." Beneath the medal is suspended a skiff, with "Kentucky," engraved on the side. Underneath, and attached to this, is an anchor.

William M. Devan was born August 28th, 1848, in Louisville, Ky., where he has lived ever since. John J. Tully was born November 25th, 1853, in Dublin, Ireland. At nine years of age he came to America, lived one year in Cincinnati, and since in Louisville, Ky. At ten years of age he was himself rescued from drowning in the Falls of the Ohio by Charley Kremer, now wharf-master at Louisville, Ky. John F. Gilfoyle was born 18th of September, 1855, in Jackson, Miss., and has been living in Louisville, Ky., for the last fifteen years.

The first of the rescues for which these medals were given was made by Devan and Gilfoyle in February, 1875. Captain John Gilmore, captain and owner of the steamer James Gilmore, with a pilot and deck hand in a skiff, attempting to jump the dam, were swamped and all three thrown into the water. Devan and Gilfoyle jumped both dams in a skiff and saved all three, almost dead with cold. In March, 1875, Devan and Tully rescued two brothers, Raymond, aged respectively eighteen and nine years, whose skiff, caught by the current, was being swept over the dam. Devan and Tully pulled into the current and took them out of their skiff, which instantly went over the dam and was swamped.

Charley Fox and John Yager went over the dam in a skiff, which was swamped, and they, thrown into the breakers, were rescued in a drowning condition by Devan and Gilfoyle.

The next most prominent rescue was of Captain George Fuget, a pilot of thirty-three years' service, from Cincinnati to New Orleans, and Michael McCrone, whose skiff was upset on the dam, and who were rescued and taken out of the water, half-frozen, by Devan and Tully. Their clothing was frozen stiff, and they were almost exhausted. On March 20th, 1879, Captain Paul Boyton, the celebrated swimmer, with Oliver Doud Byron, the actor; James Creelman, correspondent New York Herald; John D. Simpson, editor of Madison Star, Ind.; A. J. Mullin, reporter of same paper, three boatmen, and a skiff containing seven men, making a total of thirteen, were all being swept over the Falls, there being a fog at the time on the river. They were rescued by Devan, Gilfoyle and Tully from the very brink of the dam, at a point over which no skiff can go without being swamped.

In April, 1879, Devan and Tully rescued Albert Philbrick, George Lamming and Charley Quin, whose skiff was being at the time swept over the dam.

In September, 1879, Devan and Gilfoyle saved Miller and Bissenchal, two young men of Jefferson, Ind., who were caught in the rapids and were being hurried on to destruction.

January 29th, 1880, a skiff, bearing Richard Glasgow, Barney Carroll and Nathan Beck, of Jeffersonville, Ind., plunged over the dam, was stove in and capsized. Devan, Tully and John Drezen went to their rescue and brought them out safely. Glasgow had been pulled back by the back-action of the water under the dam seven times, and, being dashed against the rocks, one of his ribs were broken.

In February, 1880, Devan, Tully and Gilfoyle rescued Alexander Errigan, a youth of fourteen, whose skiff was caught in the terrible current below the dam, and was about to be carried over the "back-bone." The skiff was in a sinking condition when his rescuers reached him.

In all fifty-one persons have been rescued by Devan, Tully and Gilfoyle from February, 1875, up to date.

HUBBARD'S RIGHT-HAND RECORD AND NEWSPAPER DIRECTORY. H. P. Hubbard, New Haven, Conn.

The "Right-Hand Record and Ready Reference," a copy of which lies on our table, is a complete guide to all the leading newspapers published, not only on this vast continent, but all over the world and a glance at its pages shows us the condition of journalistic enterprise from Manhattan to the Malay Archipelago. It gives in alphabetical order the towns in each of our States, with population; the papers in each town, with circulation; with a blank space for recording contracts, estimates, offers, acceptances, or any other data. As advertising is the great lever to business, this "Right-Hand Record" should be at every man's right hand.

THE policy upon which the ST. NICHOLAS is conducted is based upon giving patrons the full value and equivalent for their expenditures; and, considering the variety of the comforts and conveniences afforded, the excellence of the table, and accommodating spirit manifested by all, one becomes impressed with the idea that patrons of the old, reliable ST. NICHOLAS receive more than full value for their money.

THE "Pocket Mining Atlas," by Mr. Edwin Bolitho, is a valuable and convenient compendium of information touching our mining interests. It shows the location of the mining districts and mines of the United States; and, while the constant addition of new mines and the frequent changing of old locations prevent the attainment of absolute accuracy, yet, in the main, it is believed the "Atlas" is correct. The greatest care has been taken in its compilation, and, wherever possible, individual companies have been consulted and official drawings form a basis for each part of the work.

Dear Sir—I was treated by four different physicians, without avail, for disease of the liver and uterus. At first my improvement was slow, but I now find myself well after the use of four bottles of each of the medicines. With many, many thanks,

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines, the Louis and the Baden Baden, covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this ore section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

A few remaining shares of the first issue can now be obtained at $2.50 per share.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

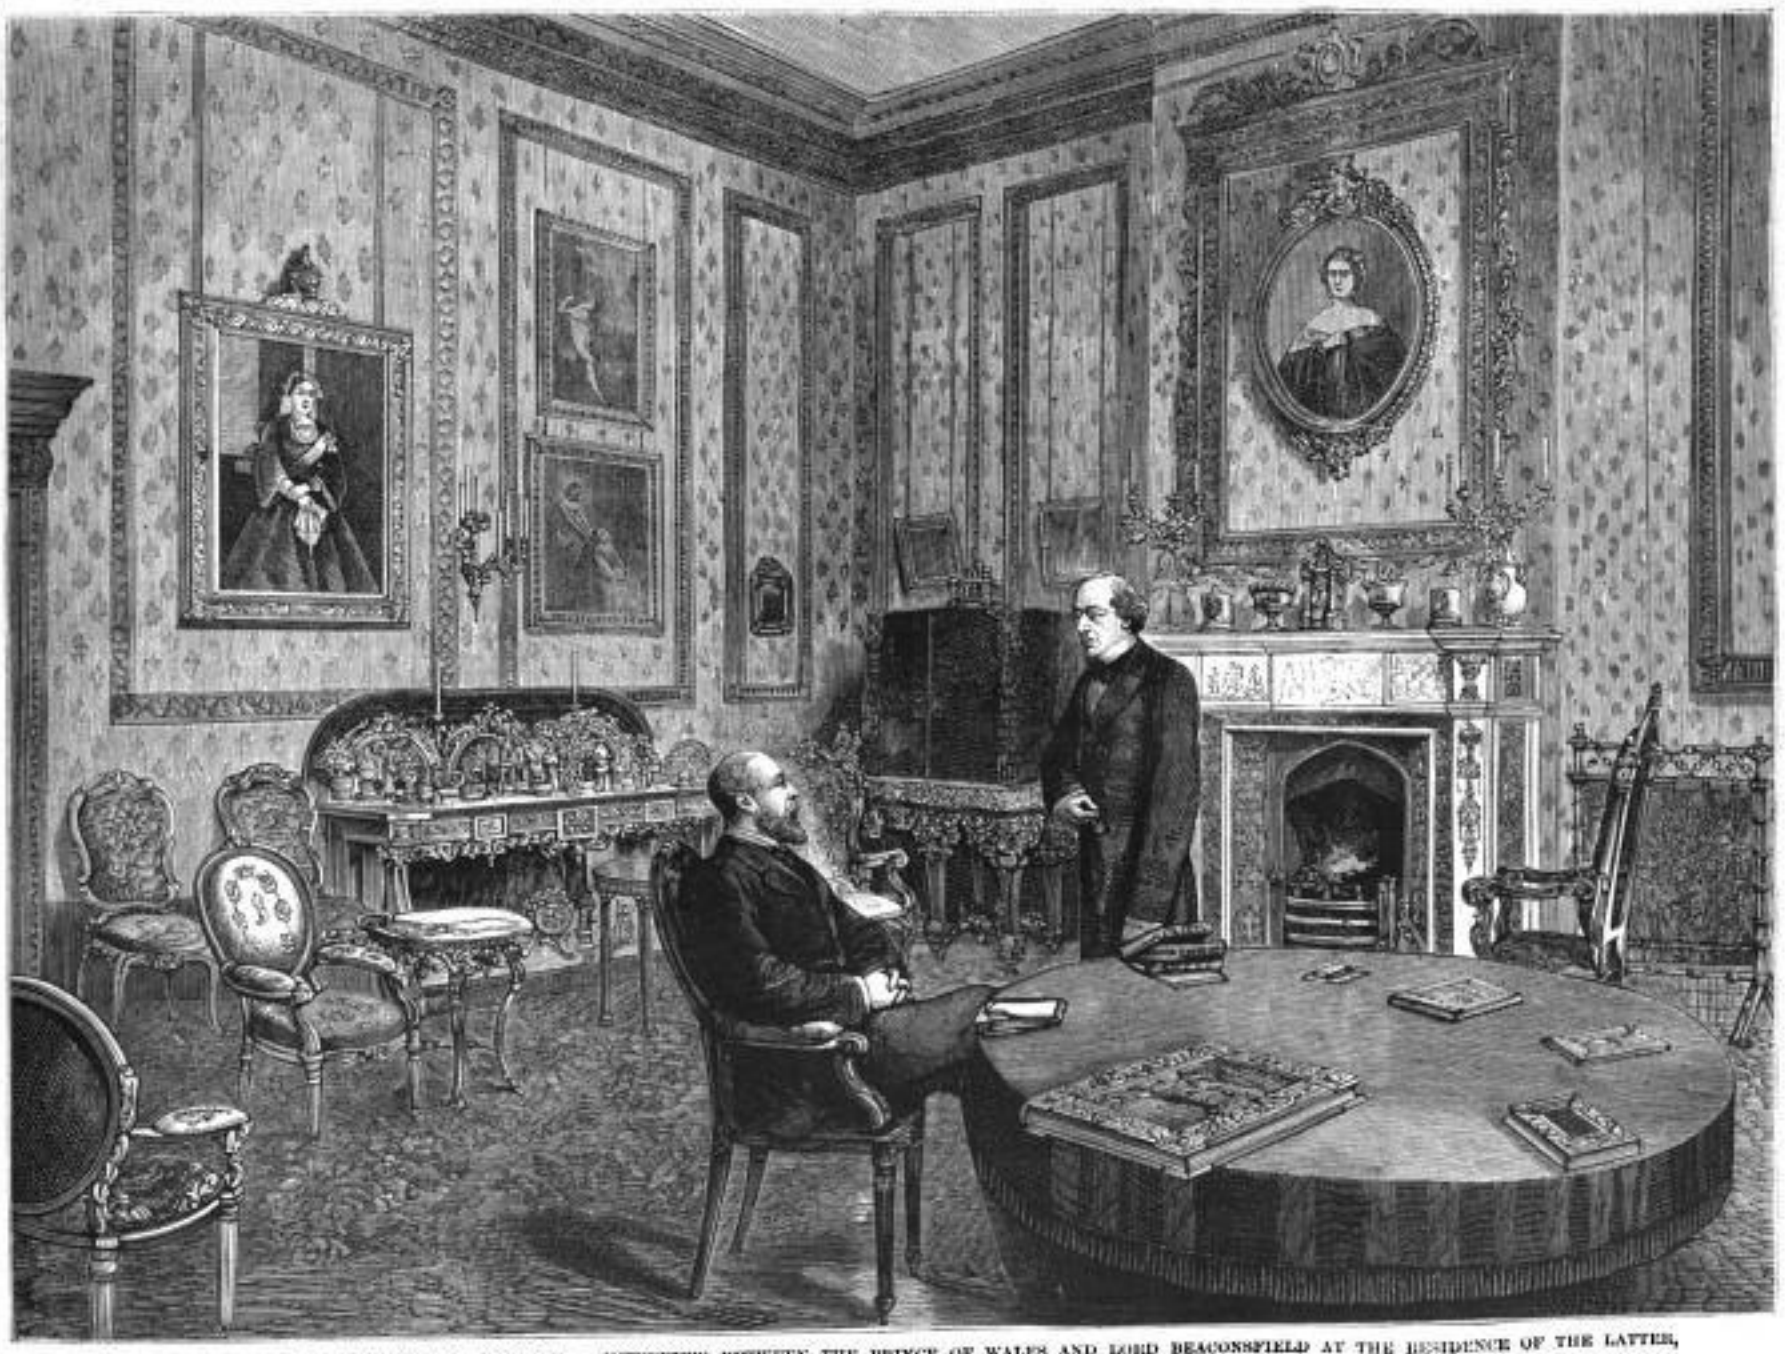
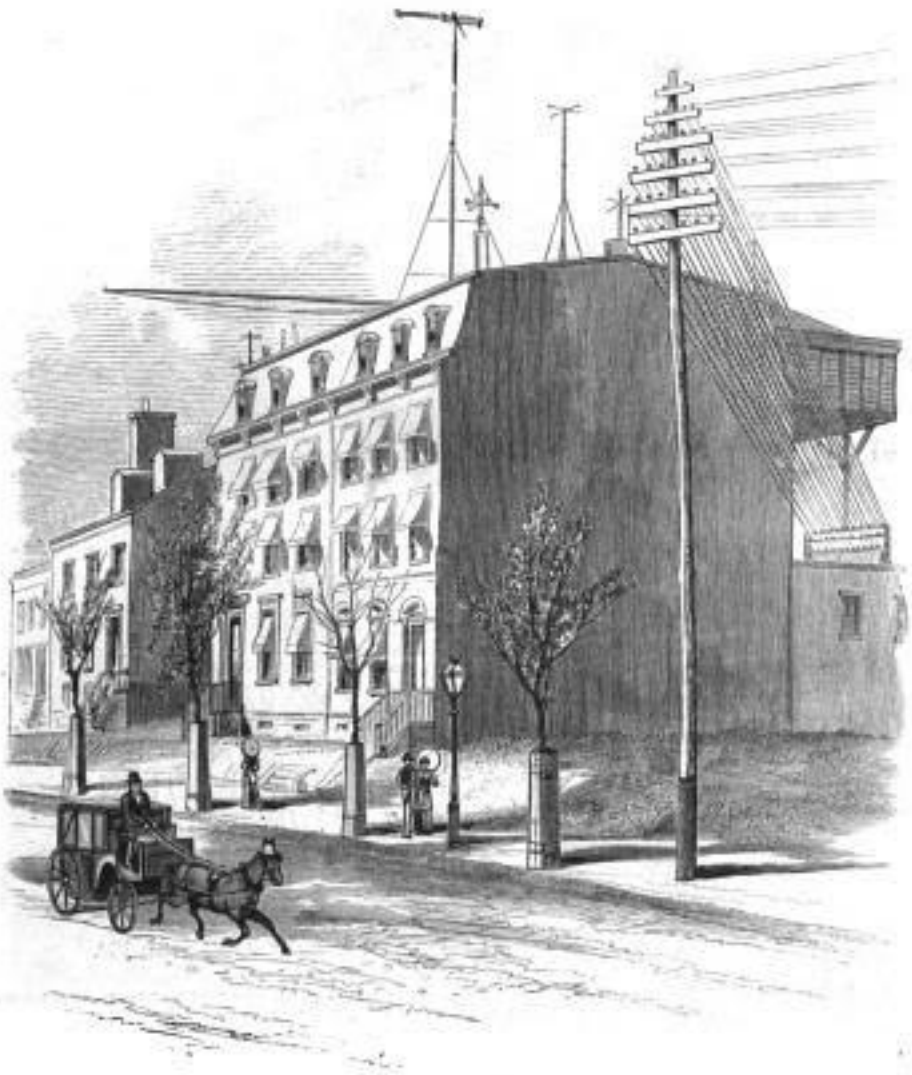
PRINCE GORTSCHAKOFF, CHANCELLOR OF THE RUSSIAN EMPIRE.



MARIE ALEXANDROVNA, EMPRESS OF ALL THE RUSSIAS.—SEE PAGE 139.

PRINCE GORTSCHAKOFF.



ALEXANDER MICHAELOWITSCH, more familiarly known in the world of diplomacy as Prince Gortschakoff, now lying in extremis, is a cousin of the famous defender of Sebastopol. He was born in 1798, and received his education at the celebrated Lyceum of Tsarsko-Selo. His public career was opened at an early age by his appointment as attaché to M. Nesselrode, subsequently Minister of Foreign Affairs, at the Congress of Laybach and Verona. He became secretary to the Russian Ambassador at London in 1824, where, besides applying himself closely to his official duties, he entered upon the study of foreign languages. Six years later he was charge d'affaires to the Court of Tuscany, and was attached for the first time, in 1832, to the Legation at Vienna, where the death of his superior, the Russian Ambassador, gave him great influence. In 1841 he was sent on a mission to Stuttgard, where he negotiated the marriage of the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia with the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg, and received therefor the title of Privy Councilor. During the events of 1848 and 1849, Prince Gortschakoff maintained a dignified neutrality, but it is rumored that in 1850 he exercised some influence in procuring the abdication of the Emperor Ferdinand I. in favor of his nephew, Francis Joseph. The Prince was Ambassador at Vienna during the dispute respecting the Eastern question, and it was at his instance that the Russian Government accepted the four points which formed the basis of the Conference of Paris in 1856. From this post he was recalled to St. Petersburg, in 1857, to replace Nesselrode as Minister for Foreign Affairs. A proclamation of his, very hostile to the Western Powers, during the Sicilian and Neapolitan revolution, excited much attention, and his policy during the Polish insurrection of 1863 has been much commented upon. In 1862 he declined to have anything to do with intervention proposed by France and England in our civil war. The Czar, whose cordial favor he has always enjoyed, made him, in 1862, Vice-Chancellor of the Empire, bestowed upon him the insignia, in diamonds, of the Order of St. Andrew, and other exalted honors. Prince Gortschakoff's knowledge of men and experience in politics are immense, and his measures have met with rare success. The Prince has cool intellect, vast experience, resolute will, singular dexterity and dissimulation, perfect unscrupulousness, and then, not a Parliament of Freemen, but an acquiescent nominal master, and the whole blind force of obedient Russia, at his back. One of his latest triumphs was that of October, 1870, when the Treaty of Paris was in large measure annulled in favor of Russia, and the results of the Crimean War were tamely abandoned at the desire of the old encroaching power.

Prince Gortschakoff is one of the most agreeable men in Russia. Those who like him least acknowledge that, but few who have been brought much into contact with him have failed to like him as a man; and those who appreciate him best are the men who have served constantly under his orders. He has none of the bluff petulancy of Bismarck, nor of the smirking readiness of retort which enables Count Andrassy to manage the Austro-Hungarian Parliaments. He talks slowly, writes grandiloquently, and gives high-minded reasons for everything he advises or does. Persons who might have expected him to explain some tortuous piece of policy on cynical grounds are staggered by his semblance of perfect good faith and by the reassuring promises which he makes in a tone of stately gentleness, to which his venerable appearance gives the stamp of wisdom and truth. His strength is patience; his talent lies in seizing opportunities the moment they arrive; and those opportunities come through the simplicity of foreigners who trust him.

EXTERIOR VIEW OF THE BUILDING.

A READING OF THE BAROMETER.

THE U. S. METEOROLOGICAL SERVICE.

IF ever building gave sign of the special uses to which it is devoted, that edifice is the house, or two houses rolled into one, in the City of Washington in which the secrets of the elements are reluctantly forced from them by the subtle hand of science; their action forestalled; and much of their destructive efforts, by the precautions taken to anticipate them, paralyzed, foiled and baffled. A glance at the roof of the Meteorological Department strikes awe and bewilderment into the passer-by. The sky is crossed and recrossed, as a schoolgirl's first love-letter, by electric wires—wires "giving away" the north, south, east and west winds, as they crouch in far-distant corners of the world ere leaping upon the warpath. The roof actually bristles with meteorological insignia—cups and balls, and flags and mirrors, and weather-cocks, and poles with curiously-devised instruments, menacing the four points of the compass, and a very grove of electric wires. The roofs of the neighboring dwellings are compelled to pay tribute, till they resemble an elevated Holland, so rich are they in miniature windmills of every sort, shape, size and description, each set of cups racing till it makes one giddy to gaze at them. How courageously and unerringly those little cups do their duty, standing to their posts until blown away, as was the case last August during the cyclone, when eleven hundred miles of wind was registered in one day! The Signal Service, as now organized, consists of 18 commissioned officers, 150 sergeants, 30 corporals and 200 privates. This force has the management of 300 stations, extending from the Dominion of Canada to the Rio Grande, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. Of these stations, 143 take meteorological observations; 24 are known as sunset stations, 11 as display stations, 24 as special river stations, 12 as commercial stations, and 3 as printing stations. Telegraphic and mail reports are also received from four stations in the West Indies, and 12 in Canada.

Passing through a map-decorated hall, and ascending to the topmost story, I found myself in the Instrument-room, a long apartment divided by an arch, and furnished with glass-cases and clocks, and dials and needles, and barometers and thermometers, and a hundred other ometers.

The very atmosphere breathed of brain-softening calculations, while the grim silence was appalling. I was confronted by an anemograph, which registers the wind continually; by a rain-gauge worked by electricity, and so delicate in its operations that it recorded the 1-400th of an inch; by barometers registering the pressure of the air, showing a change of pressure equal to 1-4000th of an inch of mercury; by a barometer registering its changes by electricity, and enabling a barometer in San Francisco to register in New York; by a thermometer also worked by electricity, giving a continuous registration, and showing all the fluctuations of the temperature of the air; by Father Secci's meteoro-graph, and by Dr. Robinson's anemometer, which is gradually displacing all others on account of its simplicity and accuracy. Here I learned that the cup travels at one-third the velocity of the wind, and that 500 revolutions of a cup registers a mile of wind, that upper currents of air carry ashes sent up by volcanoes 15,000 miles, bearing them aloft for so long as six weeks at a time. In the room is a glass case, showing in model the different clouds in wool, their relative altitudes, and the manner in which they are formed, also the formation of fogs on the banks of Newfoundland.

Quitting the Instrument-room, where one of the employés was earnestly engaged in hunting up an error of a thousandth part of a second in a calculation that would have afforded ecstasies of delight to Mr. Babbage, I entered the Photograph-room. This apartment, silent as the tomb, is used for photographing the action of the barometer, and, if I may so put it, taking likenesses of the weather. I will not attempt to describe the process, save that certain shadows upon oblong strips of prepared paper denote certain meteorological disturbances even several hundred miles away.

At stations furnishing telegraphic reports, the men are required to forward tri-daily, on each day, the results of observations made at three fixed hours, and embracing in each case the readings of the barometer, the thermometer, the velocity and direction of the wind, the rain-gauge, the relative humidity, the character, quantity and movement of upper and lower clouds, and the condition of the weather. These observations are taken at such hours at the different stations as to secure absolute simultaneity—allowance being made for the differences between the fixed times, 7:35 A. M., 4:35 P. M. and 11 P. M., and the local time at the different stations. At the Meteorological Congress, held at Rome last year, arrangements were made for simultaneous observations all over the world at 6 P. M., Washington time. The chiefs of the Meteorological Departments on the globe send in reports of observations by mail twice a month. Two thousand reports come in daily. Two hundred reports are handled in thirty-five minutes. All navies, since November last, take a simultaneous observation on ship board. These floating stations will help the storms on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Three other observations are taken respectively at 7 A. M., 2 P. M., and 9 P. M., local time, and a seventh and special observation is taken and recorded at noon each day. When such instrumental changes are noted at this observation as to cause anxiety, the fact is at once telegraphed to the central office at Washington. An eighth observation is taken at the exact hour of sunset at each station. So perfect is the description, and so trustworthy the work of the force, that the reports from the stations, covering the whole expanse of the continent, are frequently concentrated at the central office at Washington in the space of forty minutes.

Passing through Instrument-shelter, where an officer was busily noting the registration of a barometer, so sensitive that the warmth of his body affected it, the Report-room, the Study-room and the Fact-room, I again reached the hall, where I found an employé engaged in sticking tiny arrows into allotted places on an elaborate map, each arrow indicating the course of the wind in that particular section of the continent. Eight charts, exhibiting the data of the observation reports as to the barometric pressure, relative humidities, cloud conditions, dew-point variations, etc., are draughted and examined before, and are essential to, each official announcement. The statements designed for publication, issued thrice daily, are telegraphed at the moment of their issue to the principal cities, and reach fully one-third of the population of the entire country.

"What a boon to those who go down to the sea in ships, and those who make pilgrimage by land," I exclaimed, as I quitted the department, over which General Meyer presides with such pre-eminent ability, aided by Captain Howgate, his able and popular first lieutenant.

HON. BEN. LE FEVRE, OF OHIO.

HON. BENJAMIN LE FEVRE, the well-known and popular Member of Congress from the Fifth Ohio District, was born in Shelby County, in that State, in 1838, was educated at the Miami University, studied law, but became a farmer. In 1861 he entered the Union army as a private soldier and served until the close of the war. In 1865 he was elected to the Legislature from Shelby County, and during his two years' term was his party's nominee for Secretary of State, and before its close, in 1867, was appointed United States Consul at Nuremberg, Germany. In 1878 he was elected to Congress, and took his seat at the extra session in March, 1879. He is a member of the Committee on Agriculture.

This brief summary gives the principal events in the life of a public man of genial qualities, fine ability and large personal acquaintance. One who knows him well says of him: "Always a firm and active Democrat, eloquent and earnest in his political speeches, and constant and reliable in his notes on public questions, he has also gathered to him a host of friends irrespective of party, always ready to serve him, and giving him, therefore, an influence extending throughout the country. Of fine personal appearance, in the prime of life, easy of access and ready to help those who need his assistance, industrious and energetic, capable of any amount of physical or mental exertion, attending to his heavy correspondence and the many interests of his constituents with a promptitude and zeal excelled by no member, he is esteemed by his fellows and his fellow-citizens as a Congressman worthy of commendation and praise."

In Congress, Mr. Le Fevre has, as his chosen calling naturally inclined him, devoted himself largely to agricultural questions. Placed on the Committee on Agriculture, he has zealously co-operated with the Chairman and his fellow members in endeavoring to make the work of the committee not nominal but practical and efficient. He introduced a resolution for the investigation of the Agricultural Department, and pressed it with the view of enlarging the scope and increasing the usefulness and dignity of the same. He has rendered important services by advocating his Bill for preventing the spread of contagious diseases among domesticated animals—a subject upon which the farmers of the country are demanding that there shall be national legislation. But while thus interesting himself fully in agricultural subjects, he has not neglected other interests. He has introduced a Bill for the equalization of soldiers' bounties; and he labors to give full attention to all important questions before Congress, and, by his influence and vote, to shape and enact wise legislation.

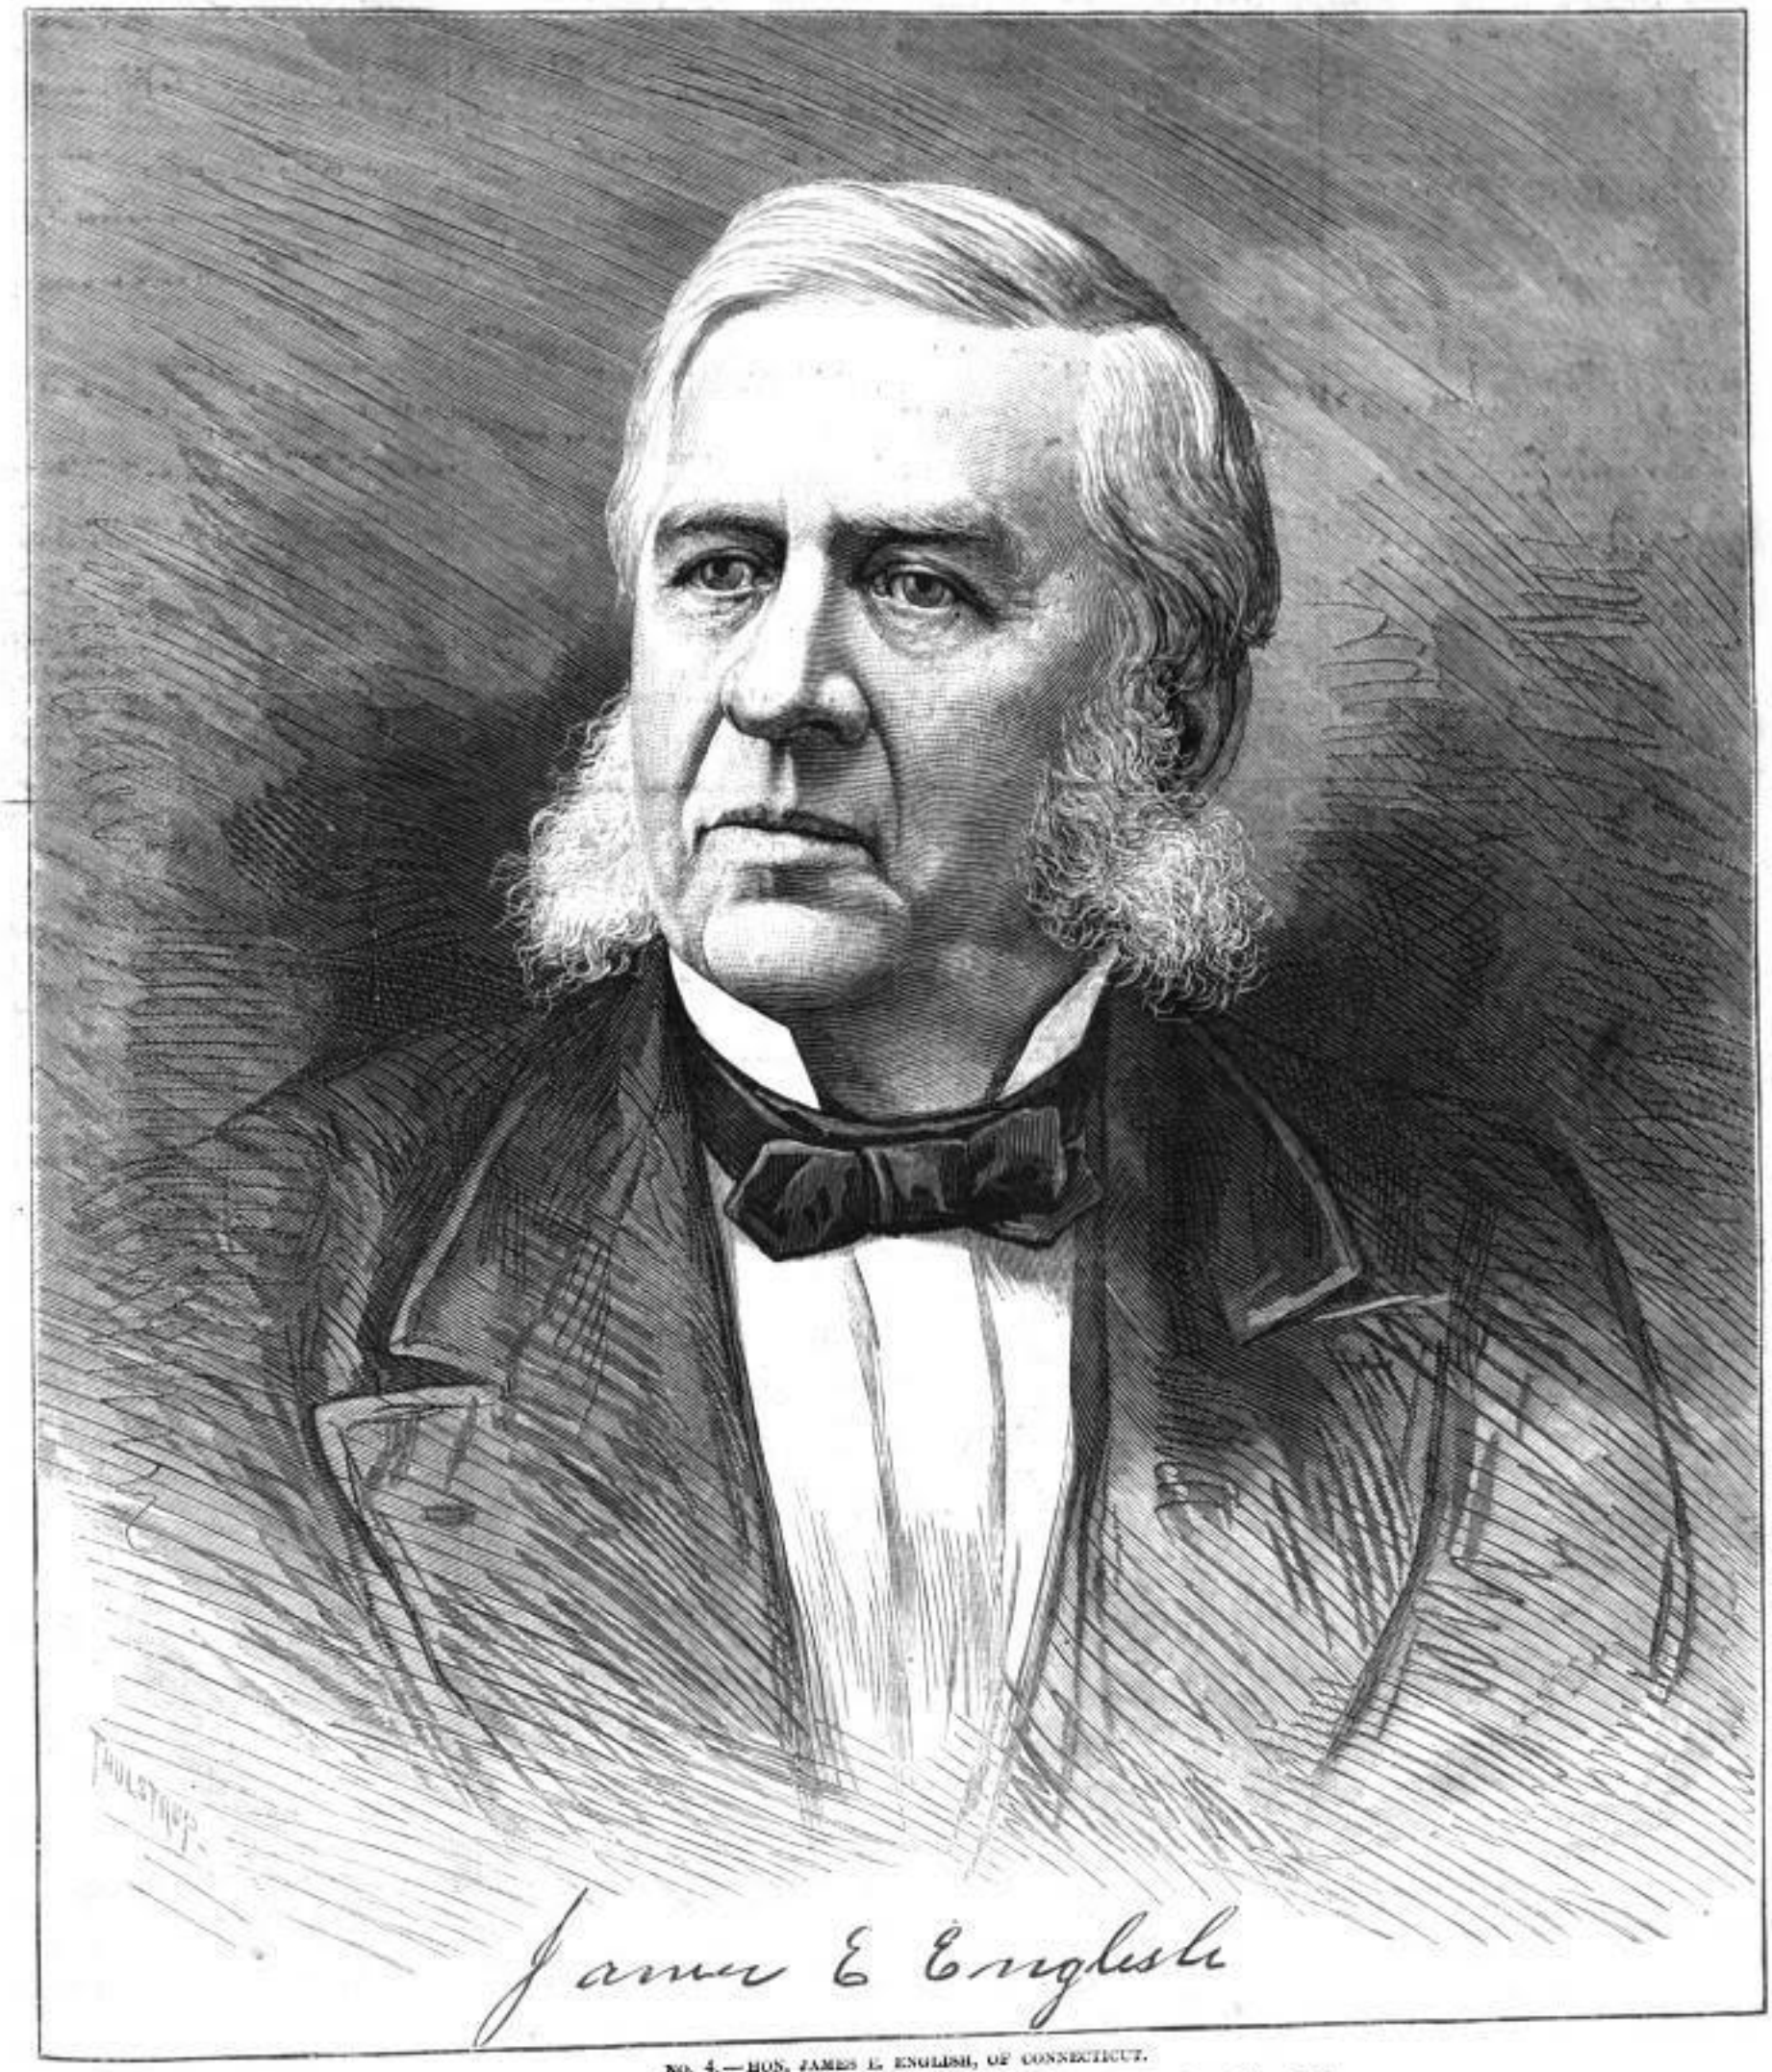
HON. BENJAMIN LE FEVRE, MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM THE FIFTH OHIO DISTRICT.

THE BISHOP POTTER MEMORIAL.

THE testimonial to Bishop Potter, who, on November last, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his bishopric of this diocese, and whose many friends and admirers marked the occasion by the presentation of a memorial casket, was last week on exhibition at the establishment of Messrs. Tiffany & Co., by whom it was manufactured, and elicited many expressions of admiration. It is a coffer of silver with enrichments of gold, steel and damaskeening, and contains a parchment scroll upon which is engraved the congratulatory address presented by Mr. Jay on the anniversary occasion. The proportions are those of the Ark of the Covenant, the measurements being divided by three. It is fifteen inches long, nine inches wide and nine inches high to the top of the pointed, sloping, Gothic lid, which is surmounted by a massive and richly-sculptured Celtic cross of solid gold. Underneath the cross is a crozier on one side and a group of lilies on the other, symbolical of the Bishop's office and purity. On the sloping front side is an open Bible resting on boughs of olive leaves, and above is the form of a dove spreading its wings over the pages. On either side of the Bible are tongues of fire. The surface of the casket is covered with branches of the vine twined in circular forms, which contain alternately the English rose and the thistle. Bunches of grapes, indicative of the growth and good work of the Church under the Bishop, hang in the interstices. At the centre of each of the four sides of the lower edge of the lid is a symbol of one of the four Evangelists—Matthew, the Man; Mark, the Lion; Luke, the Ox, and John, the Eagle—which are boldly carved from silver. On each of the main sides of the lid are trefoil medallions inlaid with blackened steel, and bearing illustrations in gold damaskeening of the sacraments—Baptism, Confirmation, Communion and Consecration. The sides of the chest are adorned with medallions commemorative of the work of the Church in this country. The centre of the front bears a profile in bas-relief, of solid gold, of Bishop Potter, and on the right, in a sunken round panel, is an admirably delineated representation of the consecration by the Archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth Palace Chapel, of Bishops Provost and White, the first two bishops who came to America. The picture in the left front panel represents the interior of Christ Church, Philadelphia, and the adoption of the American Prayer-book in 1789. The centre of the reverse side of the chest bears the Bishop's seal in relief, and at the right of this, in a panel corresponding to that on the front, Old Trinity Church, the scene of the first consecration of a bishop in America, and on the left the interior of St. John's Chapel in Varick Street, with the Bishop addressing a congregation. The rose and the arbutus are brought into requisition in forming the characteristic Gothic border which extends along the top from end to end. At the base of the casket is a band of blackened steel damaskeened with letters of gold of ecclesiastical character, which extends completely around the base and forms the following inscription: "To the Right Reverend Horatio Potter, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., Bishop of New York, from his diocese, with love and gratitude for twenty-five years of faithful and fruitful service." The casket is said by Messrs. Tiffany & Co. to be one of the richest and mostly costly pieces of work ever done in this country.

FACE OF THE CASKET PRESENTED TO THE RT. REV. BISHOP HORATIO POTTER, ON THE OCCASION OF THE TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF HIS ORDINATION AS BISHOP.

THE "CROQUET-PLAYER," BY TURINI.



THE study of art possesses this great and peculiar charm, that it is absolutely unconnected with the struggles and contests of ordinary life. By private interests, by political questions, men are deeply divided and set at variance; but beyond and above all such party strifes, they are attracted and united by a taste for the beautiful in art. Dr. Johnson states that "the natural progress of the works of men is from rudeness to convenience, from convenience to elegance, and from elegance to nicety." The "nicety" by which the great lexicographer summed up that delicacy of tone and perfection of finish can never be so absolutely realized save by the chisel of the sculptor. From Phidias to Canova the ad unguem has been the result of a subtly-linked sympathy with nature—a sympathy that manifests itself in the glorious works of art that would seem to woo the amorous yearnings of a Pygmalion to kiss them into life. Among the disciples "who sit at the feet of art" is Signor Turini of this city, whose statue of the "Croquet Player" we illustrate. The subject is essentially a graceful one, and the sculptor has treated it in all grace. The tendency of modern sculpture is realistic, and what more charming bit of realism than a pretty Nineteenth Century girl wielding her merciless croquet-mallet? The power, whether of sculptor, painter or poet, to describe rightly what he calls "an ideal thing," depends upon its being to him not an ideal, but a real thing. "No man," quoth Ruskin, "ever did or ever will work well but either from actual sight, or sight of faith." Signor Turini has evidently worked from actual sight, and has given us the ideal croquet-player, of course.

METHODS OF PERSONAL POLITICS.

JAMES MADISON was nominated for the Presidency of the United States by a Congressional caucus, in accordance with the political usages of that early day in our history. He was at the time Secretary of State under President Jefferson, and Mr. Gallatin, his colleague in the Cabinet, informs us that during the entire period of Mr. Madison's candidature the fact of his candidature was never referred to, either by himself or by any one of his official associates in the Administration. To do so would have been esteemed, under the sense of honor and duty which then obtained, a violation of the delicacy and reserve which ought to be observed towards a candidate for that high office, and which, above all, ought to be observed by the candidate himself. After the election of 1808 was over, and when it was known that Mr. Madison was chosen, he remarked to Mr. Gallatin that he could now refer, without impropriety, to what had become a public event, and that it was his wish that Mr. Gallatin should retain under his Administration the same responsible post he had filled with so much credit and usefulness under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson.

It was the surviving influence of this high and delicate sense of public honor which caused William J. Lowndes, of South Carolina, to utter the memorable sentiment, when asked to accept a nomination for the Presidency of the United States, that it was an office "which should neither be sought nor declined," as it was only by the observance of this rule that the people would be left perfectly free to command the services of the Chief Magistrature whom they preferred above all others.

It is in the presence of such precedents that we can measure the great defection which has come in modern times to mark the methods of many who now aspire to fill the Presidential chair. The office is no longer left to come unsought to the man deemed by his fellow-citizens to be most worthy of it, but is made the direct object of intrigue, finesse and management, where it is not made the direct object of open and persistent solicitation. And after a nomination had been secured, we saw one of the candidates at the last Presidential election accused of conducting his own canvass through the intervention of a "Literary Bureau," which proved, in the end, a source of weakness rather than a source of strength.

The miseries and the abominations of this system confront us on every hand. In order to measure its evils, we are not required to take the estimate which each party places upon them as practiced by its opponents, for this estimate might be colored by political prejudice. It is only necessary to open the journals of both parties and to read in them the criticism and objurgation which they pronounce upon these methods as practiced by rival factions within their own political organizations. It is openly charged by Republican journals that the candidature of ex-President Grant for the third term is being forced upon the Republican Party by a cabal of "machine politicians," who use the great name and eminent military services of that chieftain as a stalking-horse behind which to mask their selfish designs and ambitious aspirations. It is openly charged by Republican journals of the Third Term persuasion, that the "Literary Bureau" which is managing the preliminary canvass of Mr. Blaine at Washington does not scruple to disparage the claims of his rivals for the Republican nomination while asserting for him a pre-eminent place in the affections of the Republican masses. And this same class of Republican journals is still louder in its denunciation of Mr. Secretary Sherman, who, they charge, is using his influence and patronage as a Government officer to procure the choice of delegates favorable to his own nomination at Chicago.

And in the Democratic Party, if this spirit of crimination and recrimination is not so diffusive, it is more vehement. Against the candidature of Mr. Tilden it has taken the shape of open and flagrant revolt on the part of a faction in the Democracy of New York. With the justice of the accusations brought against this distinguished citizen on the score of the methods by which he is alleged to have once sought, or to be still seeking, the Presidency, we have nothing now to do, any more than with the justice of the charges brought against Messrs. Grant, Blaine and Sherman. It is with the system which exposes these eminent men to the shafts of political detraction in their own ranks that we make our quarrel. It is the system of self-sought and self-managed candidatures, and the still more odious system of candidature sought and managed through a junta of politicians that is bringing our whole electoral machinery into popular suspicion and disrepute.

And we believe that this system will prove more of a bane than a blessing to the beneficiaries who hoped to profit by it. Even during the canvass attendant on the last Presidential election it came to be suspected by the shrewd friends of Mr. Tilden that the young men who administered his "Literary Bureau" were an incumbrance on the flanks of the Democracy, and after the election was over no man became more fully persuaded of the fact than Mr. Tilden himself, when he was called to defend his personal honor from imputations cast upon it by reason of his supposed complicity with men assuming to be in his confidence, but some of whose transactions he was swift to disavow as soon as they came to the light of public scrutiny.

After this experience of "Literary Bureaus," as the manufacturers of public sentiment, we had supposed that the device would not be deemed an estimable one in the eyes of shrewd and discerning politicians, who are anxious to serve their country in the Presidential office. And after the disfavor brought upon the old Federal Party by the license of the "Essex Junta" in Massachusetts, and after the confusion introduced in the counsels of the New York Democracy by the domination of the "Albany Regency," it was to have been hoped that the political methods by which States like Pennsylvania and New York have been bound to the fortunes of family dynasties and of managing politicians would not be applied to the highest office in the people's gift on the broad arena of a Presidential election. This system is an evil one, and, like all evil systems, contains within its own bosom the self-destroying forces of an avenging Nemesis. That avenging Nemesis may be seen in the record of the many nominating conventions which have passed by the too eager aspirants to lay their honors at the feet of some less conspicuous candidate, who had at least this merit—he did not seek the nomination.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

THE decision of the United States Senate not to pay over the unappropriated balance of the Geneva Award to the Marine Insurance Companies will, we judge, be acquiesced in by the public as substantially just, although in law and precedent the companies had a very strong case. As a matter of fact, these institutions made a great deal of money during the war, owing to the fact that they largely increased their charges for risks because of the presence of rebel privateers on the ocean. They taxed the commerce of the country to pay for their losses, and in equity they cannot be said to have a valid claim for further compensation from the Government of the United States.

It must be borne in mind, however, that the nation does not appear to advantage in dealing with those who have disputed claims against it. Our Government, and indeed all Governments, contest to the bitter end tens of thousands of perfectly valid claims. The whole machinery of the Government is employed to harass and wear out the poor and honest claimant. The Court of Claims was organized, not to pay, but to avoid the payment of, the irregular bills presented for settlement. Of course there is a great deal of questionable legislation by Congress to put the public money into private hands, and corruption is by no means unknown in all the departments of the state; but it is the rich and powerful who secure these favors, and not the poor and honest creditors of the Government. The indemnity exacted by Andrew Jackson from the Government of Louis Philippe of France has never been paid over to the American claimants on whose behalf the Bill was rendered and paid. The close of the civil war found the Government honestly indebted for large sums of money to tens of thousands of poor claimants in the Border States and elsewhere. These are not and never will be paid. It is really a sign of public virtue when Congress refuses to consider the claims of these wealthy Marine Insurance Companies, for heretofore it was just such creditors who have been most favored.

What, then, should be done with the money? The award covered such direct claims as could be proven before a competent court. Under the law of 1874 certain moneys were paid out to such private citizens as could prove loss. It is the surplus still left which the Insurance Companies think ought to be awarded to them. This claim has been disallowed, and we presume the fund will be charged to the credit of the Government as was the French indemnity, and made a part of the reserves of the National Treasury to pay the nation's debts when they become due.

OUR DEFENSE AGAINST GREENBACKERS.

THE advocacy of the greenback is a phenomenal incident in our political history. That the legal-tender device should not only find defenders, but find them in sufficient numbers to drive both the great political parties of the country from their consistency, is a subject for reflection. Before the Rebellion all parties would have united to denounce the measure as unconstitutional, a flagrant violation of both the letter and spirit of our organic law. And why have the people so far forgotten their theories on the functions of civil government that they are willing to see the treasury converted into the equivalent of a grand national bank of issue, and all the Congressmen made directors? Something of the marvel may be charged to the growth of socialistic ideas on the one hand, and to the instinct of centralization and paternalism in government, fostered by our civil war, on the other; but both these absurdities combined are not sufficient to account for the very radical change which the country has witnessed. We must look elsewhere if we wish to find the solution of the problem.

The memory of the results of wild-cat banking is the main cause of all this mischief. It is the conviction that the Government is safer than banking corporations which induces men to resign their democracy, and to become almost imperialists in their willingness to see the image and superscription of Cæsar printed on their paper currency. The history of banking is a record of disastrous failures, of criminal mismanagement and wrecked fortunes; and so long as banks are conducted on a system which is felt to be unreliable and subject to the vicissitudes of trade, their paper will be looked upon with less favor than legal-tender notes. It is not fortunate for the banks that this circumstance exists, and, in both a political and financial sense, it is disastrous for the country; but it exists, nevertheless, and, for the present, many men will shudder at the proposition that to banking institutions properly belongs the duty of furnishing a paper currency.

But the situation may be very easily changed. It is not at all necessary that our banks should be looked upon with so much distrust, nor that their securities should be worth less than those of the Government. The very fact that they are financial institutions and, when properly conducted, beyond the reach of political chicane and those civil convulsions which, in a country like ours, might at some time lead to revolution and repudiation, should render them the safest possible depository for property. It is only necessary that they shall be so secured that they may be beyond the reach of possible failure, and when that point is gained a banknote will be better than a Treasury note for any purpose of either traffic or thrift.

But there is only one means of attaining to this most desirable millennium in finance. The public-spirited action by which the banks of this city were enabled to partially weather the panic of 1873 furnishes a hint upon the method; and the promise of temporary co-operation, made for that period, must be amplified into an amendment to their organic system. General banking reserves, sufficient in amount to protect stockholders, depositors and bill-holders against incompetent or dishonest management on the part of the officers of isolated banks, must be everywhere instituted. The banks of the entire country must be made to stand or fall together, and, when they have so provided for the general security, the failure of any single bank will become an impossibility. This is a very proper subject for Congressional action in the form of an amendment to the general banking law. This point secured, the itching for greenbacks would soon subside in the palms of the most inveterate greenbacker at large.

While the present loose and uncertain theories of banking obtain, greenbackism will continue, a perpetual menace of inflation and an enemy to everything sound in our system of restricted government. It will continue because legal tender notes are felt to be a sort of protection against worthless currency. Yet, during the whole history of the greenback experiment, these notes have been in no sense a remedy for any evil with which the financial world has been afflicted. They did not aid in preventing the recent panic, nor mitigate, in the slightest measure, the degree of penalty attached to unsound business methods. If anything, they rather aggravated our difficulties, for they filled the air with unsound theories and false speculations. The sooner we relegate to the institutions to which it properly belongs the exclusive issue of paper currency the better for the country; but, in the meantime, the banking system should be strengthened.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

SURELY some one should be punished for the unnecessary loss of life at the Madison Square Garden during the progress of the Hahnemann Fair. An eccentric Mandarin in one of the Chinese provinces made and enforced a law that when any avoidable calamity occurred some one should be punished. Innocent or guilty, a victim had to be found to propitiate the wrath of the angry community. Fortunately, in this case there is no need of such unreasoning severity. The responsibility attaches to the builder of the defective wall and to the Building Department of the City Government. There is no need of an unsafe building or an unsound wall within the limits of our city. If New York was subject to earthquakes it would be a different matter, but every such disaster is because of the criminal neglect of known physical laws.

It is a real calamity when an accident like this occurs in a great building devoted to the amusement and instruction of the public. A vast public garden like this at Madison Square is a direct benefit to the community. It is useful for great fairs, large public gatherings, athletic sports, balls like that of the Arion Society and the like; but the fact that it is frequented by great throngs of people ought to have insured its perfect safety for all time. From the beginning of civilized history, especial care has been taken by even the most despotic Governments in the construction of arenas intended to accommodate multitudes of sight-seers. Witness, for instance, the Roman Colisseum. As yet we are far behind other nations in this paternal care for the safety of the people. Our laws ought to clothe the Mayor with authority to promptly dismiss any head of department who permitted a structure liable to an accident like this to be used for public gatherings.

THE NEW YORK DEMOCRACY.

MR. TILDEN scored a decisive victory in the Democratic State Convention at Syracuse last week. The Tammany managers, who had so vigorously proclaimed their ability to control the Convention and annihilate Mr. Tilden's pretensions, proved to be utterly powerless, and were tomahawked by the regulars with scarcely a show of effort. Indeed, the Tammanyites were treated throughout with deliberate contempt. Their proposition for a conference as to the best means of promoting harmony in the party elicited nothing but derision, and it was apparent from first to last that Mr. Tilden's friends had determined to make no compromise with Mr. Kelly and his followers, no matter what might be the consequences of such a course. The result of the contest, in every way so favorable to Mr. Tilden, will, no doubt, largely strengthen him before the Cincinnati Convention, but whether, in the event of his nomination, he would be able to carry New York, with the indignant Tammany schemes against him, may perhaps admit of doubt. It is one thing to manipulate a convention, and entirely another thing to control tens of thousands of restless and discontented voters. The World, which speaks for a large conservative element in the Democratic Party, intimates plainly that unless the National Convention shall "give the divided Democracy of New York a candidate upon whom they can unite," the Republican nominee will be elected. This may be saying too much, but the existing situation certainly has elements of danger for the party, and Mr. Tilden's personal victory may yet prove to have been purchased at too great a cost to the Democracy of the country.

POLITICAL PARTIES ON TRIAL.

THE lessons taught by the State elections last year have not been altogether without effect upon the leaders of the Democratic Party. They have modified the demagogic policy pursued at the extra session of Congress, and they have not as yet ventured, except as to the Army Bill, to revive the factitious issues through which they suffered defeat. Should they, taking advantage of their strength in Congress, have the wisdom to pass such measures as will promise permanent peace and continued prosperity to the country, the Republicans will be greatly perplexed to keep the Government out of their hands. In point of fact, it is the Republicans, and not the Democrats, who are actually on trial at the bar of public opinion. The laws which are being executed were passed by them. They hold the Presidency and all the executive offices. They control the entire civil service, and, with the exception of vacancies to occur, cannot be interfered with by their opponents. The unsatisfactory conduct of the Republicans when holding supreme control of public affairs led the country to give the Democrats a prominent, although not a decisive, share in the Government. Whether the Republicans will be given a new lease of power, or whether the Democrats will be permitted to elect the next House and secure the Presidency, greatly depends upon how the former shape their conduct in advance of the elections. They can scarcely hope to attain success through a masterly inactivity, or by the mere avoidance of party blunders. They must go forward and give the country substantial evidence of their capacity and their intention to carry the principles they profess to their logical conclusion. "They must," as a contemporary remarks, "show the people that they are ready to make the currency permanent and really as sound as it is in appearance for the time being. They must show that they are ready to treat the Southern question on the high plane of true nationality, enforcing temperately, but firmly, the laws which protect equal rights in that section, and eschewing all appearance of seeking partisan advantages from sectional differences." They must, too, meet squarely and intelligently the question of tariff reform, now become of urgent importance. Then, as to the civil service, should their Representatives in Congress bring forward and sustain by their united efforts a proposition to appropriate funds to carry out, as designated by the President, the reforms necessary to that service, the preponderance of success might be secured in their favor. Mere manœuvring to gain a strategic position will help neither party. That one having the high moral courage to give practical evidence of an intent to promote economical government—a government looking to the welfare of the whole country—will be rewarded by a people caring much less for the dogmas of party than for the general welfare.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

LORD BEACONSFIELD having sent in his resignation, it was immediately accepted by Queen Victoria. Speculation was rife as to who would be the future Premier, the choice lying between Lord Hartington, Mr. Gladstone and Earl Granville. As it is almost imperative that a Liberal Premier in England should be in the House of Commons, the more popular branch of Parliament, the choice was really narrowed down to Gladstone or Lord Hartington. It is well known that Queen Victoria has a decided prejudice against the former statesmen, and although he is, beyond all gainsay, the de facto head of the Liberal Party in England, yet his resignation, when the Conservatives came into power seven years ago, of the leadership of the party, gave the Queen the opportunity of sending for Lord Hartington, who was, according to custom, asked to form a Cabinet. He, however, declined the responsibility, and Mr. Gladstone was then sent for, and has undertaken the task. It is thought that Earl Granville will be Secretary of Foreign Affairs. Lord Hartington will, no doubt, hold a prominent place in the Liberal councils. He has held important offices under former Liberal administrations, but he cannot be called either a distinguished orator or statesman. During the late civil war his lordship visited this country, and made himself ridiculous by his display of Confederate proclivities. One night at the house of a wealthy banker in New York he was praising the South and lauding the Southern cause, when a lady well-known in New York society, and who, although hailing from Boston, owned a plantation down South which had been ruined by the war, dared him to wear a Confederate badge which she pulled out of her pocket. His lordship pinned the badge upon the lapel of his coat and paraded about the room. In a moment it was snatched off by several gentlemen, who immediately challenged the peer. These challenges were afterwards withdrawn when he had made an abject apology, but his name was removed from the books of the club that had welcomed him to New York.

Titles, without the means to support them, have often afforded a subject of ridicule. And an amusing instance is at present to be found in the case of the marriage of the Princess Frederica of Hanover. The Princess is a cousin of Queen Victoria, and has to obtain her consent, before her marriage to a petty German count is possible. The preparations for the wedding have employed the energies of the officers of Lord Beaconsfield's Ministry as much as if the peace of the nation was at stake. The Princess is paid $7,500 a year by Germany, and her noble husband has about the same income—not very much for the daughter and son-in-law of a king to live on. The future residence of the happy pair is to be a little cottage, named after Prince Albert, in the Isle of Wight and close to Osborne.

M. Leon Say is expected in England immediately to replace Admiral Pothnau as French Ambassador near the Court of St. James. The raison d'être for the appointment of M. Say is to be found in the desire of both nations to form a new commercial treaty. In the late French Cabinet, M. Say was hampered by several colleagues who were protectionists, but at present he is almost altogether free. The French Chambers are in favor of reciprocity, and there is great willingness to make reductions in tariffs if a concession is made in return. The concession that England can make to France is in the wine duties, and there are several difficulties in the way of making it. In the first place, Spain, Portugal, Italy and the English colonies are demanding the same thing; the Irish are complaining of the height of the duties on whisky, and a reduction would probably be necessary if any concession were made to France, and a proposition to reduce the custom-house duties on wines or spirits would at once bring the teetotallers and their supporters into the field, so that Léon Say's mission is not a very easy one.

The season in Paris is very brilliant; and, it may be added, a most expensive one. The severe Winter is throwing millions into the pockets of the flower people, for it is fashionable to send a cushion or a fan of flowers—the latter the latest novelty—to each member of one's female acquaintance at least once during the season. The wonderful success of Patti still continues, and she is the true lionne of Paris this season. She has been singing at Madame de Segan's and Madame Hirsch's—at the former in the garden scene from "Faust," and at the latter in the temple scene from "Aïda." Some idea of the expense of an evening party in Paris just at the present moment, may be formed from the fact that Patti got $3,000 for her few songs at Madame de Sagan's. The first performance of "Aïda" at the Grand Opera House under the present management was an immense success, and the house was crowded with all the beauty and fashion of Paris. Among other notables who were present was Gambetta, and report has it that he is about to be married to the daughter of a lady whose husband was a peer of France. There is some difficulty, however, in the way, for Gambetta refuses to be married in a church and the lady insists upon a religious ceremony. It is said that the affair will be arranged by a compromise under which there will be a private ceremony in a country church by a clergyman of advanced liberal proclivities.

The present leading queens of society in Paris either have or pretend to have a sincere love of art, and they have determined to make the Salon of this year a favorite resort. In London, also, the Academy promises to be a display of more than average excellence. Sir Frederic Leighton, the President, will have several excellent canvases; Alma Tadema will be represented by an admirable picture entitled "Frédigonde," and representing the Queen at the moment when she abandons herself to despair at the desertion of Chilpéric; Mr. Calderon sends "Captives of his Bow and Spear," and two companion pictures, "Olives" and "Grapes," the one a sad girl in olive tints with a basket of olives, the other a rosy, smiling damsel with a basket of grapes in ruddy colors; Mr. Poynter sends one of his usual classical subjects, "Venus, accompanied by the Graces, paying a visit to Esculapius."

The "ever-faithful Isle" is again attracting public attention. It is stated that a fast steamer has left Philadelphia for the waters round Cuba, carrying torpedoes and other instruments of war, and that the Cubans are about to strike another blow against the Spaniards. Meantime, in the Spanish Cortes, Señor Canovas del Castillo, the prime minister, proposes to reduce the protection duty on flour at Cuban ports, and an attempt is being made to form a new treaty of reciprocity with the United States. One of the recent acts of tyranny that Cuba really has a right to complain of, was the appointment of the brother of this very Canovas as governmental director of the Havana bank, because the bank refused to advance the Government as much money as the thieving officials in Cuba wanted.

Algiers is fast becoming a fashionable wintering place for French and English idlers and invalids. The climate is charming during the Winter months, although there is some typhoid fever. The fashionable quarter, Mustapha Superieur, is an amphitheatre of hills intersected by ravines and dotted with innumerable villas, each standing in its own grounds. The hothouse flowers of our latitude bloom there in February, and the shady lanes with their high hedges give a charming shelter for equestrians during the heat of the day. The environs of the town are favorite places for "picnickers," and to the usual delights of this style of entertainment is added a spice of danger in the form of a predatory lion or two who roams around seeking to devour somebody. But lions are becoming rather scarce, and the old custom of taking an extra horse for the lions is almost obsolete. In the days when lions were plenty, the coachman used to drive his three horses tandem and lead another by a long rope. If a lion happened to appear it was represented to him that his majesty might as well take the outlying horse and not disturb the horses or occupants of the carriage. It is not many years since the regular diligence was attacked and one of the horses killed. Among the well-known people who visited Algiers this season were Mr. and Mrs. Brassey, the latter so well known as the authoress of the "Trip of the Yacht Sunbeam," one of the most charming books of modern travel.

DENIS KEARNEY at length wears the garb of a convict, having been last week sent to the House of Correction, where he is expected to spend six months in honest work. It is a pity that all agitators of his stripe and kind, who stir up class hatreds and foment disorder and criminal violations of law, cannot be subjected to the same punishment which Kearney now so deservedly suffers.

IT is said that Mr. Thomas Hughes contemplates a journey to America during the Summer in connection with a land company in Tennessee, in which he is largely interested. He will be very cordially welcomed by the best classes of our people, both for his own exalted worth and his sturdy sympathy with our best American ideas in the time when they were on trial in the white heat of battle.

COUNT DE LESSEPS is kind enough to compliment Americans as the most hospitable people in the world. He tells his friends in France, moreover, that our people are in favor of his Panama canal enterprise, and that he has $60,000,000 awaiting him in this city for the prosecution of the work. We must certainly feel obliged for M. de Lesseps's good opinion of us, and if he has any such amount of money as he names pledged by Americans in aid of his enterprise, he certainly cannot say too much as to our liberality and our—credulity.

A WASHINGTON dispatch announces that General Joe Johnston, of Virginia, will decline a renomination to Congress. General Johnston is one of the foremost representative men of the South, belonging to a class whose numbers in Congress should be increased rather than diminished; and his constituency will do the country a service by insisting upon his return to the House, spite of his wish to retire. The legislation of the country must not be given over entirely to the small, self-seeking politicians who are for ever crowding to the front with eager clamors for recognition.

THE United States steamer Constellation, with a cargo of supplies for the relief of famine sufferers in Ireland, reached Queenstown, April 20th, being welcomed with many demonstrations of rejoicing. The officers have been received everywhere with marked attentions from the Lord Mayor and the populace. The Lord Mayor, in a visit to the Constellation, formally invited them to a ball and reception, and, in a graceful speech, thanked them and their country for their generosity in coming to the assistance of the starving peasantry of Ireland. The distribution of the cargo has already commenced.

THE statement that Postmaster-General Key had a longing for the Vice-Presidency, and was willing to go on the ticket with General Grant, turns out to be untrue. In a recent interview he said, "He did not think it becoming for him to offer himself to the Republican Party as a candidate for office. He had never sought office and never should." There has never been the remotest possibility that Judge Key would be named for the office designated; but it is quite possible that the real nominee at Chicago may not be as worthy of the place as he would be. It is, at least, true of the Postmaster-General that his record is without a stain, and that he has discharged the duties of his office honestly and capably, with only an occasional error of judgment born of an excess of zeal in behalf of the public interests.

THE Government of Japan is going about the work of promoting parliamentary reform in just the right way. It is making haste slowly. As a step toward the end in view—the establishment of a popular legislative system—schools are to be multiplied everywhere, and local suffrage assemblies established throughout the Empire to familiarize the people with parliamentary methods, and develop the political capacity of the populace. It may be years before representative government will be formally introduced, but it is believed that by avoiding precipitation, in the manner proposed, the result, when finally accomplished, will be permanent and stable. The policy of the Government in the matter is said to be largely based on the counsel given by General Grant in his interview with the Mikado in August last. It is noticeable that the more recent diplomatic appointments of the Empire have been conferred on young nobles of liberal views.

IF the Republicans of Illinois shall elect a solid delegation in favor of the nomination of General Grant for President, and if New York and Pennsylvania can be held to his support, he will probably be the candidate of the National Convention. He will command the support of most of the Southern delegations, and, with Blaine and Sherman dividing the vote of a majority of the Northern States, the ex-President would seem to be pretty certain of distancing his antagonists in the initial ballot, and thus finally securing the nomination by bringing to his standard delegations anxious to be on the winning side in the trial heat. But, if nominated, could he be elected? We doubt it. Leading Republicans of Ohio declare that he cannot even carry that Republican State. In New York and elsewhere a very heavy German vote, usually Republican, would be polled against him, and there are tens of thousands of moderates and conservatives who have heretofore co-operated with that party whose ballots would be cast in favor of the Opposition, and against the third-term idea and the peculiar partisan methods employed to advance it. General Grant will best consult his own interests by refusing absolutely to go into a scrub race for a position in which he has already acquired all the distinction it is capable of conferring.

THE INTERNATIONAL FISH EXHIBITION.

THE International Fishery Exhibition was opened in Berlin, April 20th, by the Crown Prince Frederick William. The ceremony was attended by Prince Frederick Charles, nephew of the Emperor, several Ministers and other imperial functionaries, and members of the Federal Council, the Reichstag, and Diplomatic Corps. The Exhibition is complete in nearly all its details, and presents a very fine appearance, being held in an immense new building erected on the site of the Imperial Iron Foundry, in the heart of Berlin. The edifice has been especially designed for an agricultural museum, and will be used for that purpose as soon as the Exhibition, which will only last ten weeks, comes to an end. The American exhibit has the best situation assigned to it, next to that of Germany, and probably the largest. It is nearly 6,000 square feet in extent, and the space is well filled. The exhibit is classified under seven heads —aquatic animals; where and how they live; apparatus for capturing them; preparations of fish products for food; manufacture of fish products into various articles; propagation and artificial culture of fish; governmental aid and protection. Under the first head are shown all aquatic creatures indigenous to the waters of this country, including every species, from the "tiny little blue cat" up to whales and seals and sea-elephants, oysters, clams, and also birds injurious to fishes or used by the fishermen for bait or otherwise. The fishes are shown by the same casts that were used in the Government Building at the Philadelphia Exhibition, and also by photographs and colored sketches. Turtles, terrapins and edible frogs are shown alive. Fifty catfish—a species unknown in Europe—have been sent over alive by E. G. Blackford, of Fulton Market, in a transportation-can specially designed for the purpose. This constitutes the most of the live stock, with the exception of those in the hatching tanks and such things as clams and oysters.

The second division will illustrate the fishing-grounds of America, the principal exhibit under this head being a large relief model of the bottom of the Atlantic on the coast of North America, extending from Cape May to North Newfoundland, and showing the banks and the continental slope down to the depth of 200 fathoms. On this model are shown the grounds frequented by American fishing vessels, and the varieties of fish caught at each point, thus enabling persons to understand the movements of the migratory species, such as the mackerel, the herring, and the shad.

The third division illustrates the methods used to capture fish, and in this there is a large number of specimens; hooks, lines, boats, and so forth—models of seine nets, gill nets and weirs and pounds used in shore fishing, angling apparatus, etc. In the matter of boats, as in all other fishing apparatus, the collection embraces that used from the earliest times, thus making the collection of interest to the ethnologist as well as to the experts in fisheries. Among the exhibits is a whaling-boat fully equipped, with all its gear ready for action. Another rarity is a purse seine from 200 to 300 fathoms long and from 20 to 30 fathoms deep, used for netting whole shoals of mackerel in mid-ocean. Six specimens of a peculiar fishing-boat called 'the dory,' which experts were very anxious to see, have also been taken over.

Twelve large figures, representing the costume of fishermen at various points and in different seasons of the year, are shown, together with photographs of the fishers' dwellings. The charts, nautical instruments, medicine-chests, and the complete outfit for voyages, even down to the customary demijohn, are also exhibited.

In the first department of fishery productions are included models of smoke-houses, drying apparatus, oil factories, guano factories, oyster-canning factories, etc.; and in the second department are shown smoked and pickled fish, gelatine, oils, glues, ivory, furs, leathers, pearl made from oysters and mussels. In this department the American manufacturers have been encouraged to make a competitive exhibition, and some twenty or thirty packing-houses of Boston, New York, Baltimore and San Francisco are represented.

In the sixth division it is intended to show the work of the United States Fishery Commission, and in it there are models of the fish-hatching establishment, and of the fish-hatching steamer Fulton, just launched at Wilmington; the improved steam shad-hatching apparatus, devised by Major T. B. Ferguson. The German Government particularly requested an illustration of the fish "ways"—the passage by which fish are directed to proper spawning grounds. New York State exhibits in this department, and also shows models of the apparatus and appliances used in the State fish-hatching establishment at Caledonia.

The seventh division illustrates the signal service, the situations of the lighthouses, and life-saving stations, the coast survey, with its charts, etc.; and the improved apparatus for deep-sea dredging, devised by Professor Agassiz and Commander Sigsbee; the charts of the Hydrographic Office, and the charts of the great lakes.

The American exhibit represents 7,500 different objects, weighs 250 tons, and its catalogue fills 250 pages in small type. Professor Baird, who was appointed by Congress as Commissioner to this fish exhibition at Berlin, being unable to attend, he appointed Professor G. Brown Goode, of the Smithsonian Institute, as Deputy Commissioner. Professor Goode is accompanied by Frederic Mather, of the American Fisheulturists' Association; F. W. True, Natural History Department of Smithsonian Institution; Julius E. Rockwell, secretary, and J. H. Collins, of Gloucester, Mass. The American Fish-cultural Department is under the charge of Mr. Mather, who has had great experience in stocking streams and lakes with fish. During the continuance of the Exhibition, Mr. Blackford, of New York, will send weekly shipments of all the leading edible fish to be found in the New York markets, such as shad, striped bass, red snapper, salmon from the Eastern and Western coasts, with brook trout.

A KNOT OF VIOLETS.

IT was night in Charleston—night, filled with moonlight and soft winds and gay laughter and love sounds from the high-walled gardens. The town was steeped in violet odors that rose from the gardens of the great palaces by the sea, from the gardens of the worn old houses that stood with orange torches glowing against their gray sides, and from high up on the ledges of the latticed balconies with the hanging lamps. The streets were filled with noisy crowds, dusky faces shone in the brilliant lamplight, gay cotton dresses fluttered in and out of the moonlight like the blooming of an African forest. The main streets were thronged with pleasure-seekers and idlers, all drifting on towards the theatre where, that evening, a favorite actress was to appear for the last time. The town had gone mad over her—not only men but women were numbered among her worshipers, for the beauty of her genius and her face were no greater than the beauty of her soul. She was a woman who had met with success while she was still young. Some guardian angel seemed to have cast its protecting wings about her, for, wherever she went, the people spoke of her almost as of a saint. The charm of her acting lay in her transparent purity of soul, an old actor once said, after seeing her in a great emotional part. Perhaps it was the singular pathos of her voice, her face, her manner, that touched the hearts of women and aroused the chivalry of men. Another charm was the mystery that shrouded her name, her birth, even her nationality. She had come among them unattended, save by one old servant, had disputed her ground inch by inch with others of her profession, making no claim to superiority, and yet steadily gaining the place which was now by common consent awarded her as a finished actress. She had won her knowledge and experience elsewhere than on the stage of the Charleston theatre—none could deny that—but her name had never been heard in this country until she appeared among the kindly Southern people and won for herself a place in their hearts, and to-night was the last night of her stay with them. She was going North, she said; she had been offered an engagement in some theatre.

The announcement had been very sudden. A week before some one had heard her say that her health was giving way with the languor and warmth of the climate. She had fainted one night upon the stage when flowers had rained about her from the boxes, and a knot of violets had fallen at her feet. She had raised them with a smile and placed them at her bosom and bowed her thanks for the flowers, and the house had gone mad over her. But when, in the following scene, she returned to the stage the flowers had disappeared from her throat, and before she had uttered a dozen words she had tottered and fallen and been carried fainting from the stage. Almost from the time of her coming to the town the small clusters of violets, dark, sweet and dewy, half-buried in leaves, had fallen night after night at her feet from one of the upper boxes. None knew who threw them. Some thought it might be some poor poet or student or artist, who had been awakened to love and inspiration by the vision of this strange, dark-eyed woman. The people learned to watch for the descending flowers, for they were like a voice that uttered the thoughts and the rapture of the whole house—a poet's speech for their dumbness.

This girl was like nothing so much as a great Southern violet, so dark and sweet and sentient. But after that night the flowers lay unheeded at her feet, and, as she glanced at them, it seemed as if a shudder ran through her frame—as though indeed she dreaded the asp lurking among the sweetness.

"You say 'La Marina' is an Italian, Paul?" asked one young man of another. The two were at that moment entering the great lighted theatre among the eager people hurrying to their seats. "Of course one would judge so from the name, but still why could you not tell us before that you had known her in Rome?"

"To what end? To set all the idle tongues of the town joining my name and hers. I knew her in Rome. She sang when a child to her guitar about the cafés, but the saints were not more respected by the Romans than that girl of the people. That is what you in America can not understand—the purity and dignity of the artist."

"We are skeptical, certainly," returned the other, carelessly. "But your Quixotic theories would almost lead us to believe that you are the adorer who every night rains violets upon her. For my part, I believe those violets do duty three nights in succession, and that the honor is well paid. It is all claque, but it lends romance to her, and, added to her quiet and mysterious life, invests her with a subtle charm. I am rather sorry she is going—the women will be in tears for a week."

Paul Drayton made no reply. His handsome face was set with firmer, sterner lines than ever before, thought his companion. He could scarcely recognize his gay and airy friend of every day in this man with the saddened brow and hollow eyes. Paul seemed to have aged by ten years since he had last seen him.

The play was "Adrienne"—that strange, sweet tragedy, with the mingling of old classic form and modern passionate utterance. The first act was as badly rendered as might be by actors who neither understood the rococo flavor of the old court-life, nor were qualified to portray it. In the second act, Adrienne appears among the noisy jesters of the green-room, and anon comes Maurice, and the lovers stand side-by-side and read together the fable of the "Two Pigeons." The house was breathless, as Adrienne's clear, sweet voice, with that strange intonation that made them ask what country owned her, rose above the crackling of the footlights. The intrinsic pathos of the girl's voice leant a singular charm to the simple story of the two birds who, like lovers, separated but to return and dwell happily together, feeling that love was better than all the world could yield besides.

When the curtain fell on the act, Paul Drayton remarked that he was going up to his mother's box for a while. Ernest Walworth watched his friend as he appeared again among the curtains of the proscenium-box in which a handsome dark-browed woman was seated. She was shrouded in black lace, and possessed the same air of distinction that characterized her son. There was something so subtle, so mysterious, so strong in its power for evil in her small, dark head and long, white throat, that Ernest Walworth felt half-reminded of the portraits he had seen in the Italian galleries of the beautiful, wicked women of the Middle Ages, with their slender necks and murderous white hands. He remembered that he had heard strange rumors about her marriage with Paul's father, how his first betrothed had died a sudden, painless death, and left him free to marry this beautiful woman—for beautiful she still was, looking more like her son's sister than his mother, as they sat together, framed by the crimson curtains.

With the rising of the curtain Paul's figure disappeared from his mother's side, and he did not return to his seat near his friend, Ernest Walworth—carried out of himself by the charm of the actress, the fire and soul of her passionate scenes, the tenderness and grace of her calmer passages—forgot to wonder at his absence. Only, at the magnificent close of the fourth act, when Adrienne denounces her haughty rival, the princess, and the flowers and wreaths poured upon her from the boxes and the galleries, he saw the knot of violets fall from somewhere above the curtain straight at the girl's feet.

In the fifth act the unhappy Adrienne is reunited with her lover, Maurice, only to leave him when death comes to her in the shape of the poisoned bouquet sent by the princess. Ernest Walworth thought he had never seen so exquisite a creature as this pale girl, in her long white draperies, with her dark hair unbound. The tenderness of her scene with old Michonnet brought the tears to his eyes. When the fatal flowers were brought to her, he noticed that foremost among them, dark against the white of roses and camellias, was a knot of violets, and these she pressed to her lips and fastened at her bosom, with the graceful ease of action that made her charm. He watched her through that wild scene of mental and physical torment, the poison working in her body, the despair of love in her heart; and when, at Maurice's entrance, her soul went out to him in one wild, fierce cry, he wondered if somewhere Paul Drayton's heart were not bounding in answer to the passionate appeal. A magnetic intuition had flashed within him that these two lives, seemingly so widely separated, were in some strange way bound by an unseen tie.

The applause that night was loud and long. With the curtain's fall more flowers were brought to the footlights, and the pale actress came forth and bowed her thanks. And the people went away regretfully, for they had grown to love this fair foreign creature, and they let her leave them with a sigh. Outside the stage-door a crowd had gathered, waiting to see her come forth. To-night by chance, for she generally made her way home on foot, with only her old servant for protection, there was a carriage waiting for her, and when she came out, in her long, black robe with the lace vail over her head, worn after an Old World fashion, the people took the horse from his place, and the young men drew the carriage through the streets where the moonlight broke the shadows and the sounds of the banjo and accordeon mingled with the sweet, mellow voices of the negroes. Ernest looked for his friend, thinking he might be among those escorting the actress to her home, but could not see him.

The crowd paused before an old, high house in the heart of the town, shut in from the street by a massive gate, with its windowless gables, white in the moonlight, and its triple verandas overhanging the garden and shielded by half-closed lattices.

The hanging-lamp of the upper veranda seemed to Ernest Walworth's excited imagination to reveal the outline of a man's figure, his friend's. He waited until he had seen the actress pass through the heavy garden gate, had heard the crowd cheer her and bid her farewell, and her sweet voice replying to them "Good-night" and "Adieu."

When all was still, he strolled down the grass-grown, deserted street, wondering what strange caprice of fate had linked the life of his friend, Paul Drayton, whom he had known from boyhood, with that of this lovely foreign actress.

La Marina crossed the grassy courtyard into which the moonlight was streaming from high above the weird, blind gable of the house. The air was filled with violet odors and the scent of the flowers carried by the old servant. She passed into the house and up a broad stair common to the three stories, until she reached the apartment under the roof. At the threshold a man met her, gently drew off her vail and mantle, and, encircling her with his arm, led her out on the veranda into the moonlight.

"At last, dear one!" It was Paul Drayton's voice. "You are mine! The stage, the footlights, the garishness and noise will never come between us again." He placed her in a great straw chair near the hanging lamp, and threw himself on a stool at her feet. Their dark heads stood in relief against the soft bright furnishings of the room behind.

"I do not know, Paul," returned the girl, "I have felt always that there was a curse upon our love. Ever since that strange note reached me in the knot of violets so like those you have always thrown me, I have known scarcely a moment's peace. That threat of a sudden and mysterious death if I did not cease my endeavors to entangle Paul Drayton into a marriage with a nameless actress, cannot be lightly forgotten. I love you, Paul, madly, as only a Roman can love. I have loved you for ten years, since the night I sang before you in the Caffè Greco among the artists. Your love was my shield in the years I passed on the stage in my own country, and when last year we met again and you bade me follow you across the ocean, and spoke of making me your wife, I could not refuse, although I knew the wrong I was doing you. Even now, Paul, it is not too late. If you regret the step you are taking leave me. I will go back to my own country, and the world need never know that La Marina might have been Paul Drayton's wife. I feel so strangely to-night—I scarcely know what it is—the air is so oppressive, my head aches, my sight is dim, and, worse than all, some strange cloud of fatality seems hanging over me. I wish I knew who it was that discovered that secret of your violets. They were such a sweet token to me—their breath awoke me to life and passion on the stage, for I knew that your lips had touched them, that your eyes were watching me when I pressed them to mine. But since that night I have never dared touch them not knowing which were yours and which my enemy's."

"But now it is all over. You will leave this place to-morrow; the world thinks you are going to an engagement in the North. In a week's time I shall follow you, or sooner, if possible, and then we will be married at once, sail for Italy, and die to the world here. We will renew our beautiful days of the Eternal City which smiled upon the budding, as now upon the fruition, of our love. The only obstacle in the way of my union with you has been my mother. By the terms of my father's will, I have all these years been dependent on her caprice, and in the contingency of my marriage without her consent, I should be beggared. But I have plead long with her, and she has consented to my wishes. She will allow me to take what belongs to me from my father's estate, and be happy with you in Italy. I have tried to bring her to an affection for you, ben mio, but she refuses even to see you."

"She was in the theatre to-night. I saw you with her. I am afraid of her, Paolo mio, though she be your mother. She is not like you, gentle and noble. She has a face like the Borgia. Can it be she who sends the violets? Can it be that they conceal some snare, some trap for me?"

Paul laughed and took the fair woman in his arms.

"In this country, dear one, there are no such romances of knives and daggers and poison as in yours. You are an Italian, and consequently superstitious and fearful. I am an American, used to the broad open daylight of common sense, and I have no belief in the abnormal powers of darkness, or in the stealthy step of the assassin. Some jealous actress sent you that letter, sends you the flowers, some one who has watched you to and fro from here, and wonders why La Marina should have a finer lover than she herself."

A strange contraction overspread the girl's features. She lifted her head from Paul's breast.

"What strange thoughts pass through my head, Paul, to-night; and one moment I am chilled with frost, the next I am burning with fever."

"It is the night air," said her lover. "We are foolish to sit here. I, too, feel strange shudders pass over me. You are excited because you have played Adrienne to-night. That death-scene is magnificent, but it exhausts you fearfully. Do you regret that you have left your art for ever, dear one?"

"It may not be for ever," replied the girl, with a wan smile. "Perhaps in Italy——" She started with a faint cry. "I cannot tell, there is something gnawing at my heart. Put me on the couch, Paul."

She clung to him like a child, and he led her across the room to a low divan. She fell back among the cushions like a broken, drooping lily, among her black drapings.

"I am better now," she said. "Come near me, Paul." He knelt beside her and gathered her in his arms, pillowing his face on her breast. A moment later he raised his head.

"These violets have a strange, sickly odor. Where did you get them? Are they mine?"

"They were in the poisoned flowers on the stage to-night. I thought you had perhaps put them there, and I took them." He bent his head over them. "A strange odor—like the narcissus or some Eastern drug. I did not send them."

"Then who did?" The girl lifted her head, while a fierce light beamed in her eyes. Her features were distorted with fear and pain. "Paul, I am accursed. It is the fate hanging over me. Can it be the violets were poisoned?"

"Poisoned!" He snatched them from her bosom and threw them from him and strove to rise and call assistance, but his limbs seemed weighted with iron, his tongue refused to utter a sound, a terrible numbness held him fast, his heavy hand dropped by the side of the girl over whose face a fearful vail of apathy had fallen. Her eyes were closing in death, her lips framed the one word—"Paul," and then there was silence. Once more he strove to rise and shriek for help. The old servant was gone—the house was empty. Why must they die there alone?

Suddenly a tall, sinuous figure emerged from a side-door and hurried to him. "Oh! Paul, my boy, I did not mean—oh! God, this is cruel, indeed, that you—oh! heavens, how am I punished!"

The dying man's lips formed the word "mother," and with a look that seemed to summon her before the judgment-seat, his soul left him. The woman glided from the room and out into the night, disappearing through the shadows, like a condemned soul into the place of its torture.

On the morrow, the lovers were found lying dead together. The actress's old servant, whom she had dismissed for the night, was held until the cause of the death should be proven. But the crime could not be traced. The air about the lovers was heavy with a strange, exquisite perfume, and the flowers from the theatre rendered it faint and stifling. They might literally have been smothered with roses.

Only Ernest Walworth divined the truth. On his dead friend's face, a stony horror, an infinite despair, was stamped that told of some awful sight passing before the dying soul. He knew that Paul himself would have spared the guilty; he knew that the honor of his name was dearer to him than life, and he was content to leave the punishment to heaven. But when Paul's mother would have separated the lovers, leaving La Marina's fair body to be buried where the people choose, he went to her and said, "Madam, if you do not bury them together, the world may perhaps trace some connection between the strange death of to-day and the strange death of Marie Beauville, your rival in your husband's affections, thirty odd years ago." And she left him to do as he would.

And he covered their grave with violets—nothing more save a cypress-tree for old Rome's sake.

He made no threats—he had no proofs; but when two years later Paul's mother was found dead among the flowers of her conservatory and they said that heart disease, brought on by her son's cruel and mysterious death, had claimed her for its victim, he knew that his prayer for retribution had not been in vain.

POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

HON. JAMES E. ENGLISH, OF CONNECTICUT.

HON. JAMES E. ENGLISH, of New Haven, Conn., was born in that city March 13th, 1812. He comes of a sturdy, long-lived race, and is still in the full vigor of manhood, having at no previous period of his life been more actively and successfully employed in his business operations than during the last two years and a half, or since his retirement from the United States Senate. He has been more extensively engaged in building than ever before, having erected in that time several large blocks of buildings on the principal business streets of New Haven, and otherwise contributed to the improvement and adornment of his native city. In business, as in finance, he rarely makes a mistake, and in his energetic efforts to advance his own extended and widely diversified enterprises, the public good is in no way lost sight of.

Governor English's grandfather upon the paternal side was one of twenty-seven prisoners killed by the British troops on the invasion of New Haven by General Tryon in 1779, and it may be added that the ancestors of the subject of this sketch were all active and earnest patriots during the Revolution. He exhibited marked characteristics from his early boyhood—those of independence, self-reliance and individual energy being altogether remarkable for his years. While at school he evinced a strong natural gift in mechanical and architectural drawing, and drew several plans of buildings for the old master mechanics of the city, to one of whom he apprenticed himself to learn the carpenter and jobber's trade. At the age of twenty-one he started in business for himself, and during the next two or three years erected several handsome buildings, drawing his own plans, purchasing his own materials and personally supervising his own work. But the field was not sufficiently ample, and he engaged in the lumber business. His purchases were so judiciously made and his business so admirably conducted that he soon commanded an extensive trade and laid the foundation of the ample fortune he now possesses. His great business sagacity and excellent judgment were speedily recognized by his fellow-townsmen, and for twelve years he was elected a member of the Board of Selectmen, and he also served in the city Board of Common Council, being chosen by the votes of both Whigs and Democrats, his public services being as highly valued by one party as the other. In 1855 he was elected a member of the State Legislature, and during the three years succeeding served as State Senator. In 1859 he was again nominated for State Senator, but declined in consequence of important business which called him to Europe.

In 1861 he was chosen a member of Congress, and, being re-elected in 1863, served in that body during the four years of the war. In the Thirty-seventh Congress he served on the Committee on Naval Affairs, and, so valuable were his services, that on the organization of that committee in the Thirty-eighth Congress, Secretary Welles especially urged his retention, on the ground that he was too important a member of the Administration to dispense with in the then critical condition of affairs.

Speaking of his career in Congress, the late T. N. Parmalee, for many years the secretary and confidential adviser of Dean Richmond, whose knowledge of the public men of this country was unsurpassed by any living contemporary, said: "Although an earnest Democrat in principle and from conviction, he zealously supported the war measures of the Administration, voting for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and for the National Emancipation Act. He, however, opposed the Legal Tender Bill and the national bank system. He foresaw the pernicious tendency of those measures, and the arguments by which he resisted their passage have never been answered, while their disastrous effect upon the industrial and commercial interests of the country attests the soundness of his reasoning. Although possessing large manufacturing interests to be benefited by class legislation, he has ever been a strenuous opponent of protection for the sake of protection, and a warm advocate of all measures of revenue reform."

He was elected Governor in 1867, at a time when every gubernatorial chair in the North was filled by a Republican, and all the States of the South were under Republican domination. His great personal popularity secured his election over General Joseph R. Hawley, with all that gentleman's war-laurels and acknowledged ability as an orator and civilian. He was re-elected in 1868 by an increased majority, and in the same year his name was brought prominently before the country as a candidate for the Presidency by the Democratic National Convention held in New York. This distinction was, no doubt, accorded him from the marked ability displayed in his annual messages and other State papers, conceded even by his political opponents to be among the ablest ever emanating from a chief magistrate of the commonwealth. In these messages he took a bold stand against what he considered the "radical" course of the Federal Government in time of peace. The Democratic and Independent press of the country freely quoted his remarks as embodying the true principles of sound government. Subsequent events verified his utterances in many essential particulars.

On the death of Senator O. S. Ferry, in 1875, Governor English was appointed to fill the vacancy, and took his seat at the commencement of the second term of the Forty-fourth Congress, filling the position with the same ability that characterized his four years' service in the popular branch of that body.

During the thirty years of Governor English's public services in town, city, State and national councils, he has been largely engaged in promoting the manufacturing interests of the State, there being at one time not less than fifteen manufacturing establishments in which he was interested and to which he was giving more or less time and personal attention. Throughout the war and ever since he has been the principal business manager of the New Haven Clock Company, the largest concern of the kind in the world. He is also President of the Goodyear Metallic Rubber Shoe Company, one of the most extensive establishments of the kind in the United States, and is an active director in several other large and flourishing manufacturing companies, all well-managed and successfully conducted. His entire wealth has been acquired in prosecuting legitimate business transactions; he has never been a "speculator" in the technical sense of the term. As a man of practical good sense and sound political wisdom, he has, in the opinion of those who know him, no superior in New England, and very few, if any, in the whole country. He has fine executive abilities, a quick mind, clear perception and appreciation of the force of an argument, is a ready reasoner, and conducts a controversial discussion with skill, clearness and ability. He is philanthropic, public-spirited, and gives liberally of his means to all deserving and well-directed public and private charities. To a sound and vigorous constitution he adds regularity and abstemiousness of habits, and no person of his age in the State gives promise of a longer or more useful and blameless life than this honored citizen of Connecticut. There are many shrewd political observers and students of the drift of popular opinion who believe that he would prove the strongest Presidential candidate whom his party could place in the field.

A Primitive Community.

THE smallest Protestant commune probably in Europe, and certainly the most primitive, is that of Ablandchenen, Canton Berne. Ablandchenen, a word literally signifying "a little outlying place," is situated in a remote mountain valley, 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, and its unsophisticated inhabitants contrive to dispense with most of the appendages which are considered inseparable from modern civilization. They do not possess a single public-house. There is no doctor in the place; but there has not been a death for many years. Commerce and handicrafts are conspicuous by their absence; there is neither blacksmith, baker, wheelwright, nor shopkeeper in the commune; and the people, being all honest and peaceable, require neither notary, lawyer, nor policeman. Every fortnight a pedlar with a van goes the round of the commune and supplies the housewives with all they want in the shape of crockery, drapery, thread, needles and sundries. Food is provided by their own flocks, herds and poultry. They have a tiny church, with a single bell, and it is a standing joke in the place that when a girl is born they ring a peal, but on the birth of a lad they ring only one bell. A correspondent, writing thence to a Zurich paper, says that they enjoy a far larger measure of happiness than falls to the lot of most men, and have no desire to exchange their Alpine home for the life of cities.

Decrease of Population in France.

THE observations of statisticians have been of late directed to the serious but steady decrease in the population of France, as evinced by the gradual lessening of the birth rate. In 1878 the number of births was 937,211, a lower average than that of the last four years. In 1861 the average was 2.69 per cent., in 1862 it was 2.65, in 1863 it rose again to 2.69, but between 1864 and 1868 it sank to 2.63. From 1874 to 1878 it further declined to 2.56, and in the latter year it was only 2.53. There are two causes for this decrease, viz., the fewer number of marriages, and, what is far more important, a great decline in the number of children resulting from these marriages. In the period between 1864 and 1868 the average of marriages was 0.79 per cent., which declined in the corresponding years of the next decade to 0.78, and is now only at the rate of 0.75. The proportion of children to each marriage is dwindling more and more, with the exception of Brittany and some of the departments in the centre and the south, where the agricultural population is under the system of co-operative farming. In the class composed of petty tradesmen or the well-to-do peasants there is seldom more than one child per marriage, and M. Baudrillart has stated that in one of the rural communes in Picardy he ascertained the number of children among the best off of the peasants to be thirty-seven for thirty-five families. The illegitimate births in 1878 numbered 67,912, being 1,000 over and above that of the preceding year.

The Royal Betrothal at Brussels.

The formal engagement and betrothal of the Archduke Rodolph, Crown Prince of the Empire of Austria and Kingdom of Hungary, to Princess Stéphanie, second daughter of the King of the Belgians, is an event of interest among European Courts. The Archduke Rodolph "proposed" in person to Princess Stéphanie of Belgium at an evening party given in his honor at the Château de Laeken, on March 7th. Among the amusements provided for their Majesties' guests was a concert in the magnificent conservatory attached to the palace. Matters had been so arranged that, when the company were conducted from the saloon to the Winter Garden, the Archduke and the Princess were left together tête à tête for a few minutes. As soon as they were alone the Crown Prince approached her Royal Highness with a low and formal obeisance, saying, "Madame, will you take me for a husband?" to which plain question the Princess simply replied, courtesying deeply, "Yes, your Imperial Highness." "Your Royal Highness's answer makes me supremely happy," observed the Archduke. "And I," rejoined Princess Stéphanie, "promise that I will do my duty towards you under all circumstances." The youthful pair, arm-in-arm, joined the royal circle in the Winter Garden; and the Archduke, leading his fair companion up to her father, addressed King Leopold as follows: "Sire, I have, with your Majesty's permission, begged Princess Stéphanie to bestow her hand upon me. It is my happy privilege to inform you that my petition has been granted." "I rejoice, Monseigneur," replied the King, "to greet you as my son-in-law." The Princess embraced her mother, and immediately afterwards the betrothal was announced to the assembled company.

The Italians in Africa.

Spurred on by the achievements of Livingstone, Stanley and others in exploring Africa, and by the contributions of Italian missionaries, several of whom have penetrated far into the interior, giving martyrs to science and religion, the Italian Geographical Society has sent a deputation for scientific exploration. Our illustration shows them waiting upon their countryman, Monsignor Massaja, a bishop in Abyssinia, well acquainted with all parts of that strange kingdom. He is at present an exile at Cairo, the present ruler, King John of Abyssinia, having cruelly imprisoned him for a long time and then banished him.

Verdi and "Aida."

The production of Verdi's "Aida" at the Grand Opera House, Paris, sent a thrill of ecstasy through the musical world of the glittering capital, especially as the gifted maestro conducted in person. The magnificent house was literally crammed to suffocation, and every seat was sold weeks in advance and re-sold at fabulous prices. The opera was superbly mounted, the most scrupulous care being paid to every detail of the mise en scène. The procession was one of the most marvelous pageants that ever swept across any stage, while the tomb scene was almost ghastly in its realism. Patti was at her best, and Nicolini surpassed himself.

The Exhibition Hall in the New Conservatory of Music, Madrid.

The Exhibition Hall of the Conservatory of Music and Declamation was destroyed some years ago with the adjacent portions of the Academy, but has been rebuilt in much finer style. It was opened in December last with a magnificent concert for the benefit of the sufferers by the inundations in Murcia and Almeria, which must still be fresh in our readers' minds, as we fully illustrated the occurrence. The new hall is a spacious saloon, richly decorated with paintings and gilt moldings, imitating the Pompeiian style. The stage is spacious, and at the back of it is an organ of great power and sweetness of tone. It was erected under the direction of Dr. Emilio Arrieta, the worthy president of this musical school, himself a composer of great merit.

Ball at the Chinese Embassy, Kleber Avenue, Paris.

The Marquis Tseng, Chinese Ambassador to France, gave a ball at the Embassy on the 15th of March, which was peculiar enough to deserve more than passing notice. It was preceded by a dinner, where, of course, bird's nest soup and shark's fins figured. The guests began to arrive for the ball at half-past nine. The door of the Embassy—one of the largest mansions in Paris—was brilliantly lighted. Chinese servants, in picturesque costume, lined the staircase leading up. At the head, by the door of the main saloon, the Marquis—in a grayish-blue robe, yellow cloak, and black hat with peacock feather, the ensign of his rank, and two ox-tails to show his nobility—received each guest with a friendly grasp of the hand, but in silence, as none of the embassy speak French. If the guest was accompanied by a lady, the Ambassador motioned to one of his attendant mandarins, who immediately offered his arm to the lady and escorted her to Madame Tseng, which Chinese etiquette requires to be done before the sexes mingle on the floor. The Ambassadress, in red and black and a profusion of jewelry, was seated, with her son beside her, in one corner, surrounded by a bevy of ladies. At each presentation she rose, bowed and seated herself. The ladies remained in this part for about an hour listening to the music; and at about eleven the Chinese lady rose and retired, which was the signal for the commencement of dancing. Marquis Tseng, whose portrait we give, with that of his lady, is the son of the general who put down the famous Taeping insurrection some fifteen years ago.

The English Elections.

Our illustration of the scene at reading the result of the polling in one of the metropolitan elections may be regarded as generally characteristic of the manner in which the decision is made known to the candidates themselves, and to their most intimate political associates, who are admitted to the presence of the returning officer for this purpose. During the campaign and on election day there was a profuse display of the chosen symbolic colors, orange for the Conservatives and blue for the Liberals, in banners and streamers, in placards on the walls and in windows, and in ribbons worn by thousands of men, women and children, as well as by the horses drawing cabs and other vehicles hired by the rival committees, the carriages likewise bearing papers of their respective party colors. At each of the polling stations, all day long, crowds of both parties assembled, watching the voters as they entered or departed, greeting them with humorous solicitations, inquiries, or reproaches, and ever ready to indulge in a satirical or combative disposition by taunting and defying one another.

NOTES OF INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.

TRACK-LAYING on the Texas and Pacific Railroad is progressing at the rate of 4,000 feet per day.

A CHICAGO wholesale house is having a car constructed to carry its salesmen and a stock of goods over various Western railways. The car is to be sixty feet long and arranged with sleeping apartments and kitchen, whereby these fortunate drummers can live in luxury, independent of country hotels and their horrors.

THE present wheat crop in Texas will probably be the largest ever grown in that State.

INQUIRY among men heavily interested in Lake Superior iron mines shows that the season's contracts call for 1,650,000 tons of ore from that region.

MR. H. E. SARGENT, the general manager of the Northern Pacific, describes the emigration to the Northwest and especially along the line of this road as beyond anything ever seen. It looks as if all of Michigan and Canada were on the move to locate in the country through which the road runs. The emigrants were of the best class, mostly old wheat-growers and good farmers.

THE value of the live stock in Georgia is about $21,017,436.

NEW steel works are to be erected in Chicago at a cost, including seventy-five acres of land, of $2,000,000. They are to be completed within a year, and will consist of four blast furnaces, Bessemer converting works, and steel-rail mills. They will employ 2,000 men, consume 250,000 tons of ore yearly, and turn out 30,000 tons of rails.

THE fifteen car-manufacturing establishments of the United States turned out last year 37,350 pieces of rolling stock.

BOTH hull and cargo insurance on the Lakes are lower than at any time last year.

IN many portions of Missouri the cane sugar industry is being vigorously worked up, and several syrup and sugar factories, some of them on a large scale, are being prepared for work in the Fall. A great many farmers will plant the best varieties of sorghum, intending to raise their own sweetening hereafter.

RICHMOND is about to invest $400,000 in waterworks.

THE flax industry of New Jersey, which has been lagging for some time past, is again reviving under the nourishment which the State is giving it by means of bounties offered for its culture and improved processes of manufacture. It has been mainly cultivated thus far for its seed, which possesses medicinal qualities of a very high order, and also for its oil. The flax is now worth $100 per ton.

THIRTY-FOUR factories in Georgia are exempted from taxation. They own property worth $4,136,373.

SUGAR-CANE is tasselling in Louisiana for the first time since 1853. This is said to indicate an enormous yield.

CALIFORNIA contains about 100,000,000 acres of land, of which about 43,000,000 acres are unsurveyed. The San Francisco Bulletin says that there is not much exceeding 4,000,000 acres under cultivation, although something more than 6,000,000 acres are inclosed with fences, and that there are in the State 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 acres, more or less, which can be bought from $1.25 an acre up to $7.

AN ice-manufactory will be placed in operation at Tallahassee, Fla., this Summer.

THE fruit and vegetable business from Florida to Northern and Western cities has grown from about 25,000 boxes in 1874 to 900,000 in 1880.

THE Charleston News says that in South Carolina farming is being done more extensively, more industriously and more intelligently than ever before known by the oldest inhabitant. Men are working with all their might, and with cheerfulness, thereby raising agriculture from the previous status of an isolated and plodding calling to that of a live, hopeful business, in which an enlightened and economical consideration is given to surroundings and their bearings.

THIRTY-ONE railroads intersect Georgia and contribute to the State Treasury.

THERE is being shipped from a quarry near the Hot Springs, Ark., a stone of the finest quality for house and wheelstones. A large shipment has been made direct to Sorgues, near Marseilles, France.

A VESSEL is loading at San Francisco with 100,000 gallons of wine for the German market. It is the first large shipment of the kind ever made thither.

THE following is a statement of the number and capacity of iron and steel manufactories of the country at the present time: Number of completed blast furnaces March 1st, 1880, 697; number building, 44; annual capacity of completed furnaces, in pig iron, net tons, 6,860,000; number of completed rolling-mills and steel works, 382; number building, 10; number of single puddling furnaces, 4,467; number of heating furnaces, 2,419; number of trains of rolls, 1,397; annual capacity of rolling-mills in finished iron, net tons, 4,000,000; annual capacity of rail-mills in heavy rails, net tons, 2,150,000.

DURING the Winter 870,000 tons of ice have been cut from the Kennebec River, Me., and all but 100,000 tons have been sold, the prices ranging from $1.75 to $4 per ton, and averaging $2.50. The value of this year's ice crop of the State of Maine is estimated at $4,000,000.

THE rolling-mills of Chicago now employ about 6,000 men.

NEW ORLEANS is rapidly rising to prominence as a shipping point for early fruit and vegetables, as is evident from the fact that during the last commercial year the shipments of this class of freight alone over the Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans Railroad amounted to 13,306 tons, equal to 1,330 carloads, worth at least $800,000. It is calculated that the stations along the road ship about as much more.

A STEAMSHIP company of Genoa has started a regular line of steamers between that city and the United States for freight and emigrants.

THE successful growing of the coffee plant in South Florida seems to be now established beyond question, and the Commissioner of Agriculture has awarded the premium offered some time since for the first pound of coffee grown in the open air. The Agricultural Bureau furnishes plants already started to those who wish to give it a trial, and it is thought that the Florida planters will cultivate coffee quite extensively next season.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE total number of emigrants from Germany in 1879 was 33,327, of whom 30,958 came to the United States.

—THE Town Commissioners of Queenstown have decided to give a banquet to the officers of the United States frigate Constellation.

—THE Legislature of Mississippi has passed a law obliging all railway companies in the State to fence their roads under a heavy penalty for failing so to do.

—A GOVERNMENT Bill has been submitted to the German Bundesrath to increase, by 3 per cent., the income tax of the parents of men exempted from military service.

—ABOUT $1,000,000 have already been expended upon Boston's new sewer system, and it will take over $2,000,000 more to complete it with all its appointments.

—MUCH excitement prevails at Ashland, Wis., over the reported discovery of gold and silver, in paying quantities, at Bronsehwiller and Silver Creek, fourteen miles south of Ashland.

—FOUR years ago, between the 1st of January and the middle of April, there were 12,000 immigrants who landed at this port. This year, in the corresponding period, the number of immigrants has been 49,566.

—THE cultivation and protection of timber is considered so important in Australia that a college has been established in which young men will be especially trained in woodcraft, forestry and agricultural chemistry.

—THE world-renowned shorthorn cow, the first Duchess of Cowslip, by the tenth Duke of Thorndale, belonging to Lord Skelmersdale, is dead. She died of congestion of the liver. She was bought by Lord Skelmersdale in 1873 for $20,000.

—DURING the past week thirteen large steamships have left the Mersey for North American ports with a great number of passengers and considerable general cargoes. Most of them are bound for the United States. This is believed to be unprecedented.

—A DUNDEE correspondent says that a part of the lattice-work of the Tay Bridge has been recovered which bears marks tending to sustain the theory of Sir Thomas Bouch, chief engineer and projector of the bridge, that the train went off the track before the bridge fell.

—PRESIDENT DIAZ has granted a concession to Robert R. Symon, who represents a Boston company, for the construction of a railway to Leon, with one branch to the Pacific coast and another to the Rio Grande. The concession is made subject to the approval of Congress.

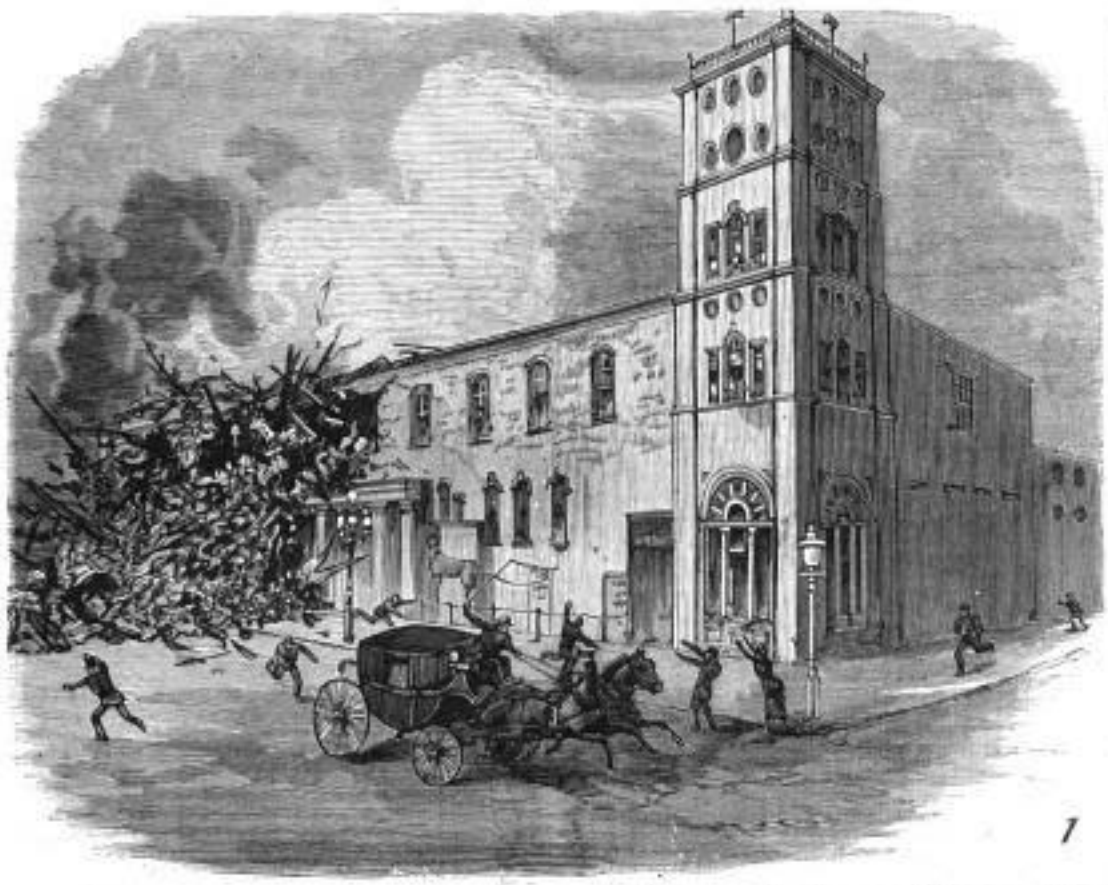
—A MEMORIAL to Congress has been adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco in regard to the defenseless state of the harbor, and asking that forty or fifty heavy modern "rifles" be placed in position, and that at least two turreted ironclads be maintained in the harbor.

—THE German Empire has now twenty universities, all having essentially the same constitution. As they are partially supported by the State, it claims a general right of control. But at present each university virtually manages its own affairs, even the appointments of the professors depending in the main on faculties to which they belong.

—POLITICAL agitation in France does not interfere with national prosperity, which continues to exhibit an extraordinary development. The first fortnight of March showed a surplus of fourteen millions on the estimated provision from indirect taxes. It is said this handsome balance will be applied to the reduction of certain taxes which press unequally on classes, and to the opening up of new lines of railways.

—THE attitude of the Turkish Government respecting the Greek question is not reassuring. Several new battalions were hurried away by steamer last week to Salonica, and others are preparing to follow. The Porte is showing itself more and more incapable of governing the Empire. The general feeling, even among a large section of the Turks, is that the sooner the great Powers take the power out of the present hands the better for every one.

—THE railway system is extending rapidly in Japan, two lines having been recently completed in the island of Nipbon and a third in the island of Yesso, the most northerly of the Japanese group. The rails are of English make, but the rolling stock and engines have been ordered in America. The two first engines are to be named Benkei and Yoshitsune, after two celebrated early Japanese heroes. It is the first order of the kind that has been given by Japan to American houses.



—A CIRCULAR from the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Greece calls attention to the increase of brigandage in Thessaly. According to reports of the Greek consuls and consular agents, there is great danger that the whole country will be overrun. There are 500 brigands about Mount Olympus, and the districts of Tirkhala, Karditza, Pharsalis and Cassia are also infested. New murders and abductions are reported daily. People are afraid to leave the towns. Trade is stopped, and the civil and military authorities are powerless.

—ON April 22d the side of the Nail Creek Culvert in the Erie Canal, just east of the guard lock in West Utica, gave way. The Utica and Frankfort Level was emptied within two hours. The bed of the canal for a distance of 150 feet and a depth of four or five feet, and the towpath for from 50 to 100 feet, with its vertical wall, are washed out. Edward Bonner's lumber-yard is afloat, Curtis's boiler-shop is submerged, and cellars and first floors of thirty or forty houses are flooded. Several families were forced to run to the upper stories. It is now estimated that it will require from two to four weeks to fix the break securely.

—FIVE persons at Stuttgart, Germany, are expected to come into possession of an inheritance of $10,000,000 in America, left by their great-great uncle, named Springer, who emigrated to New York 150 years ago and died without heirs. The estate is situated in Williamsburg, Jersey City and Brooklyn, and meetings of the American claimants have been held in various cities. In August of last year there was a private conference at the house of Mr. William P. Springer, in Oswego, where several of the heirs now live. The object of the conference was to obtain information as to the situation of the real property and to arrange some plan of action. The value of the estate has been estimated at not less than $20,000,000.

—AN extraordinary tale of martyrdom in the Russian Church is told by Figaro. In 1853 the steward of a Russian landowner was murdered in the district of Kieff. A priest named Kobylowiez was accused of the deed, and, in spite of his protests of innocence, he was transported to Siberia, where he was forgotten. The other day an old peasant admitted on his death bed that he was the murderer, that he had confessed the crime to the priest in question, and obtained his absolution. The priest, however, having received the confession under the usual seal of secrecy, could not divulge it, and preferred to undergo the terrible punishment in the mines of Siberia to departing from his duty. The authorities at once sought for the priest among the prisoners, but he had died a few months before the disclosure.

A DEAD SECRET.

INTO the room she made her way—
The room was darkened and sweet and chill—
And quiet the folded linen lay
Over his heart, for his heart was still.

One sat weeping beside the bed,
A mourner who held a child's soft hand,
And both were gazing upon the dead—
The dead, so stately, so white and grand.

All without bidding she entered there,
And no hand hindered, for where Death is
None are strangers, no kindly care,
Nor fear, nor tenderness, seems amiss.

Uncalled, ungreeted, she paused and stood
By the dead man's side, with dry stern eyes,
As eyes must be when the heart weeps blood,
Gazing down in a pained surprise—

As if she had thought some light must break
Under the closed lids when she came,
Or the cold shut lips must stir and make
A last faint whisper to name her name.

What was it all? His widow wept,
His child's bright tears fell quick as rain,
But the stranger woman turned and crept
Out from the darkened room again.

Calmly as one might come and go
Who had no errand beyond good will
And common pity for mourner's woe,
So came and went she, and all was still.

But was it fancy, or had there crept
O'er the dead man's features a tender smile,
As if, like a tired child, he slept
With beautiful heart-warm dreams the while?

SHOWING HOW THEY WERE FOUND, HOW THEY WERE LOST, AND HOW, AFTER MANY YEARS, THEY WERE FOUND AGAIN.

A NOVEL.

BY CHARLES DEMITRY.

CHAPTER XIII.—REGINALD ENTERS ON THE SEARCH FOR THE UNKNOWN PUEBLO.

WHEN Reginald landed at New York and reached his home he found a note from Manuela awaiting him. It was very brief and was written a few days after his departure for Europe. In it she informed him that, after paying a visit to some friends in one of the Western States, she would proceed to Albuquerque. It closed with an invitation to him—if he should still feel sufficiently interested in her to do so—to visit her there on his return from abroad.

As he read what she had written, his mind reverted to his last interview with her. The events of the past few weeks, important as they had been in shaping his destiny, had greatly changed his character. He no longer was the careless young man, aimless in purpose and indifferent in his plans of life that he had been before his journey to Italy.

If he ever had had any doubts regarding the true state of his feelings for Manuela, all those doubts had disappeared, and his mind for some time past had been perplexed with fears lest, at the critical moment, she should prove indifferent to his suit and should decline, in the end, his proposal of marriage.

In all his feelings, as he thus thought of her, were mingled other sentiments that had not had existence previous to his meeting with Melchior. These sentiments he could scarcely analyze. He only knew that he loved him with more than a brother's affection and that he felt drawn to him by a powerful impulse of sympathy. As he thought of this impulse it seemed to him that he loved Melchior for the sake of Manuela, and that since he had known the former, he loved Manuela still more fervently for the sake of her brother.

Before reaching New York he had mapped out his plan of action in his search for the pueblo. After making such preparations as might be necessary in view of his long absence, he would set out on his journey to Durango.

The route he had determined on was by way of Denver to Pueblo, where railroad communication with the South ceased; thence he would proceed to Santa Fé, and then down the Rio Grande to Paso-del-Norte, where he would cross the river into Mexico on his way through Chihuahua to Durango. By taking this route, from the North downward, instead of crossing Texas, he would have the coveted opportunity to see Manuela once more, at her hacienda, near Albuquerque.

Two weeks elapsed before he had so arranged his affairs as to enable him to set out on the long journey that lay before him.

While undoubtedly the dazzling vision of the vast riches secreted somewhere in the region of the Rio Grande lured him on and strengthened his purpose to undertake the uncertain adventure, still he felt drawn to that distant country by even a stronger attraction when he thought of Manuela as expecting him in her new Mexican home.

As he reflected on the treasure that only awaited the grasp of his outstretched hand to become his own, how tantalizing to him was the thought that but a single obstacle lay between him and the almost fabulous riches that would be his—his and Manuela's—if that obstacle were but removed!

He thought of these things on his journey through the West to Denver. As he saw himself approaching the spot where he hoped to meet Manuela—in that half-way locality on the route to Durango—he felt his spirits rise in proportion as he left behind him the old formal life of the civilization of the Atlantic slope and the Valley of the Mississippi, and entered that stranger, newer existence of the Valley of the Rio Grande.

He remained in Denver only a day or two and then took the train for Pueblo, which town at that period was the terminus of the projected railroad from Denver to the Rio Grande.

It was but half a day's journey between the two localities. The route lay through the melancholy region of reddish plains which border the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains, the monotony of which is varied only by the prevailing perspective of pale-leafed sage-bushes, mingled with occasional tufts of starved-out grass and the more vigorous growths of the cactus and the Spanish bayonet. There were glimpses, it is true, of Nature in a less uninviting aspect, as when the train passed amid the low hills which skirt the lofty range like steps leading to the rugged summits; for then the wooded eminences afforded some relief to the eye, wearied with the painful sameness of the sage plains and their desolate uniformity of lifeless expression.

At Pueblo, while awaiting the departure of the stage the next morning, Reginald found the bustle of progress blended with the rudeness of frontier life and the slothful indolence of existence in a Mexican village. The workshops erected by the artisans of the railroad, preparatory to laying the rails to El Moro, one stage further towards Santa Fé, seemed to stare with a sort of crude and brand-new air of curiosity at the ancient adobe houses of the village, in the shade of which their occupants lay at full length lazily smoking cigarettes and gazing apathetically at the engine and the cars and the other evidences of innovation that met their eyes.

But Reginald scarcely had time to notice these things when the stage-driver blew his horn as a notification that he was about to start, and he took his seat in the vehicle.

On leaving Denver he had not failed to provide himself with arms to be used in case of emergency.

He knew that at any moment he might need to have recourse to his weapons to repel violence, for, in the hundreds of miles that lay before him, the occasional meeting with desperate characters was to be expected.

His companions in the stage were four in number. One was a priest, who had charge of a church in Santa Fé, and who was returning hither after a visit to the East; another was a soldier on his way to one of the American forts on the Rio Grande; the third was a rich Mexican ranchero journeying to El Paso, and the fourth was this Mexican's wife.

Don Tomas, the priest, a cheerful little man, announced himself to Reginald, who chanced to be seated next to him, as a native of Santa Fé. Before many hours of the journey had passed, they had become very well acquainted, for the padre spoke English fluently. He was well-informed in regard to the country through which they were traveling, and he instructed Reginald in the history and traditions of New Mexico and Arizona, and the customs and peculiarities of their people.

"Wait," he said, "until we reach Santa Fé. In my library you can read of all these things from the period of the Conquest. It will interest you, my son, for the story of these people is different from all others in the history of Mexico. You will, of course, stop at Santa Fé?"

"I am on my way to Durango," replied Reginald, "and I expect to continue my journey from Santa Fé until I reach Albuquerque, near which town a friend of mine resides."

"Durango?" said Don Tomas, thoughtfully. "A long journey."

"Yes; nearly a thousand miles from Santa Fé."

"Are you going to Durango on business—or, perhaps you think me too curious?"

The priest spoke these last words with a smile, as if apologizing for the question.

"I am going to Durango to examine certain old records that I expect to find there," returned Reginald, who did not feel at liberty to tell Don Tomas, however agreeable and friendly a companion he had proved himself to be, the entire truth regarding his purpose in seeking that distant Mexican city.

Don Tomas asked no more questions on this subject, but, changing the topic of conversation, said:

"You will at least stop with me a day or two when we reach Santa Fé? That will not detain you long from your friends."

Reginald endeavored as skilfully as possible, and so as not to hurt the feelings of the hospitable old gentleman, to evade giving any definite promise. When asked, Did his friend at Albuquerque expect him by a certain day, or know that he was coming? Was it absolutely necessary that he should not delay on the road for even forty-eight hours?—all these interrogations having been put to him rapidly by the good-natured priest—he was forced to give a negative to the questions.

"In that case," exclaimed Don Tomas, triumphantly, "you will take up your abode with me for a week!"

"No," replied Reginald, with a laugh; "not for a week. But, since you are good enough to insist on my remaining with you for a time, I will accept your invitation. Don Tomas, and stay for a day or two."

"Bueno! bueno!" ejaculated the padre, rubbing his hands with satisfaction.

The first day's journey passed without the occurrence of any exciting event. Reginald and his companions lodged at night at a wretched little inn situated in the poverty-stricken village that was their first halting-place.

Here they received intelligence which caused some uneasiness, for they were told by the individual who acted as mayor of the town that certain cattle-drivers from a point about forty miles south, who had arrived in the village the day before, had seen ten or twelve Indians, mounted and in their war-trappings, about a mile from the road, galloping their ponies across a small plain that led from one mountain defile to another.

At this announcement a council was held, and the question of continuing their journey or remaining in the village until more definite advices of the movements of the Indians should be received, was argued. The result of the consultation was that Don Tomas and the Mexican ranchero and his wife determined to remain where they were and await developments, while Reginald—mainly inspired with a spirit of adventure—and the soldier, whose leave-of-absence would not permit him to delay his arrival at the fort, resolved to continue their journey and take the chances of meeting the Indians.

The stage-driver, who assumed charge of the vehicle at this point, a rough but honest fellow, who was known throughout all that region by the sobriquet of "Denver Jack," sat in one corner of the public room of the inn in which the passengers were consulting, silently listening to what each one had to say.

When the matter was settled he rose from his seat.

"Gentlemen," he said, addressing Reginald and the soldier, "if you've a mind to go on to Santa Fé, why I'm the man to drive you there. My business is to take that stage out there from this place to Santa Fé, and I'm a-going through, 'Pachys or no 'Pachys. That's all I've got to say on this subject." And having thus delivered himself, he sauntered out leisurely to attend to the stabling of his horses for the night.

Early the next morning, when the lofty summits of the Sierra Blanca range were tinged with the reddish light from the rising sun, Reginald and the soldier resumed their seats in the stage with Jack on the box. Their fellow-passengers of the previous day gathered about them, wishing them, in the most melancholy tones, good luck on their journey, Don Tomas, especially, imploring heaven's protection on the travelers' heads.

Before their departure the worthy priest slipped a letter into Reginald's hand.

"Here," he said, "is a note to my nephew in Santa Fé, introducing you and instructing him to show you every attention at my house. Make yourself at home, Don Reinaldo, and if you should decide to remain until I shall reach Santa Fé, so much the better. If not, then God have you in His keeping and bring you success in all your enterprises!"

Reginald was touched by the friendly sympathy manifested by the priest. He thanked him warmly and told him that if he should not await his coming at Santa Fé it would be only because he was pressed for time, but that on his return from Durango he would see him again. Then, with another clasp of the hand, they parted, as Jack whirled his long whip around his head and cracked it over the horses with a brisk snap, causing them to set off at a lively pace, while a volley of "Adios" followed the stage as it rolled away rapidly in the direction of the lofty hills that bordered the road ten miles in their front.

For several hours the route lay alternately among hills and along sterile plains, which stretched away to the eastward from the base of the mountains. As they progressed, nothing occurred to disturb the harmony of the journey. The afternoon lengthened into evening, and with the approach of the stage to Las Vegas, where they were to pass the night, the travelers felt that all fear of an attack, if any had been contemplated, was over.

As night came on and the tall mountains that stretched away to the north and south on the right of them began to darken along their slopes, while above their crests the sky was still reddened with the reflection of the setting sun, Jack struck up a wild frontier ballad, which cheered their lonely way.

At last lights twinkled in the distance, and as darkness shut in the scene, the stage entered the village of Las Vegas.

CHAPTER XIV.—IN SANTA FÉ.

THE next morning early Reginald and his companions resumed their journey, and they reached their halting-place at San José without any misadventure.

On the following day they set out for Santa Fé. As they drew near the ancient town, the capital of New Mexico, the country began to present evidences of a larger population. In front of the adobe houses, most of which were one story high, and with their fronts strung, as is customary with the dwellings of the country, with strings of red peppers, they saw gayly-dressed rancheros, some lounging at their doors and some mounted on their horses, whose saddles and bridles flashed with silver ornaments. They passed, too, by ranchos, cornfields and vineyards, and at intervals they were approached by Indians and Mexicans, who offered for sale wine, fruit, tortillas and poultry.

The approach of sunset found them at their journey's end, and as the stage, dusty with travel, entered Santa Fé accompanied by a loud cracking of Jack's whip and followed by the youthful rabble of the place, attired commonly in a single cotton garment which floated in the wind as the wearers ran beside the vehicle, the arrival partook of the character of a sensation which stirred the dull existence of the isolated town.

Reginald's first act was to seek the residence of Don Tomas, with the view of presenting the letter of introduction to the padre's nephew. He had no difficulty in finding the place, for the priest's house was as familiar to the inhabitants as the old church, which it adjoined.

The house was situated within view of the plaza. A tall, grave-looking, middle-aged man was sitting in the doorway smoking a cigarette as Reginald approached. He rose to his feet with a questioning expression on his face as Reginald said:

"Have I the pleasure of addressing Don Manuel Rivas?"

"That is my name, señor. To what do I owe the pleasure of this visit?" was the reply, uttered in very good English.

"Your uncle, Don Tomas Rivas, was good enough to give me a letter of introduction to be presented to you on my arrival in Santa Fé," replied Reginald. "I have just reached here, Don Manuel, and I hasten to bring it to you."

Don Manuel, receiving the note from Reginald's hand, glanced at the latter's name on the envelope, pointed to the chair from which he had risen a moment before, and begged his guest to be seated.

During this interval he read the padre's letter, and, having finished its perusal, said:

"In the name of my uncle, Señor Grey, I make you welcome to this house. He tells me that he probably will leave Cimarron to-day, and in that case we may expect him here to-morrow. Again, señor, let me assure you that this house is at your service as long as you may choose to honor us with your presence."

"Thanks, Don Manuel. I shall avail myself of your kind permission and remain your guest for a day or two. To tell the truth, I feel somewhat fatigued with my journey from Pueblo."

"My uncle," resumed Don Manuel, seating himself by Reginald's side, "makes mention in his letter of Indians on the road, and explains his failure to come on with you to an apprehension of an attack. Did you meet with any trouble on the way?"

Reginald told his host of the fears that had been entertained and of how they had finally come to naught; and the conversation thus begun was continued until a message came to Don Manuel, brought by a servant, that supper was ready. Don Manuel invited Reginald to follow him, and conducted him to a veranda in the rear of the house, where, amid trailing vines and sweet-smelling jasmines and roses which grew clinging to the lattice-work, the table was spread for three, to-wit, himself, Reginald, and Pepita, his daughter, a charming young girl of sixteen, with flashing black eyes.

The day had been warm, but the night was cool and pleasant. The air was redolent of the perfume of fragrant flowers, the odor of which came to Reginald as he sat, after supper, under the front veranda and conversed with his host.

After a while, Pepita appeared and took a seat in the shadow of the doorway.

"Do you play on the guitar, señorita?" asked Reginald, whose glance had fallen on a guitar which hung on the wall.

"Oh, yes, señor," was the reply, given with an arch laugh and the merest suggestion of a slight shrug of the shoulders, as if in deprecation of her musical powers.

"Then, will you not favor me with some of your Mexican songs?"

"If it pleases you, señor, I will do my best. But my songs are very simple. They are only the old ballads of the people about here. I am afraid that they will disappoint you."

She took the guitar from the wall and ran her fingers over the strings in a light prelude.

"I will sing you," she said, "the song we call 'La Noche Triste'—the sad night. It is known to all our people. It is melancholy, but it is true, for it tells of one who fled from the massacre of 1680, when the Indians of New Mexico rose against the Spaniards and killed them all."

Reginald listened with a sudden interest. The date, 1680—the massacre of the Spaniards in that year—recalled to him strangely the story of St. Evremond Deville and the unfortunate Fra Pablo, his friend and companion.

As Pepita, in a low, melodious voice, sang the mournful ballad, with its plaintive accompaniment, which recorded the rising of the New Mexican Indians against the oppressing Spaniards, he sat absorbed in thought. The words portrayed the experiences of one who had escaped the sudden vengeance that fell on priest and layman alike in the fatal year 1680, and expressed the singer's grief for the death of his friends and companions.

Reginald understood enough of Spanish to follow the meaning of the song, and when Pepita ceased he thanked her for the pleasure her singing of the old ditty had given him.

"Your uncle," he said, turning to Don Manuel, "told me that in his library are many works that give the history and chronicles of New Mexico. With your permission I shall examine them to-morrow. The song that Señorita Pepita has just sung has aroused my interest in the annals of your country."

"You will find in the library much to interest you," replied his host, "and to-morrow you can look at the books at your leisure. There are several old manuscripts there also—one in particular, written more than a hundred years ago by a certain reverend father of great learning, Fray Gregorio by name, one of my uncle's early predecessors in Santa Fé, who had charge of the very church which you see near us."

"These books are all in the Spanish language, I presume?"

"Yes. You are familiar with Spanish?"

"I have a fair knowledge of the language, but I doubt whether it is sufficient to enable me to cope successfully with an old manuscript, certainly very dingy and most probably in some places almost illegible. But if Señorita Pepita would act as my assistant——"

"It will give me pleasure to do so," said the young girl, "if you should meet with any difficulty in reading the manuscript."

"And if I were to ask you to read it to me and translate as you read?"

Pepita smiled coquettishly.

"Perhaps my English may fail me," she said.

"There is no danger of that I am sure. But I fear you may think me very troublesome."

"Oh, it will be no trouble! I will read to you from Fray Gregorio's manuscript how the holy Father Marco de Nizza discovered in the time of Don Antonio de Mendoza the Seven Cities of Cibola, now known as the country of the Zuñi Indians, and how Don Francisco Vasquez de Coronado, the next year, marched with an army from the Mexican province of which he was governor and made himself master of the Seven Cities. It is almost a romance, I assure you!"

"You will have an attentive listener. And now will you sing another of your charming songs, or will you sing again the ballad of 'La Noche Triste'?"

She took her guitar, and for an hour or more, in the intervals of conversation, she sang the strange, weird songs that she had heard from her infancy, and which had been current for generations on the Rio Grande and in Chihuahua in Mexico. The tones of her voice were as sweet as the notes of a flute, and her gestures were so expressive that, but for his steadfast devotion to the absent Manuela, Reginald might have yielded himself a willing captive at the shrine of his graceful hostess, whose sylph-like shape and dark eyes that night haunted his dreams, mingled with vague visions that her songs had evoked—visions in which figured the shape of the prisoner of San Juan de Ulua, and which never left him until the moment when the voice of Don Manuel was heard calling him from his sleep to see the sun rise above the summit of the Sierra Madre.

DEATH AT A CHARITY FAIR.

EXCITING SCENES AT MADISON SQUARE GARDEN.

THE Madison Square Garden building was the scene, on the evening of Wednesday, April 21st, of a disaster which resulted in the instant death or fatal wounding of four persons and the infliction of injuries more or less severe upon eighteen others.

The building was occupied by a fair for the benefit of the Hahnemann Hospital, and was especially well filled on this particular evening. The moment before the disaster the interior of the Garden presented a brilliant scene. There was a great throng walking up and down the avenue formed by the rows of booths and stands of flowers which stretched from the main entrance at Madison Avenue to the further end of the immense hall. Around the different tables were clusters of people admiring the articles offered for sale by the ladies in attendance, who were gratified by the large number of customers among the visitors. The Ninth Regiment Band—which had occupied the balcony just above the entrance at the Madison Square side since the opening of the fair—was enlivening the evening with music. All of the attractions of the fair, excepting the art gallery, were open and drawing their share of patronage. The art gallery had been closed a few minutes before.

Five minutes later the people who were in that part of the Garden nearest Madison Avenue had their attention attracted to a noise proceeding from the direction of the balcony occupied by the musicians. In the second story at this end of the building there were three apartments occupied by the fair, all three entered from the balcony. At the south-west corner of the Garden was a large room used for a restaurant. This was conducted by Mrs. Dr. Helmuth. A portion of this apartment had been partitioned off with a curtain to form a dancing hall, and was entered by a door situated near the centre of the balcony. North of this was a door leading into the room which had been used as an art gallery since the opening of the fair. At first the impression was received that there was no occasion for alarm, and that nothing more serious had happened than the fall of some plaster from the ceiling, and, indeed, this impression prevailed for some time after the fatal crash came. The noise rapidly grew louder until it resembled a succession of explosions. Immediately the scene became one of indescribable confusion. A white cloud of dust rolled out through the doors of the restaurant and dancing-hall. Then through the enveloping dust came young men and women from the middle door. They had been sitting about the dance-hall or engaged in dancing. Men and women also rushed in terror from the restaurant—those who had been in attendance and those who had been sitting at the tables enjoying the refreshments before them. Many of the young women fainted and were carried down the stairs in the arms of the men who accompanied them. Their faces, pale with fright, were made ghastly by the lime-dust which had covered them from head to foot. Many women in the west part of the Garden, who were not near the immediate scene of danger, shrieked and fell fainting upon the floor. The musicians, who had stopped playing at the first sign of peril, hastily gathered up their instruments and fled down the stairs leading down on either side.

As yet no person outside the three rooms on the second floor had realized what had happened within the rooms. Soon the final appalling crash came, and a volume of dust rolled out through the building that partially obscured the brilliant lights which illuminated the interior. A murmur of terror ran through the crowd. By this time every face was turned towards the scene of the disaster. Several began to speak of fire, but were instantly hushed. Women shrieked in different parts of the house; the gentlemen present engaged themselves in trying to quiet their fears. Here and there a man had presence of mind enough to call out that nothing was the matter, and that all was over. Otherwise a panic might have seized the people that would have resulted in great loss of life. One of the managers quickly sought the leader of the band and had him call the musicians together, and soon they were playing in their places on the balcony. The effect of the music was instantaneous, and helped greatly to reassure the ladies who had been seized with fright.

A large force of police and firemen was soon employed in extricating the dead and wounded from the débris of the upper portion of the Madison Avenue wall, which had fallen outward to the street. One of the first victims reached was Mrs. W. A. Ogden Hegeman, wife of a prominent lawyer of this city. Mrs. Hegeman had just left the dancing-room when the wall fell out, and was found by a fireman hanging with her head caught between two timbers. She was taken down alive, but died on the way to Bellevue Hospital. Mrs. Annie Willetts, of Bayside, L. I., a visitor at the house of ex-Collector Smythe, was taken out dead, as was also Mary Ann Connolly, maid of Mrs. Hegeman, whose body was found near that of her mistress.

Colonel William M. Tileston, one of the editors of Forest and Stream, was found partly buried under the ruins, terribly injured about both legs and with a compound fracture of the left arm. He was taken to St. Luke's Hospital, where, after six hours of terrible suffering, he died at four o'clock Thursday morning.

Gladstone's Victory in Midlothian.

VOTERS came from far and wide in order to record their votes for Mr. Gladstone, and it is mentioned that a doctor well-known in Edinburgh had traveled all the way from Algiers so that he might give his vote for Mr. Gladstone. At one station an old man gave his vote who had not been out of his house since the last election. At Gore Bridge an old Liberal farmer drove up to the booth muffled with flannel and well-nigh smothered with wraps. He had risen from a sick bed determined, as he said, "to vote for Gladstone though it should be the last act of his life." Literally, the halt, the lame and the blind found their way to the polling places. Everybody who was at all physically capable of giving a vote seems to have been at the polling booths. The numbers evince that the poll was by far the largest ever recorded in the county. When the result was declared, showing that Mr. Gladstone had the substantial majority of 211 over the son of the Duke of Buccleugh, not to mention 200 fagot votes faithfully given for Lord Dalkeith, tremendous cheering ensued on the part of the crowd who had confidently and partially awaited the issue. They waited for nearly two hours to learn the result, and when it was finally made known they rushed off to George Street, where Mr. Gladstone was known to be a guest at Lord Rosebery's town house. Here an immense multitude was already assembled. There were loud cries for Mr. Gladstone, at every mention of whose name the cheering broke forth afresh. When the member for Midlothian presented himself in the balcony of the House, accompanied by Lord Rosebery, the enthusiasm of the multitude was unbounded. Mr. Gladstone said they had been engaged in an arduous struggle, which had been carried on by the strength of that sentiment expressed in the County of Midlothian, which they then knew to be the sentiment of the nation. They had now to show that they could use the strength which they had shown themselves to possess, and turn the victory the Liberals had obtained both there and elsewhere to good account for the common and universal benefit of the country. The right honorable gentleman added: "God prosper England, Scotland and Ireland, and all who dwell in them, be they Liberals or be they Tories! For us who are Liberals, may we be enabled to persevere in bearing what your forefathers would have called a firm testimony to our cause through evil report, as it has been for the last few years, and through good report, as we trust it will now be. Your opponents we heartily wish the benefit of reflection. Our desire is that they should be opponents no longer, but that we should all, with one heart and one mind, devote ourselves to the performance of our public duties in the maintenance of the interests, the honor, and the high character and repute of a great and glorious empire."

The World's Steel Production.

THE total capacity of the steel mills at the present time throughout the world is estimated at about 3,900,000 tons for the year's production. In the United Kingdom there are 120 Bessemer converters built, of which over 80 are at work, and the annual yield from these is considered as from 750,000 to 800,000 tons. The American make is estimated at 750,000 tons, the next largest producer being Germany, which is considered by many to be capable of the greatest expansion among all the steel-making countries. Less than two years ago there were 25 converters in Prussia working, out of 30 built, and turning out 275,000 tons, which was increased by the works in Saxony and the Palatinate to 400,000; and since the revival of trade fresh converters have been put into operation. The estimate of the French steel manufacture is about 275,000 tons; that of Belgium, 150,000; of Austria, with 32 converters, 250,000, and of Sweden and Russia, 150,000. Of the Bessemer converters in England, the largest are two 10-ton ones at Sir John Brown & Co.'s works, in Sheffield, the others varying between three and eight tons in capacity, and out of the 54 British steel works 17 only have rail mills. Looking at the probable extension of railways for the next twelve months, it is difficult to see how all this large output of steel rails is to be utilized.

Grain Prospects of the Summer.

THE great grain-producing districts of the United States have entered upon the growing season with excellent prospects for good crops. An analysis of the Signal Service Weather Reports from December 1st, 1879, to March 1st, 1880, shows that all these districts, except California and the Upper Missouri Valley, have received an abundance of water from the Winter rains and snows. The excess of water over the average for the Winter months was as follows: Upper Mississippi Valley, 1.05 inches; in the States bordering on the upper lakes, 3.65 inches; Minnesota, 1.74 inches; Lower Missouri Valley, 0.72 of an inch; Lower Mississippi Valley, 0.88 of an inch; Ohio Valley, 5.51 inches; Tennessee, 8.61 inches; in the States bordering on the lower lakes, 2.44 inches; Oregon, 2.89 inches; and New England, 0.93 of an inch. In the other districts the deficiencies were as follows: Middle States, 0.47 of an inch; Upper Missouri Valley, about one inch; California Coast, 2.30 inches; Eastern Gulf States (including Florida, where the excess was 0.62 of an inch), 2.85 inches; and Western Gulf States, 3.02 inches.

Public Education in Wisconsin.

WISCONSIN, during the past year, has expended $2,513,301.83 upon her public schools, which have been largely increased both in number and efficiency. The State has 5,868 school districts, not including the independent cities, which number twenty-seven. The school population is 483,453; the attendance during the year was 293,296. Adding to this the number of children attending other schools, the total number receiving instruction proves to be 324,582. There are 6,844 teachers employed, the male teachers receiving in the country districts $37.75 per month, and the female teachers $25.72. The average salary paid to male teachers in the independent cities was $628.51 per annum, and to the female teachers $341.89—a decrease of 5.15. The highest yearly salaries paid to male teachers are: In Racine, $1,500; in Mineral Point and Oshkosh, $1,200; in Madison, $1,000, and in Milwaukee, $3,300. Female teachers received in nine cities $500 and upwards; in Racine, $800, and in Milwaukee $1,200. Superintendent Whitford mentions the need of better qualified and more permanent teachers, the grading of the country schools and the general institution of the township system in place of the district system.

What is Lawful on Sunday.

THE law prohibiting the transaction of business on Sunday has lately been interpreted in two rather curious cases, one being decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan, and the other by the Supreme Court of Maine. In the former case, a Methodist preacher had made an appeal to his congregation during the usual Sunday services for money and subscriptions for the purchase of a church building. The defendant in this action subscribed $25, but afterwards refused to pay it, and when suit was brought against him, he pleaded that the subscription or promise, being made on Sunday, was illegal, and therefore could not be enforced. The statutes of Michigan prohibit, under penalty of a fine, every person from doing on Sunday "any manner of labor, business, or work, except only works of necessity or charity." The Supreme Court says, that taking subscriptions on Sunday is not a work of necessity, for the reason that it can be done at another time. There is no doubt, says the court, that this is the most convenient time to attend to the matter, but it might for the same reason have been the most convenient time for doing other business, such as the trading of horses, the hiring of laborers, and the general settlement of accounts, had the persons present been disposed to engage in such transactions. But the taking of subscriptions, as the court holds, is a work of charity, which comes within the exception made by the statute. All the necessary or usual work, says the opinion, connected with religious worship is work of charity. Otherwise the preacher, the organist, and the sexton would violate the law whenever they performed their church duties on Sunday. The subscription was, therefore, held to be lawful, and the defendant was bound to pay it. In the Maine case, the pivotal question was whether it is lawful to walk on Sunday in the highways for exercise. The plaintiff had sued the City of Portland to recover damages for injuries received by reason of a defective sidewalk. He had gone out one Sunday afternoon to take a walk for recreation; he stopped in a saloon and got a glass of beer, and on his return home fell on the sidewalk and broke his leg. The statute of Maine is substantially the same as that of Michigan, already quoted. It makes work, labor, or business on Sunday unlawful, but except works of charity or necessity. Under the facts which have been cited, the city claimed that even if the highway were defective, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The Supreme Court holds otherwise. Walking on Sunday for exercise in the open air, it says, is not unlawful. Stopping for a glass of beer may have been a violation of the statute; but unless it contributed to the accident it was no excuse for a defective highway, and could not exempt the city from liability.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

Professor Curtius, accompanied by a Government land surveyor, has gone to Greece to complete the archæological exploration at Olympia. For this purpose the Emperor William has granted the sum of $20,000.

The Russian Geographical Society contemplates issuing, in concert with the other scientific societies of Russia, a descriptive work on Siberia, in view of the approaching tercentenary of the occupation of that country by the Russians.

The Smithsonian Institution has received from Professor Foerster, of Berlin, the announcement of the discovery by Palisa, at Pola, on April 10th, 1880, of a planet of the eleventh magnitude, in 13h. 0m. right ascension, and 12 degrees 8 minutes south declination, with a daily motion of 7 minutes north.

There has long been considerable difference of opinion among the geologists as to whether or not coal existed under the City of London or in its vicinity. This question has been set at rest by the deep boring recently made at MEUX Brewery, on the Tottenham Court Road. Not a trace of the coal measures was found.

The Exploration of the Sahara Desert with a view to the construction of a railway across it has now fairly begun. Colonel Flatter's expedition left Wargla on the 6th ult. on their southward march. In addition to the leader, the party comprises nine scientific officers and twelve French soldiers, besides numerous camel-drivers, chiefly belonging to the Chambaas tribe.

In a Recent Note to the Vienna Academy Herr Selzer offers an estimate (based on numeration) of the probable number of optic nerve-fibres and of retinal cones in the human eye. The number of the former he supposes to be about 438,000, that of the latter 3,360,000. This gives seven or eight cones for each nerve-fibre, supposing all fibres of the optic nerve to be connected with cones, all equally distributed among them.

The German Chemical Society, in entering upon its thirteenth year, has elected as president Professor H. Kopp, of Heidelberg, who for some time past has devoted himself almost exclusively to the chronicling of the history of chemistry. At the same time Professor Roscoe, of Manchester, and Professor Marignac, of Geneva, who was compelled a year since, by advanced age, to relinquish active professional duties, were elected to honorary membership.

A Singular Discovery was recently made in Syria. Some woodcutters felled a venerable oak in the forest of Defennileg. It was found to be hollow and was soon brought to the ground with a crash. A human skeleton, in excellent preservation, was disclosed. It is conjectured that, while engaged in hooting, he climbed the tree for some purpose and slipped incautiously into the hollow trunk, from which there was no release, and he probably died of starvation.

News Just Received announces the arrival at Kassala of the two German African travelers, Dr. Nook and Baron Holshausen. They crossed the desert from Suakin to Kassala in fourteen days. Kassala, the residence of a pasha, is the centre of the German dealers in wild beasts. Many German travelers originally started from here on their tours, such as Florian, Werner, Cohn, Dr. Schweinfurth, Heuglin. Dr. Nook and Baron Holshausen intend to move in a southeasterly direction towards the Habat and Dinder.

Herr Dahlstrom has prepared plans for the proposed ship canal from the Baltic to the North Sea. Its course will be from the Bay of Kiel to Brunsbuttel, in the estuary of the Elbe. Its uniform depth will be 29 feet 9 inches; its width at the surface of the water, 160 feet; at the bottom, 64 feet. By a peculiar system of reservoirs and locks the depth can be increased to 25 or 26 feet, which will even float the König Wilhelm, the largest German ironclad. The canal can be completed in six years, and will cost $18,750,000.

The New Railway which ascends to the old crater of Vesuvius is constructed on the American double iron-rope system. There are two lines of rails, each provided with a car divided into two compartments and capable of holding six persons. While one car goes up, the other comes down, thus establishing a counterpoise which considerably economizes the steam of the stationary traction engine. The incline is extremely steep, commencing at forty degrees, increasing to sixty-three degrees, and continuing at fifty degrees to the summit. Every possible precaution has been taken against accident, and the railway itself is protected against possible flows of lava by an enormous wall. The ascent will be made in about ten minutes, while before it required from one to two hours.

The Report of Professor Cook, State Geologist of New Jersey, is one of the most interesting documents bearing the imprint of official sanction, and will be eagerly sought for by all who are interested in the vast and varied mineral resources of the State. New Jersey contains to-day nearly 300 miles of cro-openings of iron. Of the 200 mines in operation in 1873, when the financial panic prostrated the iron interest, only 30 kept in operation throughout the full period of depression. The gradual decline from 1873 to 1878 was from 665,000 tons to 390,000 tons, while in 1876 and 1877 it was reduced to so low a minimum as to be scarcely worth counting. In 1878 it partially revived, and the product reached 410,000 tons, and in 1879 it again came into full activity, a new impetus being given to the work of prospecting and exploration. Wages are 35 per cent. above that of 1876 and 1877, with such increasing demand for labor that men are returning from the West and from the coal mines elsewhere to their old homes. The report devotes considerable space to the proper drainage of lands, the constitution of soils in different parts of the State with a view to their adaptability to special crops, the large and growing pottery interest, the marls, etc.

MADAME LIN-FU-JEU, the wife of the Chinese Minister in Berlin, gave her first entertainment the other evening. JOHN EAKIN, a recent graduate of Washington College, Pennsylvania, has sailed from San Francisco for Hong Kong, on his way to Siam to assume the Professorship of English Language and Literature in the Royal College at Bangkok. His engagement is for four years, at a salary of $1,800, with the prospect of permanence and higher pay. Dr. McFarland, formerly a Presbyterian missionary, and now President of the Royal College.

NORDENSKJÖLD and his lieutenant, Palander, during their last week's stay in Paris, had only twenty-two hours' sleep. While at the French capital they were present at twenty-nine banquets and lunches, and listened to one hundred and forty-seven speeches and three hundred and seventy-eight toasts, to which they replied in twenty-four speeches, of which twenty were made by Nordenskjöld and four by his lieutenant. The statistician who is responsible for these figures very wisely abstains from any attempt to compute the number of well-meaning Parisians who shook hands with the couple, saying, "Well, I suppose you find this climate more agreeable than that at the North Pole?"

EDMOND DE PRESSENSÉ, D. D., the Protestant divine and well-known writer on theological subjects, has been appointed Secretary of the French Legation at Washington. After the establishment of the French Republic he became a member of the Assembly, and was a strong supporter of Thiers. In 1849, when twenty-five years of age, he published his first theological work, and since that time his energies have been devoted to the maintenance of the freedom of the Church from State interference and aid as the means of solving important moral and social questions. His wife, a Swiss lady, has written several religious and educational works.

CHARLES G. FAIRMAN, NEW SUPERINTENDENT OF THE INSURANCE DEPARTMENT.—FROM A PHOTO. BY VAN AKEN, ELMIRA.

CHARLES G. FAIRMAN,

SUPERINTENDENT OF THE INSURANCE DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK.

CHARLES G. FAIRMAN, editor of the Elmira Advertiser, was appointed, by Governor Cornell, Superintendent of the Insurance Department of the State of New York on the 14th of April, and was unanimously confirmed by the Senate on the following day. Mr. Fairman was born in Niagara County, N. Y., in October, 1825, making him now in his fifty-fifth year. He learned his trade as printer in the county of his birth, and removed to Elmira about the time that he attained his majority, in 1846. He began the publication of a weekly newspaper there, at that time named the Republican, and remained with it until it suspended. A brother started the Advertiser as a small daily sheet about 1856, and soon after Mr. Fairman joined him in its publication. He has since continued his connection with it, except at intervals, up to the present time. He was a Whig after the manner of Thurlow Weed and Seward, when there were such persons as Whigs, and has been a "Conkling Republican" since there were Republicans. The only elective office ever held by him was as Alderman of Elmira for one term. He served as Postmaster of the city from 1869 to 1877, and was Deputy Clerk of the Assembly in 1864-'5. He has always been a public-spirited citizen, and extremely active and bitterly partisan in his politics. He is one of the representative country journalists of the State, and is to deliver the annual address before the New York State Press Association in Troy next June. His appointment gives great satisfaction to all persons in the neighborhood of his home, where he is known as a thoroughly upright and honest man.

THE RT. REV. WILLIAM H. ELDER,

COADJUTOR TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF CINCINNATI.

THIS prelate of the Roman Catholic Church in this country was born and educated in Baltimore. Resolved to enter the ministry, he pursued his divinity course at Mount St. Mary's, and at the College of the Propaganda at Rome, where he was ordained in 1846. After being one of the professors and president of Mount St. Mary's College, Emmetsburg, he was appointed Bishop of Natchez, and consecrated May 31, 1857. His diocese embraced the State of Mississippi, the comparatively small number of Catholics scattered through the State making this position one of great labor and trial. Emigration rarely turned to the States where slave labor alone was used, and though the Catholic services were offered within the limits of Mississippi before an English settler had landed on the Atlantic coast, the Old Church found few adherents, and its progress was slow, making the career of bishop and clergy one of great self-denial and sacrifice. During the late war a colonel commanding at Natchez issued an order directing all clergymen to pray for the President of the United States. This Bishop Elder and his clergy declined to obey, on the ground that a colonel in the United States army had no right to introduce new forms of prayers into the liturgy of the Church. He appealed to his labors among the sick and wounded of both armies, to the death of one of his priests in their service; but Bishop Elder was arrested, and conveyed to Vidalia, La.

A few years ago, in an accident on the Mississippi, the Bishop risked his life to save a person, showing throughout the disaster the greatest coolness and courage.

The thoughtfulness for others there evinced was made more strikingly manifest during the visitation of the yellow fever in the Summer of 1878. He was in constant attendance on the sick till he was himself prostrated, and the report of his death reached all the Eastern papers, and he was entered among the deceased in the official list published annually at Rome.

He fortunately escaped with his life. Shortly after, he was appointed by the Pope coadjutor, with the right of succession, to Archbishop Alemany of San Francisco, but declined the honor, preferring to remain at his post at Natchez. In March last he was appointed coadjutor to the embarrassed Archbishop of Cincinnati, Dr. Purcell, also with the right of succession, and, accepting the high office, he entered upon his new duties on Sunday morning, April 18th, attending Mass at the cathedral, where he preached, and afterwards confirmed a class of children. In a few days he will visit the archbishop in his retreat in Brown County, at the Ursuline Convent, before assuming the duties of unparalleled difficulty with which he is compelled to cope.

RT. REV. WILLIAM H. ELDER, COADJUTOR TO ARCHBISHOP PURCELL OF CINCINNATI.

A CURIOUS MIRAGE.

A CORRESPONDENT at Memphis, Tenn., writes as follows: "A singular spectacle was witnessed by the officers of the steamer Shields a few nights ago, as she lay at what is known as Commerce Landing, on the Mississippi River, forty miles below this city. The boat was landed by Mr. Elisha Evans, the pilot on watch, for the purpose of taking on freight and passengers for Memphis. The night was dark and very misty or foggy. The boat laid with her starboard side against the bank, and a bright pine torch hung over her starboard bow. As Mr. Evans came down out of the pilot-house he looked up towards the heavens, and, lo! the scene which the illustration represents met his bewildered gaze. He says he was slightly scared at first, thinking it was some descending steamer running in the fog and headed square at them, and he was listening breathlessly for the crashing sounds which would attend the expected collision; but as no crash came he remembered reading in books of mirages at sea, which reflect the shadow of ships in an inverted position, and his fright passed quickly away. In this instance, however, the shadow of the steamer on the fog did not show the boat in an inverted position, but as represented in this sketch. Mr. Evans says he awakened his partner, Mr. Wilbur, and told him to look up in the clouds. He gazed upwards, half-asleep, and bewilderingly exclaimed: 'Great God, there's a steamboat coming down at us from out of the air!'"

GENERAL CALIXTO GARCIA YNIGUEZ.

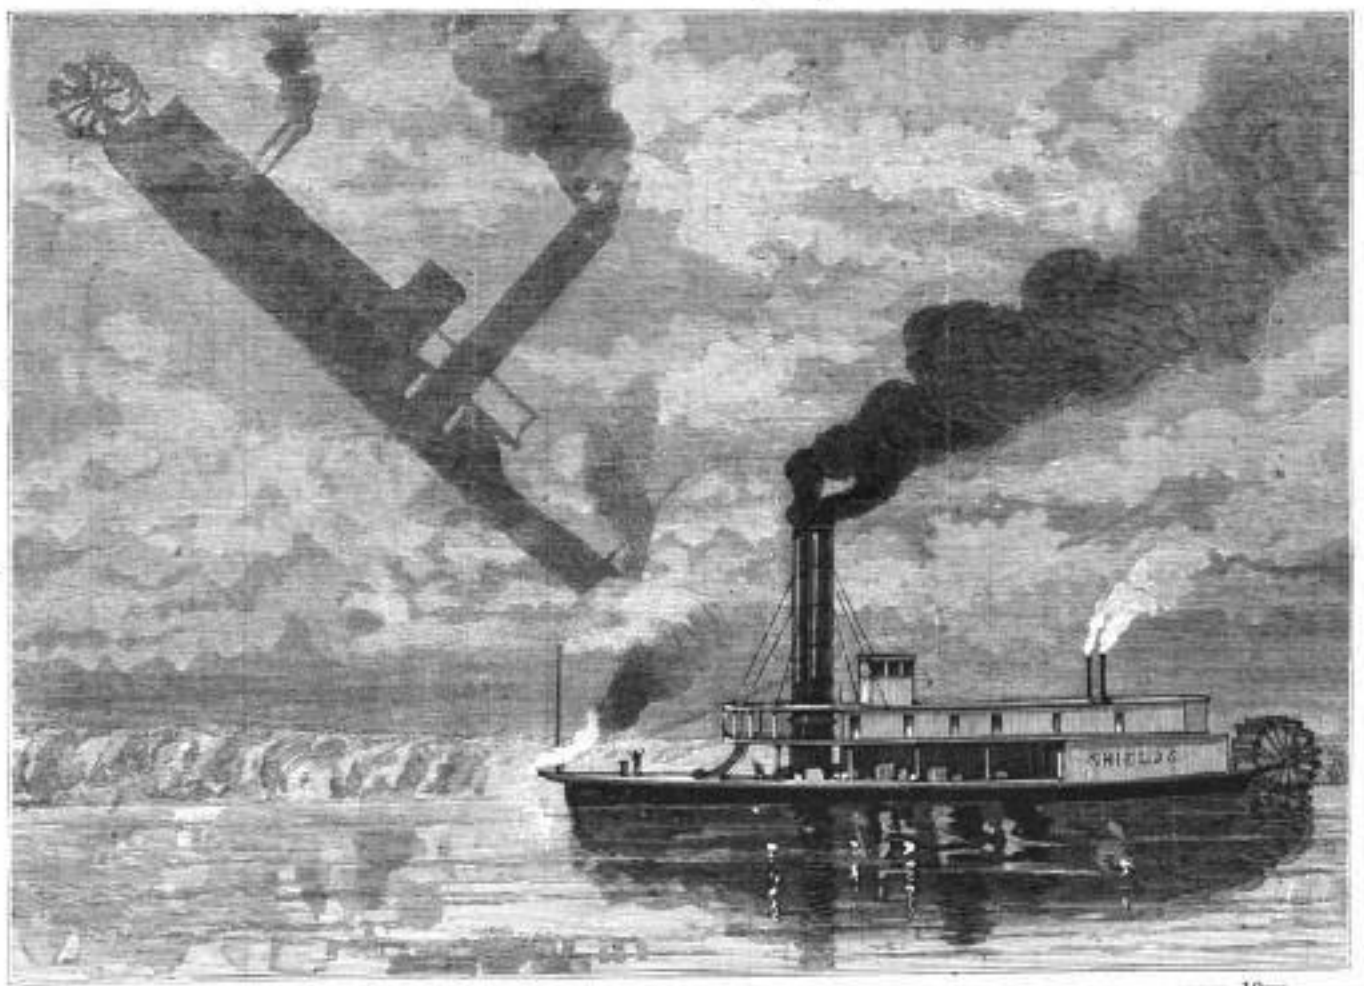
THE leader of the present Cuban revolution was born in the City of Holguin, Cuba, in 1842, of native parents, who were moderately well off in country property, and who educated him for a profession, which, however, he did not follow. On the demise of his father, yielding to his naturally retiring disposition, he contented himself with assuming management of his own and his mother's estate as a planter, harboring in his youthful mind an inveterate dislike to the colonial rule of Spain. When the stalwart patriots, Cespedes and Aguilera, gathered a few followers at the small town of Baire, on the 10th of October, 1868, and raised the standard of rebellion against Spain, swearing to conquer Cuba's independence or perish in the attempt, the subject of this sketch was enrolled among the first, being given the command of a company as captain, and assigned to his own district to raise material, both men and means, among the yeomanry for the then infant republican army of Cuba. In this duty he succeeded beyond the most sanguine expectations, and, as a reward, was subsequently given the command of the contingent, which rose in the course of a year to over one thousand men. He received about this time his brevet rank as colonel, for gallantry in sundry preliminary encounters with the Spanish regulars.

On the 9th of March, 1870, he met the Spanish forces at Masio, under the command of Colonel Gomez Dieguez, numbering six hundred men, gave them battle and routed them, killing and wounding two hundred of the enemy and capturing the balance of four hundred, with all the arms, munitions and train. For this gallant exploit he was promoted to brigadier-general, and, later on, was created major-general after sundry victories plucked from his superior enemies.

Through a private personal act in 1874, involving imprudence on his part, he was surprised and captured by a raiding Spanish party while temporarily spending the night outside of his headquarters in a small contiguous settlement. Upon being taken, his first impulse was to draw his revolver, and, before his captors could prevent it, he fired a bullet through the roof of his mouth, penetrating the nasal organ, the parietal bone, and coming out on his forehead between the eyebrows, leaving a peculiar hollow scar for life. Contrary to their sanguinary practice, the Spanish Government, represented by General Concha, spared his life, and he was cured in their own camp hospital, and then removed to Cabañas Fort, in Havana Harbor, being afterwards transferred as a prisoner to Spain, in 1875, and immured within a dungeon in the famous and ancient Castle of Santoña, located in the north of Spain. Here he languished during three weary years, being supported from the generous voluntary contributions of sundry wealthy Cubans, until his release, which occurred in 1878, when the peace negotiations were entered into in Cuba.

Meanwhile his family had left the island, finding a friendly refuge in New York, where his grateful countrymen contributed to their support. Here he joined them just after the Zanjon peace, against which he protested as being contrary to his solemn oath taken in 1868. Other stalwart spirits joined him in this manly course, and a revolutionary committee was formed to devise plans and means to prosecute the war for independence against Spain. The magnitude of the undertaking bade fair for a time to baffle his projects, but by dint of untiring perseverance order gradually came out of chaos, and sundry clubs were formed in this and other cities of the Union, as well as in Europe, Cuba, and others of the West Indies.

All this has culminated in the present formidable movement for the prosecution of the war, it having been renewed with increased vigor in the Eastern Province in September of 1879 by Generals Moncada, Maceo, Jr., and others, under the auspices of General Garcia, as the master-spirit of the movement. Several successful landings have since been effected on the island despite the Spanish cruisers, and, lately, General Garcia, in person, has led one expedition to land in the "ever faithful isle," to assume the general direction of the war and form a provisional revolutionary government, to issue a public manifesto to all nations, setting forth the facts and grievances thereof, out of a due sense of regard for public opinion and to subserve ultimate ends in the course of the struggle.



Señor Lamadriz being at Key West during his absence, Señor José Martí has taken the Presidency of the Revolutionary Committee.

General Carlos Rolloff—a Pole—left for Jamaica on the 13th of April to lead another expedition to Cuba.

The one conducted by General Garcia succeeded in eluding the pursuit of the Spaniards,

OUR THEATRES.

AT the Fifth Avenue Theatre "Hearts of Oak" is followed by a new play by Mr. George H. Jessup, entitled "A Gentleman from Nevada," in which that versatile actor, Mr. J. B. Polk, will sustain the principal character.

Miss Annie Pixley has been replaced at the Standard by the Weathersby Goodwin Frolicques.

The Widow Bedott still fascinates her numerous admirers—drawing them to Haverly's; while the "Mastodon Minstrels" are filling Niblo's, and Lotta is charming Brooklyn.

Daly's announces the "Brook."

At the Union Square "My Partner," considerably crisped, bids fair to hold the boards.

The Bijou Opera House, Broadway, should be better known. It is a charming little theatre, exquisitely gotten up, and the performances, which consist of Opera di Camera, are veritable bon bons in their way. It is just the place of amusement to lounge into when one is in the happiest vein.

FUN.

MAUD (an aristocratic child): "How pretty and clever you are, mother! I'm so glad you married into our family!"

"WHAT pretty children, and how much they look alike," says C., during a first visit at a friend's house. "They are twins," his friend explains. "What both of 'em?" exclaims C., greatly interested.

A FRENCH artist gave his last work to a porter to convey to the Salon. "Be careful, be careful," said he, "the picture is scarcely dry." "Oh never mind," exclaimed the porter, "my clothes are old."

MINNIE, aged four (her kitten being dead): "Has pussy gone to heaven, papa?" P.: "No, darling." M.: "Why not?" P.: "They don't want cats in heaven." M.: "Would they scratch the angels?"

THE QUESTION SETTLED.—She—"But do not you think that too much smoke is injurious to the mind?" He—"I cannot say I do. In my own case I have found it rather to increase than lessen the mental vigor." She—"Oh!"

A CLASS of little "primary" children were busily engaged in their reading-lessons. They read in order something like the following: "The hat is in the box." "The man is in the box." "The rat is in the box." "The cat is in the box." When suddenly up came a little chubby hand, the signal for permission to speak. "Well, what is it, Mattie?" said the teacher. "I should fink 'e box 'ood be full after a while."

A LITTLE five-year-old boy in Essex was riding out with his mother a few days since when they were overtaken by a thunder-shower. After a sharp flash of lightning the little fellow looked up into his mother's face, saying with a serious air, and with head turned on one side, "Mamma, I guess God scratched a pretty big match that time, don't you?"

DR. HENDERSON, of Galashiels, in the course of one of his pastoral calls, came to the house of a woman who had lost her husband a short time before, and had been left with a large and non-productive family; naturally the minister inquired after the health of the household. "Weel," said the woman, "we're all richt, except puir Davie; he's sair troubled wi' a bad leg, and not fit for wark." The doctor could not recollect who Davie was, but, as in duty bound, he prayed that Davie's affliction might be blessed to him, and also that it might not be of long duration. But going home and consulting his wife, he said, "Davie, Davie! which of the boys is Davie?" "Hoot, hoot! you ought to ken who Davie is," she replied. "Davie is nae son, Davie is just the cuddy" (donkey).

PHILANTHROPIST AND POOR WIDOW.—"Kind gracious, sir, I am the most unfortunate creature in the world. I want to get my baby christened, but the pope demands two rubles, and I have not ruble note, go straight to the pope, pay him his single copeck." "Is that all? Take this five-christening fee, and bring me out three rubles change." With joyful promptitude the recipient of bounty entered the church, whence she presently emerged with three silver rubles, which she handed over to her benefactor, expressing her heartfelt gratitude for his timely succor, and her surprise at his apparently disinterested kindness. "My good woman," answered the philanthropist, with a beaming smile, "your astonishment is uncalled for. You see, I am one of those people who cannot bear to contemplate the unhappiness of their fellow-creatures. I must always see joyous faces around me. Besides, everybody concerned in this transaction has profited by it. The pope has got his fee; your child will be christened; your mind is at ease; and I have derived three good silver rubles from a benevolent action and—a bad five-ruble note!"

AROUND THE WORLD.

A FAME that is world-wide and acquired in the short space of a few years, must have true merit for its support. Dr. Pierce's Family Medicines have gained such fame, and the foreign orders for his Golden Medical Discovery (the greatest blood purifier of the age), for his Pleasant Purgative Pellets (little sugar-coated pills), his Favorite Prescription (woman's best friend) and other remedies became so great, that a branch of the World's Dispensary has been established in London, England, for their manufacture. From this depot they are shipped to every part of Europe, and to the East Indies, China, Japan and other countries. Their sale in both North and South America is perfectly enormous, and increases yearly. World's Dispensary Medical Association, Proprietors, Buffalo, N. Y., and Great Russell Street Buildings, London, Eng.

ROYAL CENTRE, Cass Co., Ind., Feb. 26th, 1879.
DR. R. V. PIERCE:
Dear Sir—I take pleasure in writing my testimony with others in regard to your valuable medicine. For a long time I have suffered from disease of the lungs, and, until I used your Discovery, found nothing that did me any good. Thanks to it, I am relieved, and recommend it to all. Yours truly,
MARY KENNEL.

ORGANS AND PIANOS.

HON. DANIEL F. BEATTY, of Washington, N. J., comes to the front with what we consider the greatest offer ever made on first-class pianos and organs. The celebrated instruments of his manufacture have attained a world-wide celebrity for purity of tone, excellency of workmanship, and every quality that can make instruments desirable and durable. A fairer or more liberal offer was never made, for if in any particular the description of instrument differs from the advertisement, MAYOR BEATTY will take it back and pay all freight charges both ways. As an evidence of his immense popularity among those who know him best, we mention the fact of his re-election last week as Mayor of his city by an overwhelming majority. Any one contemplating the purchase of an organ or piano should send for his latest illustrated circular, which is complete in every detail.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE imparts new energy to the brain, giving the feeling and sense of increased intellectual power.

HALFORD LEICESTERSHIRE TABLE SAUCE.—No gentleman's table should be set without it. A genuine relish.

IT is a very old bit of philosophy which declares stagnation to be an impossibility. Things which do not improve must deteriorate. Perhaps this is why Mr. Welch, of the ST. NICHOLAS, so assiduously watches his house, perfecting carefully every arrangement in his seemingly perfect hostelry. The guests of the ST. NICHOLAS are made so comfortable that they might almost imagine they were in their own palatial residences. The ST. NICHOLAS has had a very large list of arrivals this week, and it looks as if the Spring trade had already commenced.—Boston Home Journal.

WHAT makes your hair so beautiful? MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Every Druggist sells it.

BRONCHITIS.—Throat Diseases often commence with a Cold, Cough, or unusual exertion of the voice. These incipient symptoms are allayed by the use of "Brown's Bronchial Troches," which, if neglected, often result in a chronic disease of the throat.

ONE trial will convince you that DR. BROWNING'S C. & C. CORDIAL is indispensable to any family. Children love it. 50 cents per bottle.

ALL reports from the French vineyards agree that the severe cold of last Winter seriously damaged the vines, and that the crop this season will be small and inferior. In champagnes this loss will, in this market, be more than made good by "THE AMERICA" EXTRA DRY of Messrs. A. WERNER & Co., 388 Broadway, which stands at the head of the list of pure American wines. None has been more widely sold, more universally approved by the critical public, and none exceeds it in purity and real merit. Each season adds to the already large number of consumers and friends of this standard and superior champagne.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines, the Louis and the Baden Baden, covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

A few remaining shares of the first issue can now be obtained at $5 per share.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT NASHVILLE, TENN.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., is en fête. She is wearing her holiday garb, and her good, honest and true citizens are engaged in celebrating no less an important event than her one hundredth anniversary. Nashville, now a hundred years old, is a splendid specimen of a city that has grown to large proportions in a brief but eventful thirty years. Situated on the Cumberland River, about two hundred miles from its junction with the Ohio, Nashville sits like a queen on her throne of bluffs. The land on which the city is built is picturesquely irregular, and the Capitol Hill, which resembles an Indian mound, stands out in the boldest relief. The Capitol is designed after the choragic monument of Lysicrates at Athens; its dimensions being 239 by 138 feet, while its cost was nearly $1,000,000. Nashville, in addition to this magnificent building, boasts numerous other public institutions, all more or less in the most refined and elegant taste, while amongst her most remarkable private dwellings is the Hermitage, the residence of Andrew Jackson, which lies a little east of the city. Nashville contains over 33,000 inhabitants. She taps the great Appalachian coal-fields, and by means of her iron railroad bridge, with its great draw of 280 feet, communicates by iron road with Louisville, St. Louis, Memphis, Chattanooga, and other points, by the Louisville, Great Southern, the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis, the St. Louis and Southeastern and the Tennessee and Pacific lines.

The idea of a centennial birthday celebration was suggested by the Tennessee Historical Society, and was promptly taken up by the citizens. An Exposition Building was erected, which for beauty of design and extent of space could scarcely be excelled. It is centrally located on the corner of Broad and Spruce Streets, and is immediately opposite the new Custom-house, now in a state of completion. The length of the building is 189 by 159 feet. It is formed like a parallelogram, with projections at the corners and at the centre of each side. Above the second floor the form is of a Greek cross with dome at the intersection. The dome is supported by twenty-four columns, in clusters of three, having bolts and bands of wrought-iron. The building is two stories high, with the centre of the second floor immediately under the dome left open, making a gallery or rotunda. The ventilation and lighting are excellent. The height of each story is 16 feet; height to the top of the dome is 100 feet; diameter of the dome, 50 feet; area of first floor, 25,393 feet; area of second floor, 20,468 feet; wall space, 24,000 feet. The building has been erected within the last six weeks, and is both substantial and admirably fitted for its purpose. From the centre under the dome four grand staircases lead to the second story. Upon the columns of the rotunda are two electric lights. Within the arches of the building are thirty-six panels, bearing the coat-of-arms of each State. Pictures of important events of Nashville history are conspicuous.

The Nashville Centennial Commission is presided over by Mr. T. A. Atchison, and the corresponding secretary is Mr. R. A. Campbell, the board being composed of the most prominent and respected citizens. The grand opening, April 24th, of the Centennial Exposition came off with every possible éclat. The public square was one mass of bunting, flags and evergreens. Ingenuity had been exhausted on the suggestion of designs. Four arches, wrapped with bunting looking like rainbows, spanned the various sides, bearing upon them flags, evergreens and mottoes and devices. A feature was the grand procession, under the charge of General B. F. Cheatham, of local military tradesmen and societies, State, county and city officers, schools and colleges, colored societies, Veterans of the War of 1812, Creek Campaign War, Mexican War, etc., etc. The oration was delivered by the Hon. John M. Bright, the subject chosen being "Donelson and the Pioneers of Tennessee." The prize centennial ode was read by Dr. Blackie, after which a spirited sketch of the history of Nashville by Mr. Anson Nelson was read by Mr. W. E. McAllister, Jr. On the night of the 28th a grand display of fireworks at the Exposition was promised, while papers on "Tennessee in the Revolutionary Period," "Andrew Jackson," "John Overton and the Settlement of West Tennessee," "The Educational Pioneers of Tennessee," and others equally interesting, were delivered daily, while others are to come, as the celebration will last until nearly the end of May. From May 17th to 22d there will be a grand military display—infantry, cavalry and artillery will take part—while cash premiums to the amount of $2,500 will be awarded. There will also be drills, sham-battles and tournaments.

On May 20th the event of the celebration comes off, in the unveiling of the bronze statue of Andrew Jackson by Clark Mills. The unveiling will take place on the eastern side of the Capitol with suitable imposing ceremonies and orations. Nashville is having a gala time, and the occasion fully justifies her great rejoicement.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY QUESTION.

A DISPATCH from London says that the long negotiations between the United States and Great Britain relating to the Fortune Bay (Newfoundland) attacks on American fishermen ended a few days ago in the refusal of the British Government to recognize the justice of the American claims. Lord Salisbury replies to the demand of the United States for $103,803 damages by a positive refusal to pay or to recognize the justice of the claims. He takes the ground that the United States fishermen, in drawing their seines from the shore, were transgressing the privileges granted them under the treaty, which, Lord Salisbury holds, does not include in the term "shore fishing" the right to land for the purpose of drawing seines from the shore. He also holds that in fishing with seines the American fishermen were violating local laws which were in existence when the treaty was concluded, and which, therefore, marked the conditions subject to which the Americans received their rights and privileges. Under the treaty he admits that no local act regulating the fisheries which was passed subsequent to the treaty would affect the treaty rights of the United States, but insists that the United States accepted the fishery rights subject to all local acts and regulations in force at the time. Lord Salisbury's answer containing this refusal was forwarded to the United States Government some days ago. It leaves at least one troublesome question open for his successor to settle.

VIEWS IN DRUID HILL PARK, BALTIMORE.

THE City of Baltimore—which, in population and commerce, ranks as one of the most important in the Union, and which, in its public institutions, its charities, its libraries and academies, the massiveness and splendor of its houses and industrial establishments, ranks almost equal to any—is particularly fortunate in the possession of public parks of great attractiveness and beauty. The principal one of these—Druid Hill Park—is pleasantly situated in the northern suburbs of the city, and contains in all 680 acres. The surface of the park is gently undulating for the most part, but occasionally rises into bold eminences, from which fine views of the city or of the surrounding country may be had. Excellent drives and walks and bridle-paths have been laid out through the woods and grassy interspaces, and ornamental shrubs and evergreens have been planted to give variety to the lawn-like grounds.

But the chief attraction of the park is its natural beauty. It is charmingly sylvan, rustic, home-like, and no touch of the landscape-gardener could add a grace to the fresh negligence of its glades and dells, and little trickling springs, and cool, secluded nooks. Many of the trees are among the oldest and finest found in any public park in this country. The larger portion of the land now constituting the Park was originally a private estate, the owner of which had beautified it on an extensive scale, so that when it came into the possession of the public it was already partially parked out and ornamented.

A favorite place of resort among Baltimoreans, in the pleasant seasons of the year, is Fort McHenry, at the entrance of the harbor, three miles from the city. This is especially the case on Spring and Summer Sabbath afternoons, when visitors flock to this point in large numbers to enjoy the refreshing breezes and the attractive views. We illustrate both the Park and the scene at Fort McHenry from sketches by our special artist.

The Peabody Institute of the City of Baltimore is a marble structure in the Grecian style of architecture, standing on the southeast corner of Monument and Charles Streets, having a frontage of 174 feet on Monument Street and 152 feet on Charles Street. The eastern half of the building, which is occupied by the library, was begun in April, 1875, and completed in July, 1878. The books, numbering about 65,000, were removed from their quarters in the other portion of the building during the early part of the Summer, and the new library was opened to the public on Monday, September 30th, 1878.

Entering through the portico on the Monument Street front, the vestibule, 22 feet square, is reached; this leads to the reading-room 72 by 36 feet, and 26 feet high, and back of this room, connected with it by a door, is the library, 84 by 62 feet and 56 feet high. The library contains six stories of alcoves, ranged seven on each side, making 84 alcoves altogether. Each alcove is 12 by 18 feet, those on the first floor being 9 feet high, and the others 8 feet. The first floor is paved with marble, except where the pipes for heating the room are placed. The floors of the other alcoves, the staircases, the columns and the railings are all of iron. Tables surround the central hall of the library, and are intended for students who require a large number of books, or who wish to pursue their investigations undisturbed by the business of the general reading-room. Most of the conveniences known to modern libraries, such as waiters, call-bells, speaking tubes, etc., have been introduced. The library is lighted by a skylight over the whole central hall and by 140 windows in the alcoves. South of the library, and opening into it by three beautiful arches, is the work-room, where the new books are catalogued before being placed on the shelves.

The reading-room is a wide, spacious apartment, with numerous seats and tables for the convenience of readers. Around the room are cases containing the best dictionaries, encyclopedias, gazetteers and atlases, always at the disposal and free use of any who may wish to consult them. The delivery-desk is constructed with a view to secure the greatest convenience to the attendants and the quickest delivery to the reader of the books called for. Along its front are 80 drawers, in which the catalogue of cards is placed ready for those who wish to use it. Behind this desk is a large case containing 260 pigeon-holes, and in these are placed the most important and interesting magazines of the day.

The Peabody Library is a reference or students' library. The books do not circulate outside the building, but any person can come and consult them in their beautiful home every day from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. It is the aim of this library to furnish all that is best in thought, literature and science, and gradually there has been brought together in Baltimore one of the finest collections of books to be found in the country—free to all!

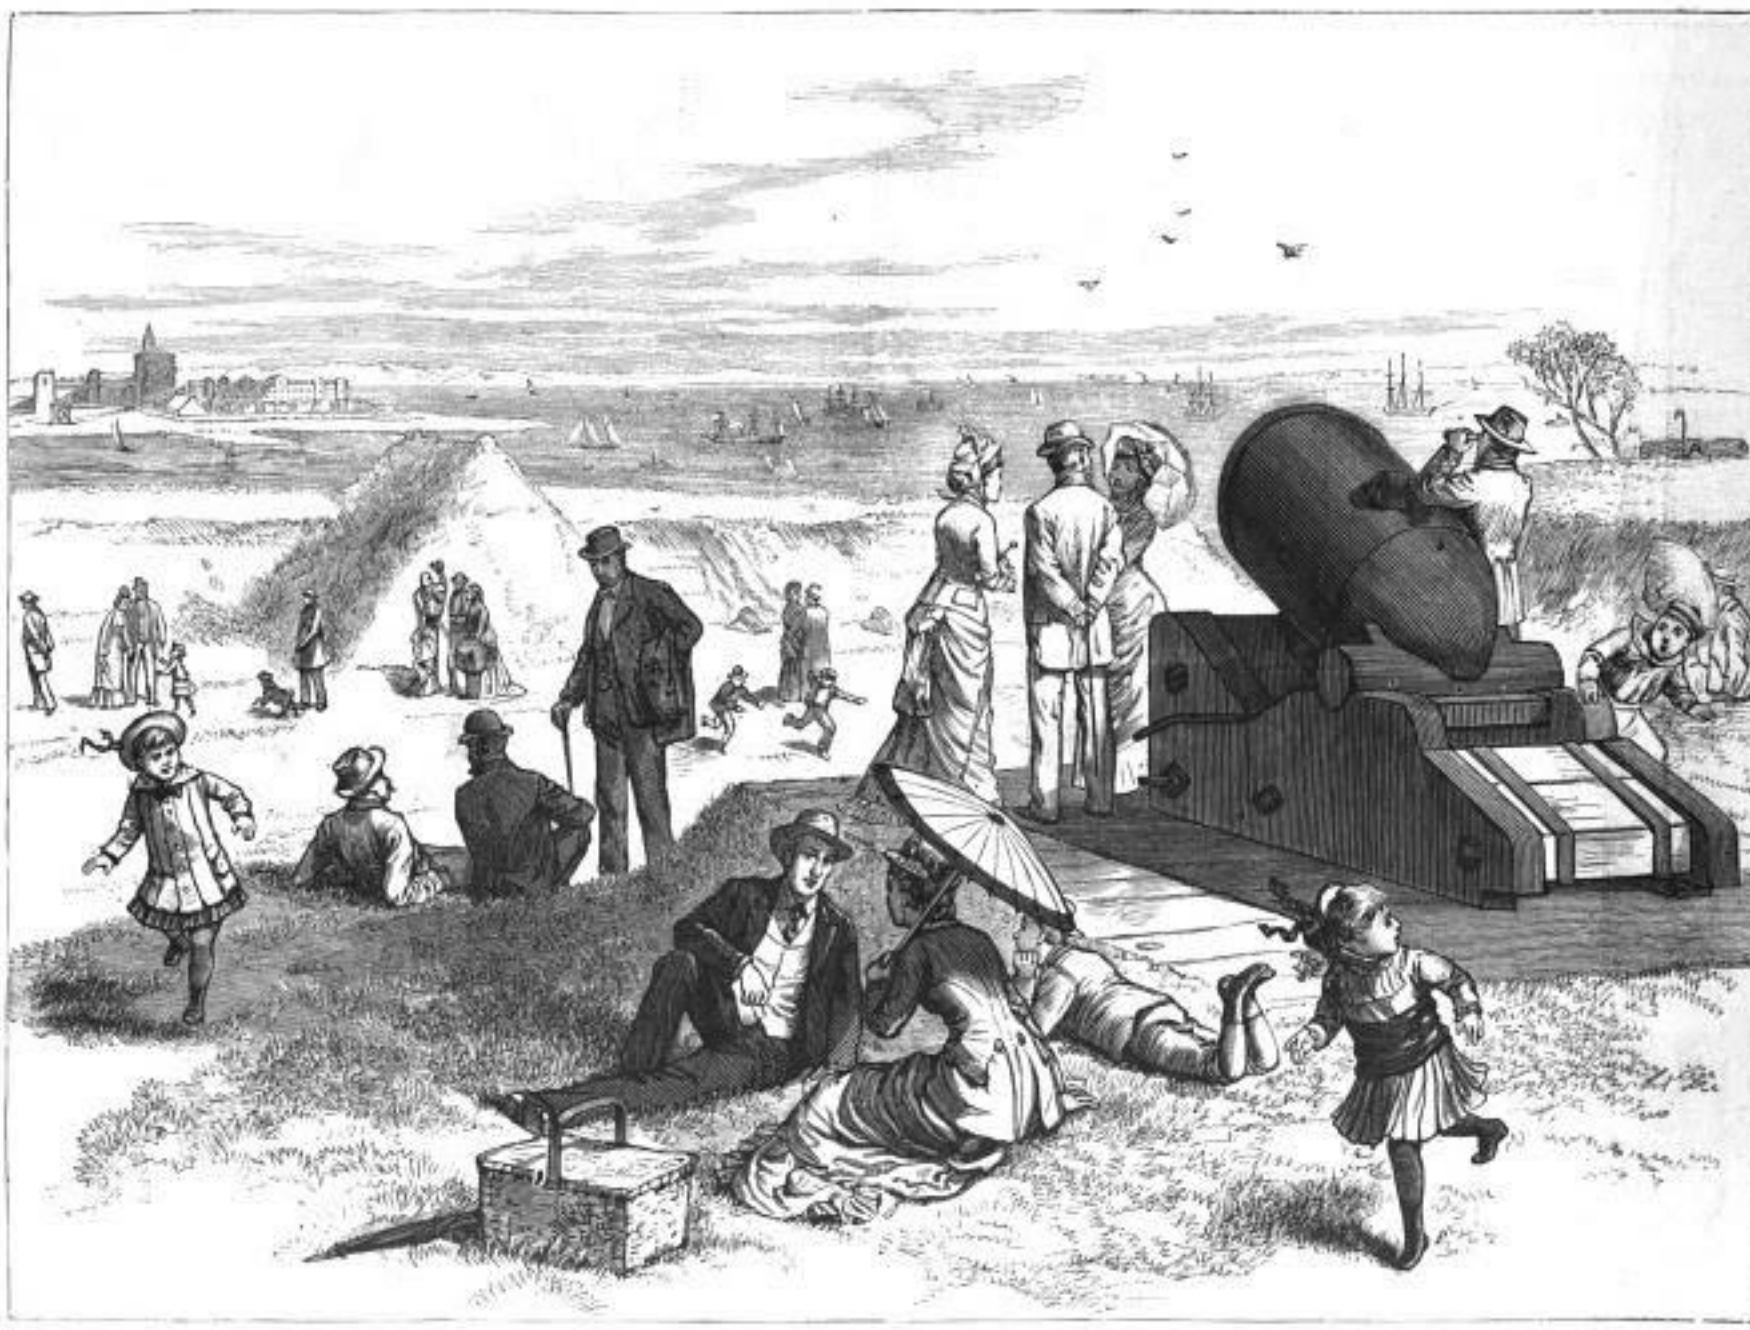
MORE KENTUCKY WONDERS.

ANOTHER marvelous cave has been discovered near Hopkinsville, Ky., which is deserving of special mention as a great geological curiosity, inasmuch as it contains a beautiful fossil forest of gigantic lepidodendrons, in connection with numerous species of tree ferns, club mosses, equisetums and other cryptogamic plants, all in an excellent state of preservation and in their natural positions. The gigantic lepidodendrons tower in some instances forty feet in height, and vary at the base from twelve feet in diameter to lesser proportions. They form beautiful columns similar to the columns of Fingal's Cave at Staffa, only spherical in form. Many beautiful translucent and transparent stalactites and stalagmites also abound in the cave, as does also many other beautiful formations. The main avenue has an average width of about sixty feet, and in height is about forty feet. There are numerous dangerous pits and yawning chasms along the route, and great danger exists also in falling rocks, which render cave explorations a dangerous occupation.

To the scientist this cave is of the most profound interest, as it is an open book, printed in language most plain, of the many unsolved mysteries of the carboniferous period. Here we have a lepidodendron forest resting upon coal measures, its roots firmly imbedded in and forming a part of the same; the bark of the trees is a glistening bituminous coal, while the interior structure is a soft quartzose sandstone. Imagine hundreds of these glistening pillars of black diamonds, interspersed with beautiful transparent and translucent stalagmites and stalactites, and the effect you will readily perceive is perfectly indescribable. Marine shells and other aquatic exuviæ abound in the argillaceous calcareous component parts of the cave, and the fossil remains of animals resembling somewhat the monkey of the present age were also discovered therein.

ALLEGED MS. BY ST. PETER.



A CURIOUS story comes from Jerusalem, by way of Rome, of the finding, in a hermit's grotto at the foot of the hill of Gethsemane, of a manuscript in the handwriting of the Apostle Peter.

Publicity was first given to it by a newspaper organ of the Jewish community at Jerusalem. Last July a man named Core, who was believed to be very poor, died at Jerusalem in the one hundred and tenth year of his age, after leading a hermit's life for half a century, and having among Christians a reputation for rare saintliness. He left no kinsfolk, and the authorities taking possession of the grotto found it luxuriantly furnished, with magnificent tiger-skins on the floor, and the costliest furs composing the bed. Beneath the floor, in an underground room, an iron-bound oaken chest was found, which, on being opened, was seen to contain gold and silver of a total value of $40,000—supposed to be the total alms and oblations which he had received from the credulous people who listened to his appeals.

In the bottom of this chest the manuscript was discovered. This inscription was upon it:

"I, Peter the fisherman, in the name of God, finished the writing of the word of love in the fiftieth year of my age, the third Easter after the death of my Saviour and Master, Jesus Christ, son of Mary, in the house of Beliori, the scribe, near the temple of the Lord."

The papyrus of the manuscript is described as strong and flexible, while the ink is very black. Scholars who have seen it say that no man of this age could write Hebrew of such pure style and with such knowledge of the meaning of many obsolete words and forms which belong to the period in which the epistle purports to have been written. On the other hand, it is held out against the genuineness of the document that the miserly Core would not have hid away a thing which, if genuine, would have brought him more money than he could get in a century of begging. Further, that the language of the superscription and subscription of the papyrus throws grave doubt on its pretensions to antiquity. There is no proof that the church festival of Easter had come into existence so early as the year 80, while the description of Peter as "the fisherman" (not simply as "a fisherman"), and of Christ as "the Son of Mary," are thought to be sufficient to betray the modern origin of the pretended epistle.

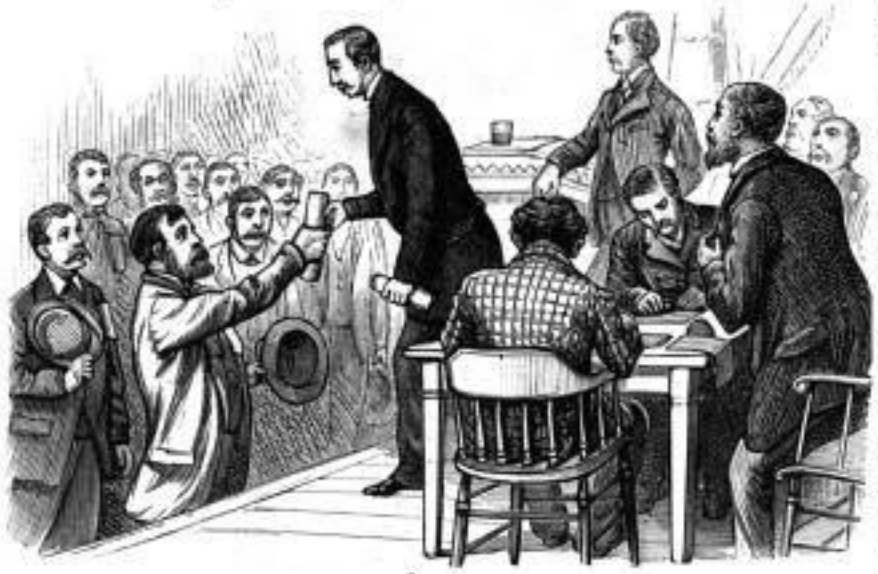
THE REGULAR CONVENTION IN THE WIETING OPERA HOUSE.

THE DUAL DEMOCRATIC STATE CONVENTIONS.

THE Democracy of New York held two State Conventions in Syracuse on Tuesday, April 20th, and delegates to the National Convention in Cincinnati were selected by both. The Tammany Hall Democrats assembled in Shakespeare Hall, and the Tilden Democrats in the Wieting Opera House. Ex-Lieutenant-Governor Dorsheimer was made chairman of the former body, and, in his speech declaring it to be the duty of every Democrat to do all in his power to promote harmony in the party, was vociferously cheered, as was his further declaration that the nominee of the National Convention should be one who could command the united suffrages of the Democratic Party, and thus insure a Democratic victory. A little later his mention of the name of Horatio Seymour, as one who would fulfill all the requirements demanded of a candidate, was received with a storm of cheers.

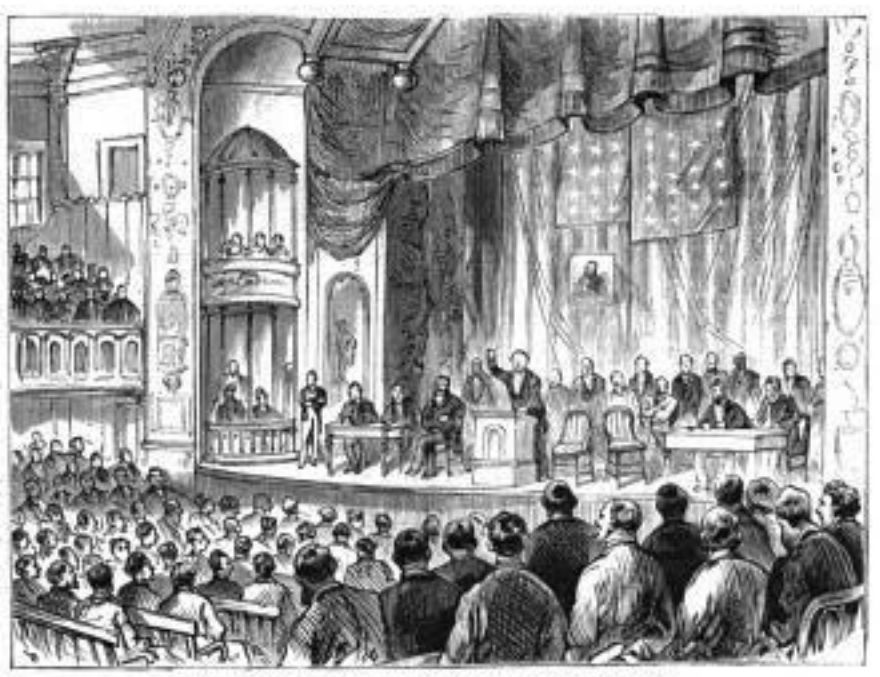


A resolution was passed unanimously, providing for the appointment of a committee of sixteen to meet with a like committee from the other Convention for the purpose of harmonizing the differences between the two Conventions, so that a united delegation might be sent to Cincinnati, and thus insure the election of the Democratic nominee. Messrs. Haskin and Purroy left the Hall to present the resolution to the "Tilden" Convention, and an adjournment was taken. On reassembling, Mr. Haskin reported the manner in which the overtures for peace had been received by the other Convention, and said he feared that this tender of the olive branch would be received in the same manner as was the offer of one year ago.

While the Committee on Permanent Organization were preparing their report, Mr. John Kelly addressed the delegates. In the evening the delegates at large, the electors at large, the district electors, and delegates to the Cincinnati Convention, were chosen, and the Convention adjourned on adopting the following:

"Resolved, That the delegates of this Convention to the National Democratic Convention to be held at Cincinnati on June 22d, 1880, are hereby instructed that it is the desire of the Democracy of this State that the National Convention shall enforce, as heretofore, the two-thirds rule in the nomination of the candidate for the Presidency."

In the meantime the regular convention was transacting about the same business in the Opera House. It was called to order at noon by Lester B. Faulkner, Chairman of the State Central Committee, and soon after a temporary organization was effected, with John C. Jacobs as chairman. A scene of confusion arose in the calling of the roll, when, New York being called, Mr. Dupignac, of the Ninth District, presented a list of seventy-two contesting delegates. Contesting credentials were also presented and referred from the Fourth and Twenty-second Districts, New York, and Second District, Niagara. Also from the Second District of Wayne, and from Cortland County.



The papers were referred to the Committee on Credentials, and while the delegates were debating excitedly methods of arranging the cases of contest, Mr. Haskin appeared with the resolutions from the Tammany Convention. Almost simultaneously with his appearance, a call for the yeas and nays was made. After he had interrupted the proceedings and presented the resolutions with a few explanatory words, he was kept waiting until the roll had been called on the order for yeas and nays on an amendment, and a second time on the original motion. The chair then announced the receipt of a communication from "another body in session in this city," and said he would refer it to the Committee on Resolutions. The reading of the paper was called for, and, although protests were made, the document was referred. In the evening session the Convention adopted this resolution, submitted by the committee:

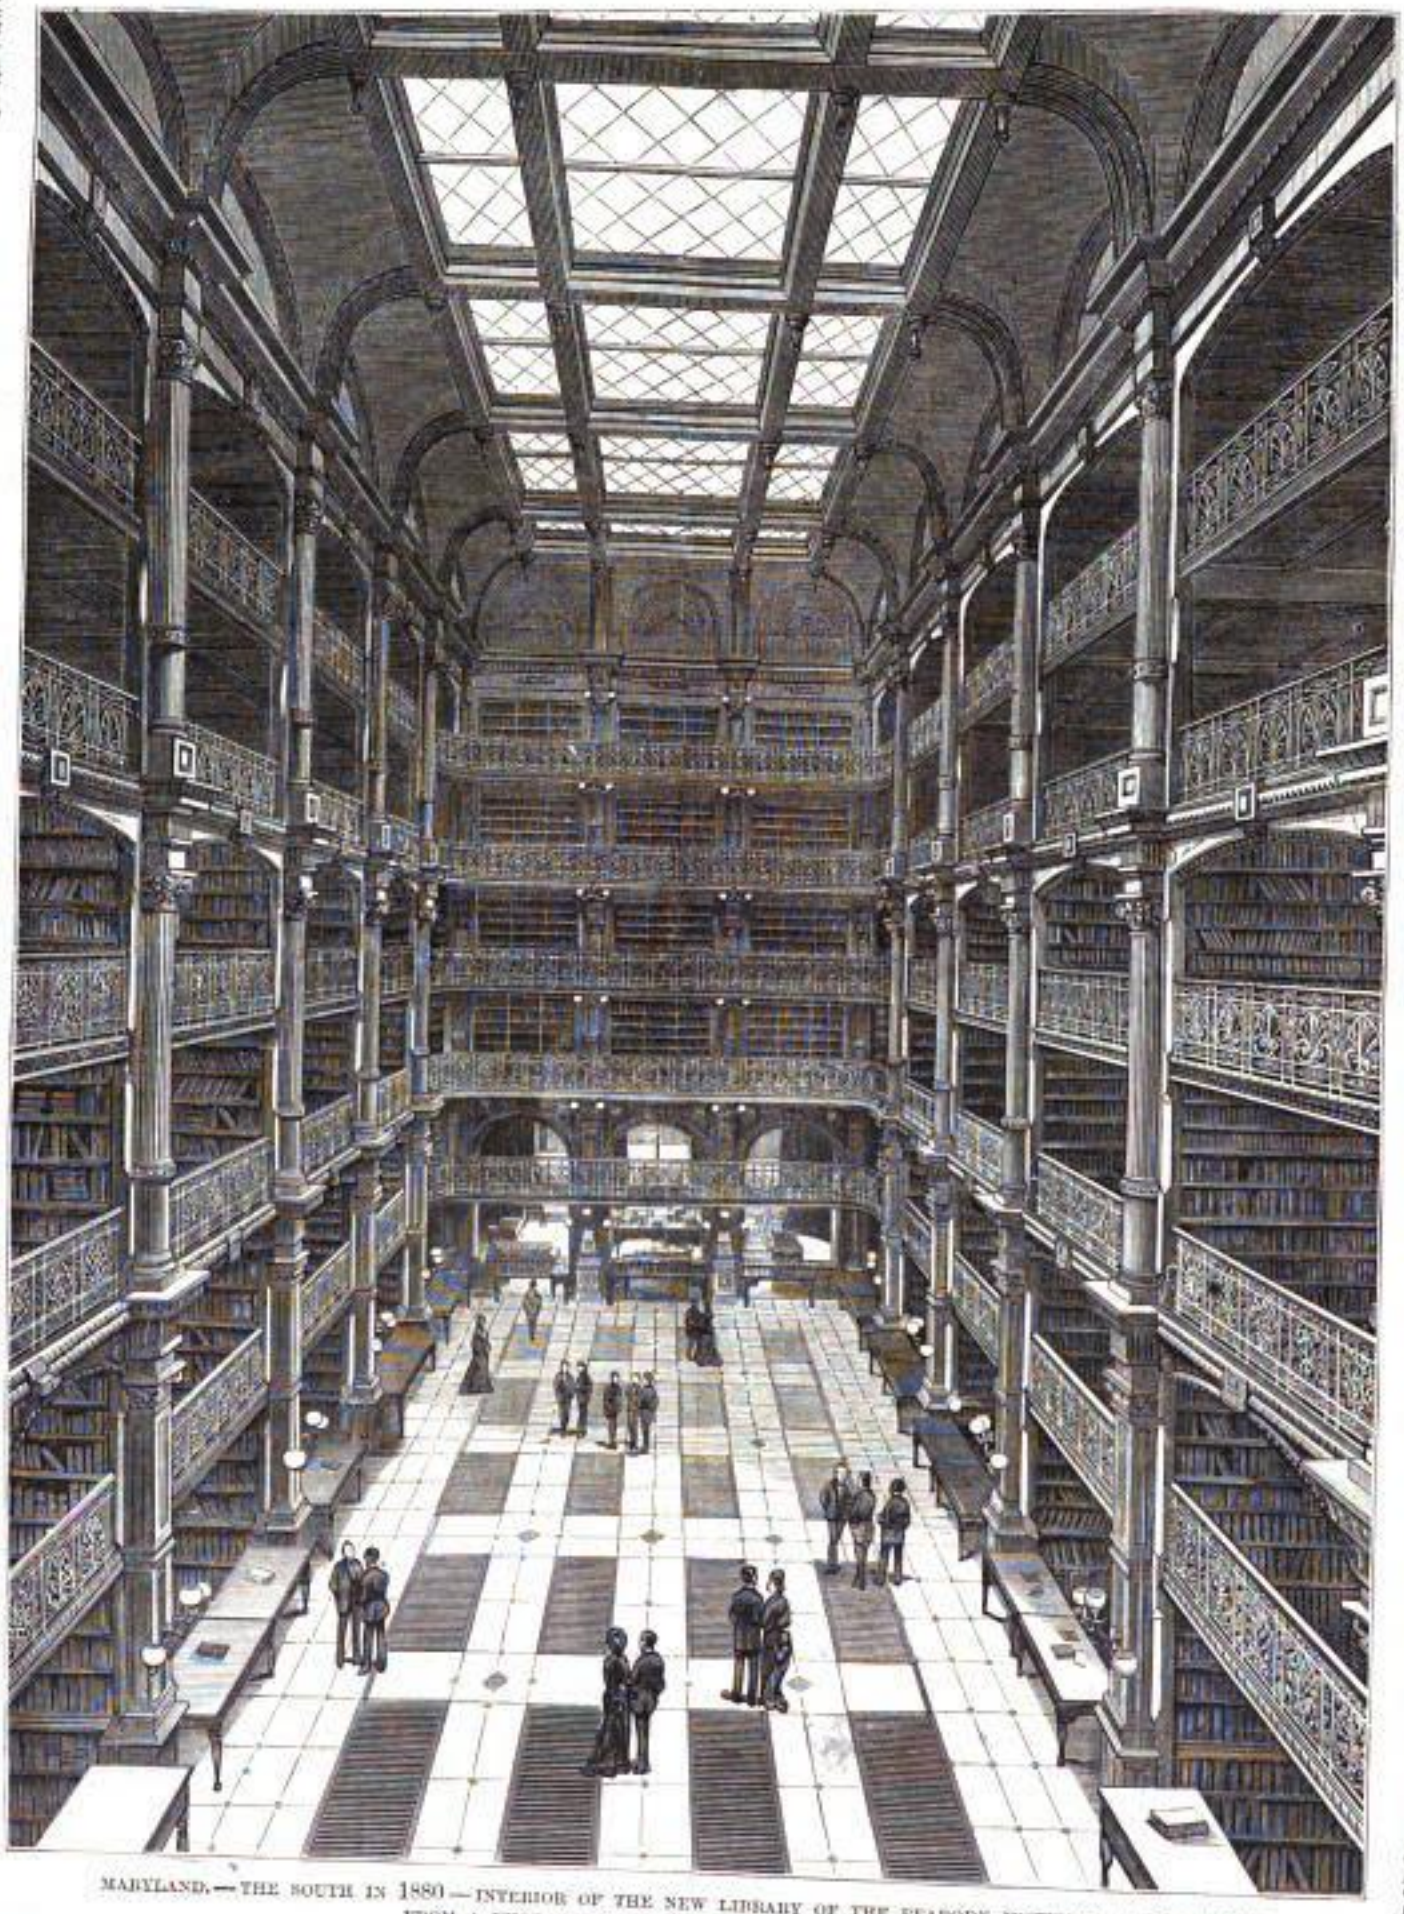
"Resolved, That the President of the Convention be requested to reply to the communication received signed Jno. B. Haskin, and to assure him that this Convention reciprocates every expression of a desire for the union of the Democratic Party, and are persuaded that the deliberative wisdom of the National Convention will result in such action as will secure the triumph of the Democratic Party in the State of New York and in the Union in the ensuing Presidential election."

This was the last of the "olive branch" business in both bodies.

In the formal platform and resolutions the charge of fraud in the Electoral count was reiterated, and Samuel J. Tilden was named as the choice for Presidential candidate. The usual delegates and electors were appointed, and shortly before one o'clock on Wednesday morning this Convention adjourned.

The Tammany Convention chose for delegates at large to Cincinnati: Amasa J. Parker, of Albany; William Dorsheimer, of New York; Jeremiah McGuire, of Chemung; George C. Green, of Niagara. The regular Convention selected Lucius Robinson, Calvin E. Pratt, Rufus W. Peckham, and Lester W. Faulkner.

DECORATIONS IN GERMANY.



ACCORDING to Professor von Schulte, Germany has more decorations and confers more upon individuals than all the rest of the world. All other countries of the globe have 100 orders, with not more than 200 variations; of these, about 75 orders, with perhaps 170 variations, are found in Europe outside of Germany. In the German States there are nearly 50 orders, with more than 300 degrees, variations, decorations, etc. Prussia has 9 or 10 orders; Bavaria, 9; Saxony, 5; Wurtemberg, 4; Baden, 3; Hesse, 3; Reuss, 2; and several other States 1 each. The number of decorations yearly conferred on Prussian subjects is enormous. They are given out by the hundred at the annual Ordensfest, held on the 18th of January, and sometimes as many as 1,000 are conferred on this occasion. The expenses of the order commission in 1879 amounted to 170,000 marks, of which 120,000 marks were spent for decorations. It has been estimated that not fewer than 100,000 Prussian subjects have been decorated, of whom about 30,000 have received orders. This would make one decorated person for every twenty-five inhabitants, and one knight of an order in every ninety of the population. Military officers seem to be specially favored in the distribution of these honors. It is said to be exceptional to find an officer, unless very young, who has not received a decoration of some kind. But the honors are scattered among civilians with scarcely less prodigality. They are conferred, almost as a matter of course, upon ministers, high court functionaries, diplomats, presidents of Government boards, etc. When a public functionary has successfully carried out any important national business, or when he celebrates his jubilee of long public service, he is decorated. Distinguished scholars also come in for their share. When a sovereign goes to a foreign watering place he decorates the physician, the chief of police, and a number of railway officers. When a prince lodges with a private person or reviews troops, decorations are sure to follow. When a prince leaves the university, the professors whose lectures he attended, the rector, the curator, and intimate family friends, receive orders. The physician is rewarded with a decoration, as well as a fee, for curing a member of the royal family. The fellow-travelers of princes share in these honors, and when a foreign sovereign visits the country his entire suite is remembered. After a war—as in the case of the Franco-German war—it fairly rains decorations, not only upon military officers, but upon medical men and those who have distinguished themselves by gifts, subscriptions, caring for the wounded, etc. In fact, pretty much everything in the way of distinction is rewarded with a decoration. Austria, also, has a number of orders and decorations, and confers a good many, but not nearly so many in proportion to the population as Germany. The number of Austrian subjects who possess orders is about 6,300.

SECRETS OF THE DEAD LETTER OFFICE.

STATISTICAL returns of the Dead Letter office of the Post Office Department afford a singular commentary upon the intelligence, from an epistolary standpoint, of a large portion of our population who use the mails. It appears that during the past year no less than 13,000 dead letters were received at the Post Office Department each day from the 30,000 post-offices throughout the country. The principal reason why these letters are not forwarded to their destination is that the addresses are incorrectly given, or so badly written as to be undecipherable. It is remarkable in this connection that New England, with her comprehensive system of public schools, which are supposed to diffuse knowledge among all classes and conditions of her population, furnishes the largest proportion of these letters, the West standing next in point of numbers. Although popular education is considered to be at a very low ebb in the South, the use of the mails by the people of that section is so limited, comparatively, that the number of dead letters received from this direction is smaller than from any other portion of the country. As the letters are received at the department from the various post-offices they are placed in the hands of a corps of openers, which is at present composed of about half a dozen superannuated preachers, chiefly of the Methodist denomination. During the past year these openers have turned over to the proper officer no less than $35,000 in currency and $1,500,000 in drafts found in these letters. Through the very efficient system which has worked up in this division of the Post Office Department, and owing to the parties having properly signed their addresses, ninety-five per cent. of the currency and ninety-seven per cent. of the drafts have been returned to their proper owners. The returns of the work of the office also show that upward of 50,000 packages of merchandise have been sent in as undeliverable on account of insufficient postage or address. These packages include interesting souvenirs of affection and other articles of more or less value to their owners, together with that class of matter which is diverted from delivery through the exertions of Anthony Comstock. The first are kept for two years and then sold at auction and the proceeds are covered into the Treasury, and the last furnishes material for a monthly bonfire. The letters received at the Dead Letter Office, after going through a course of routine, are sent to a corps of ladies, whose duties are to read them carefully and to ascertain whether of any importance, and, if so, whether it is possible to return them to the writers. As this correspondence covers a wide range, and is usually from persons in the lower walks of life, these ladies are frequently compelled to peruse a class of epistolary literature which would not be considered exactly profitable or agreeable reading for persons of refined morals and cultivated tastes, and which presents a deplorable phase of human life. There are also some communications from an entirely different stratum of society that drift into this morgue of the mails, as is learned from the general conversations of these ladies, who, occupying confidential positions, are not at liberty to go into details, and many rich developments pass under their notice which would afford food for gossip and scandal to the outside world. In many cases letters of this class involve the names of gentlemen and ladies holding high positions in society in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and the other larger cities of the country, and have found their way to the Dead Letter Office through the obscurities of the addresses and the devices used by the correspondents to avoid detection. If some of these letters should be published they would make some very curious reading.

ELECTION CARICATURES IN LONDON.

THE election has brought out the usual harvest of caricatures and satirical poetry, Mr. Gladstone and Lord Beaconsfield serving as the principal targets. Mr. Gladstone's love for forestry furnishes the chief motif of the attacks on him. In one cartoon he is seen sitting astride of a bough and vigorously hacking away at it between himself and the trunk. Another cartoon depicts him hewing away at the root of a rotten and tottering monarch of the forest, whose branches bear a strong resemblance to the Hebraic countenance of the Prime Minister. Another makes him swing his ax with much more endeavoring to destroy. Another Conservative placard dresses Lord Hartington, Lord Derby and Mr. Gladstone as the three witches in "Macbeth," pointing their skinny fingers at some invisible Banquo. A Liberal artist returns the compliment by representing Beaconsfield as half-man and half-tree, surrounded by corpses slain by the depression of trade and taxation, with the inevitable Gladstone and his little hatchet advancing from the background. This is named "The Deadly Upas Tree." "The Jug-or-naught" satirizes the supposed alliance of conservatism with the brewing interest. The death-dealing car is constructed of beer barrels, and is being driven by Beaconsfield over the prostrate bodies of the workingmen. The Conservative artists offset this by depicting Mr. Lowe on his favorite bicycle, riding over another workingman. Lord Derby is represented as a jubilable share, gazing with longing eyes at some second-hand clothes lately cast off by the Liberal party. Mr. Bright, in a broad-brimmed hat, sits on the touch-hole of a cannon, defying Beaconsfield to fire it off. Sir Charles Dilke wheels along a barrow-load of dynamite, with the avowed intention of destroying everything. Mr. Gladstone is also represented as walking across Hyde Park arm-in-arm with the Russian Bear.

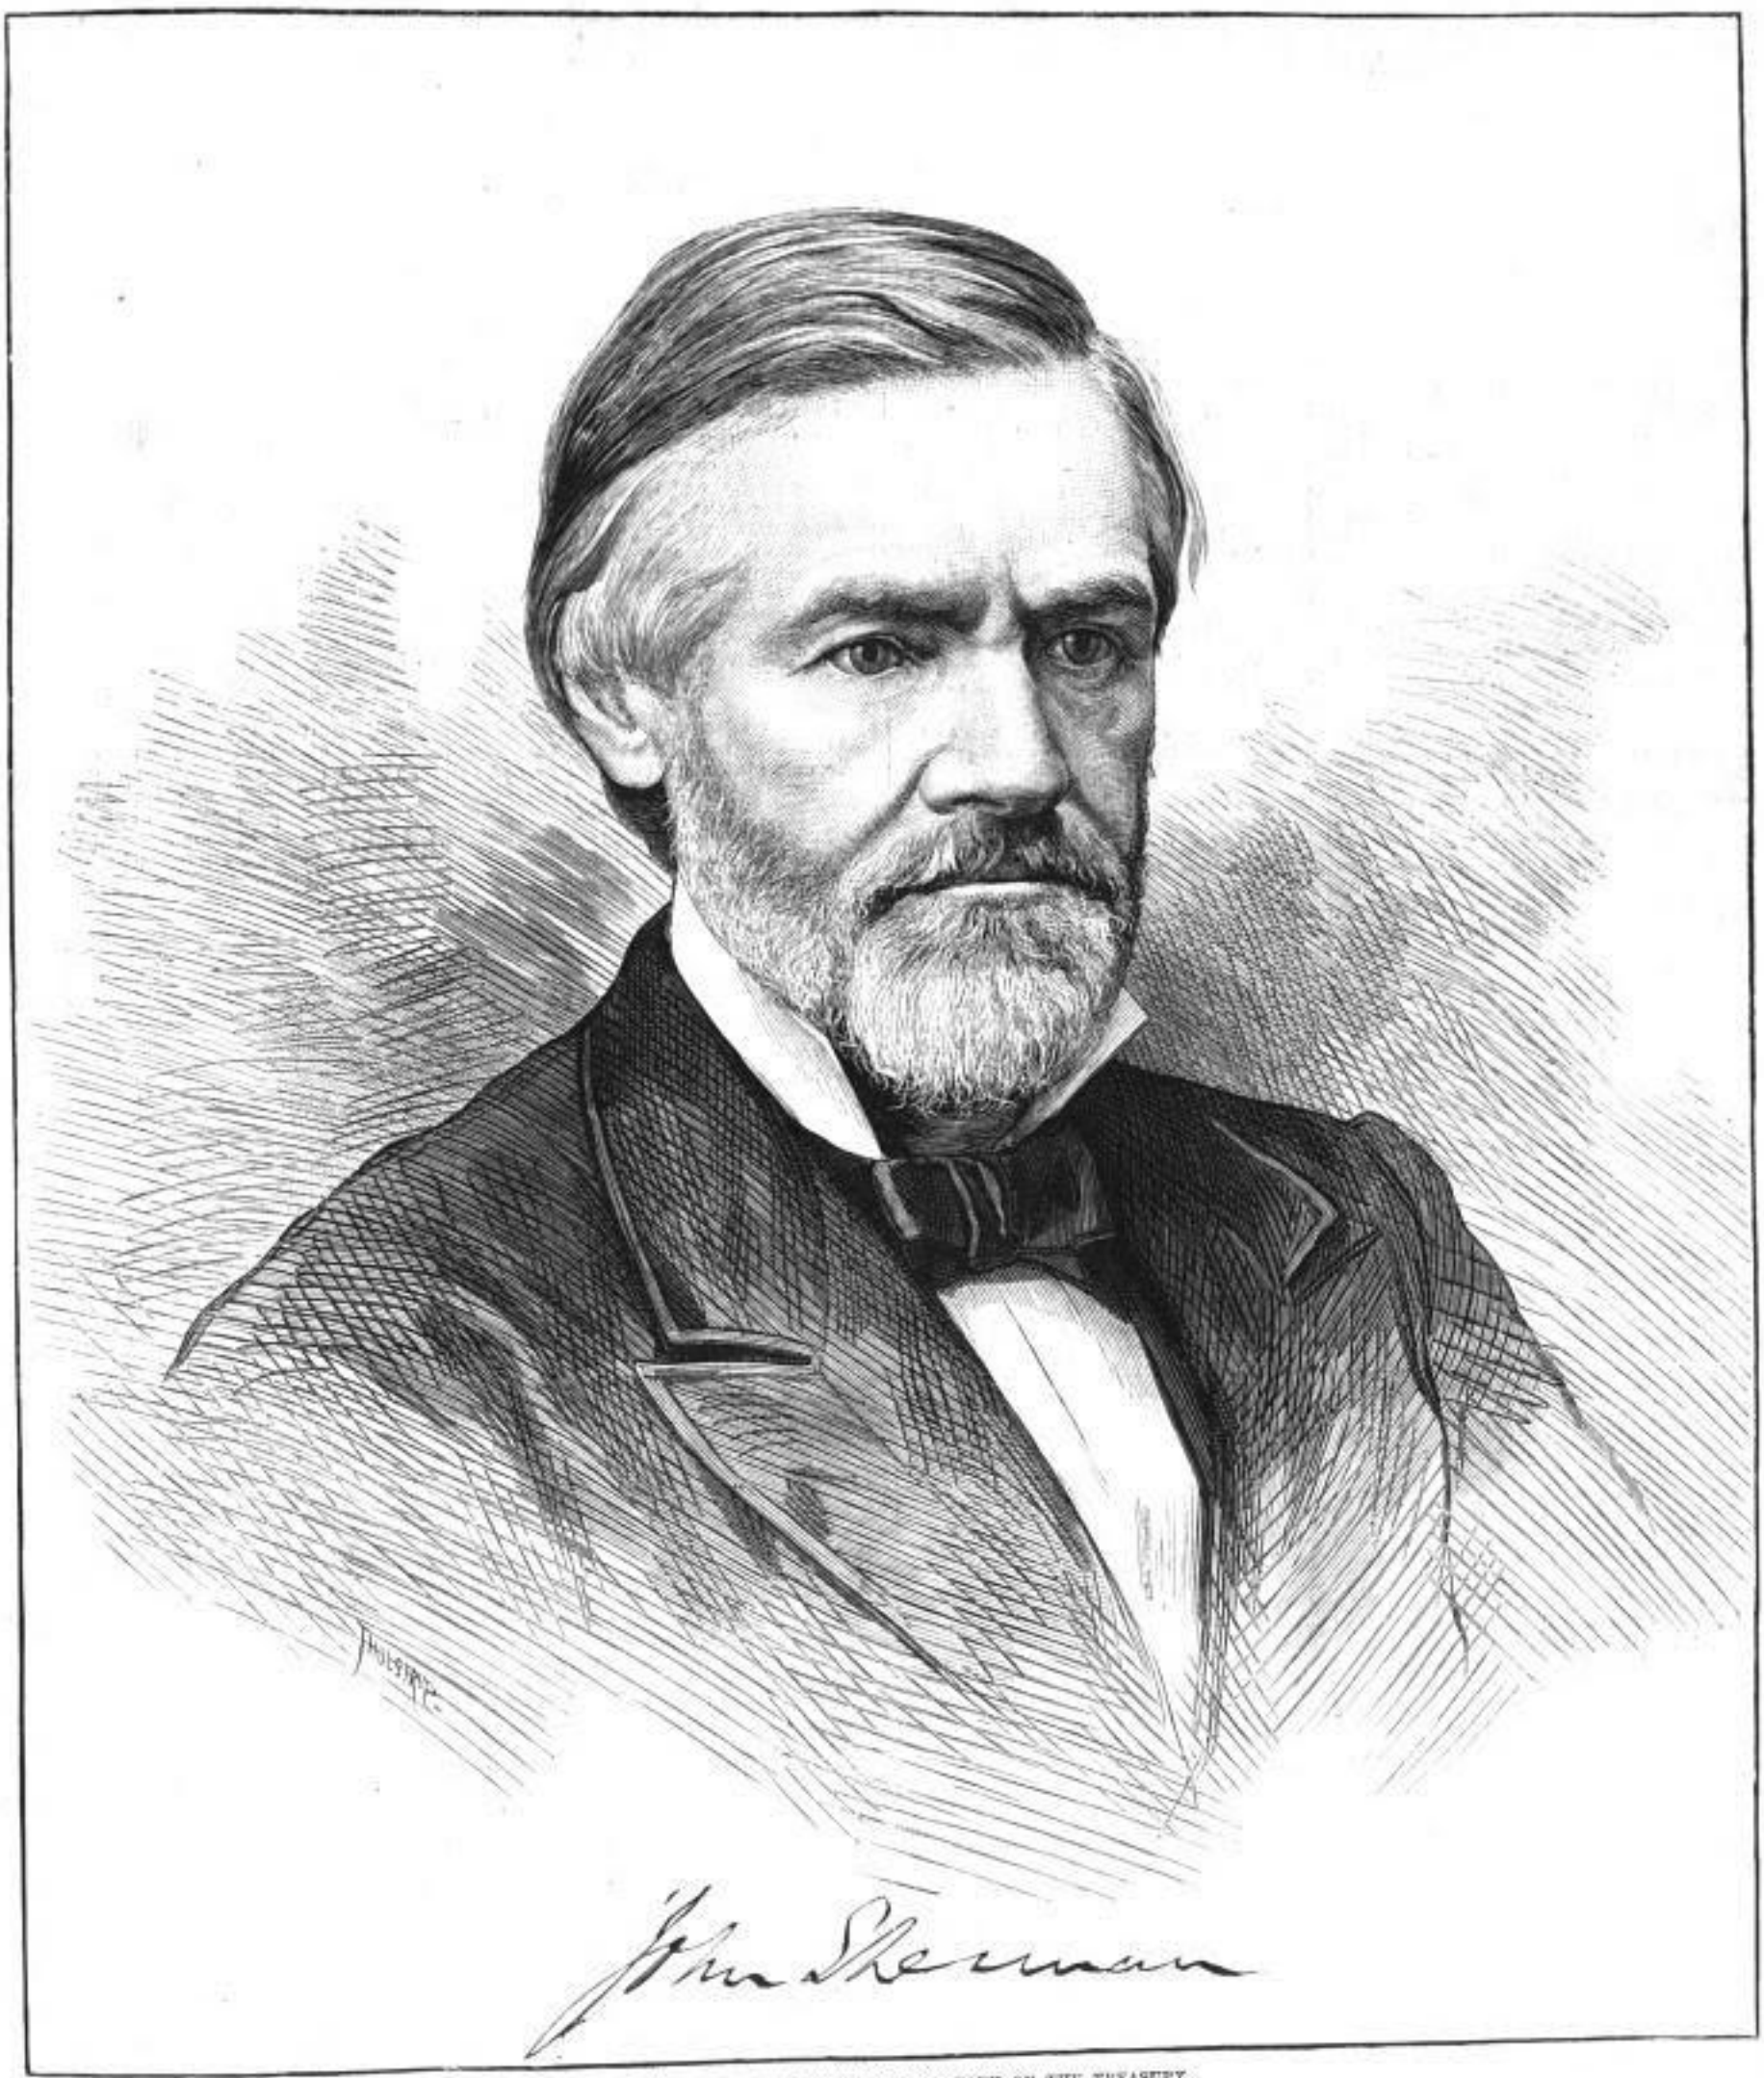
REVENUE OF THE RUSSIAN HEADSMAN.

IN all Russia there is but one state executioner, and he is a pardoned malefactor named Froloff, who in the good old pre-Nihilistic days, when the abolition of capital punishment was still maintained in Muscovy, committed three successive murders and was condemned to penal servitude for life. When, however, revolutionary successes rendered the services of an imperial hangman indispensable to the Ministry of Justice, Froloff volunteered for the office on condition that an amnesty for his past misdeeds should be granted to him. His offer was accepted, and for some time past he has been a busy man. For every "function" he receives 40 silver rubles—about thirty dollars—from the Russian exchequer; but that official fee by no means represents the total emolument he derives from the practice of his gruesome handicraft, for he is permitted to trade upon the superstition still current in Russian society respecting the luck conferred upon gamesters by the possession of a morsel of the rope with which a human being has been strangled, either by the hand of justice or by his own. Immediately after young Mladetsky had been hanged, only the other day, Froloff was surrounded by members of the Russian jeunesse dorée eager to purchase scraps of the fatal noose; and he disposed of several dozen such talismans at from three to five rubles apiece, observing, with cynical complacency, when he had sold off his last remnant, that "he hoped that the Nihilists would yet bring him in plenty of money." There is, indeed, every prospect, if the Melikoff régime only last long enough, that Froloff will speedily become a wealthy man.

THE MEMORY.

A MEETING has been held at Bombay in honor of a blind pandit, named Gattu-Lalaji. Addresses have been delivered in his praise, and a sum of 18,310 rupees presented to him as a reward for his zeal in the cause of religion, his success "in purifying men's minds," and his "attractive genius for making extempore poems." Pandit Gattu-Lalaji was born at Kotah in 1845, while his parents were on a pilgrimage. He lost the sight of both eyes, through smallpox, at the age of eight. He is chiefly celebrated for his power of composing impromptu Sanskrit verses, in which no Italian improvisatore has ever displayed equal talent. During one of my visits to Bombay he called on me, accompanied by three amanuenses, and requested a trial of his powers, declaring himself capable of composing six sets of extemporaneous verses simultaneously, on any six subjects and in any six metres I liked to select. I proposed three subjects—a description of Bombay, the advantage of Sanskrit learning, and the advent of the prince of Wales to India—naming at the same time three of the most difficult metres I could remember. Without a moment's delay the pandit dictated the required verses to his scribes with wonderful precision and rapidity. He also conversed fluently in Sanskrit, and impressed me very favorably with his finished scholarship and the extent of his literary acquirements.

Impromptu versifiers of this kind are called Sighra-Kavis or Asu-Kavis. The blind pandit's successful tour de force in my presence was doubtless more due to great powers of memory than to poetical genius. A Hindoo's capacity for keeping a number of different subjects in his recollection at one time, and yet abstracting his mind so as to concentrate his attention on each one separately and consecutively, is surprising. In this respect he far outdoes Europeans. While I was traveling in the south of India, I was visited by a S'atavadhani—that is to say, a man who could attend to one hundred things at once. He could play several games of chess, write and repeat poetry, work out problems and make calculations of all kinds simultaneously. I also heard of a Trins'adavadhani, or man who could attend to thirty subjects. Ashtavadhanis, or persons capable of attending to eight subjects simultaneously, are by no means uncommon throughout all parts of India.



A man whose powers of attention are of this more limited calibre displays his skill by asking eight persons, entire strangers to himself, who speak eight different dialects, to repeat the first word of eight different sentences, and then the second, and so on consecutively, till every word of the eight sentences has been repeated. Thereupon, without a moment's hesitation, the Ashtavadhani reproduces all the eight sentences, separately and continuously, with each word in proper order, though the utterance of each has been interrupted by the interpolation of seven other words in different languages.

A NEW SERIAL.

IN No. 1,287 of the ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, we shall commence the publication of a powerful serial story, entitled, "The Schaffuskie Lands," written expressly for our columns by the author of "In the Meshes." The scene of the story is laid in Russia, and is crowded with pictures of Russian life and vivid descriptions, also, of the terrors of Siberia. The story is in every respect one of the most effective and striking we have ever published, and will, we are sure, command the admiration of the most critical readers.

PARTIES AND THEIR MISSION.

IN a recent lecture delivered in this city, on "Freedom in Politics," Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., called attention to the fact that the foundation of all popular government, and the real motive power of political progress, reside in the party of the Opposition. Under the theory of free discussion and of free elections, a victorious party, when it displaces the administration, is simply called to "put into practice the principles and ideas to which, while in the opposition, it had educated a majority of the people." It is in the reciprocal action and reaction of an administration party and of an opposition party that we see an illustration of that general principle which a British writer on the philosophy of history has defined as the law of "progress by antagonism"—that progress which is the resultant of a composition of antagonist forces in the sphere of society and the state.

It is to the absence of this wholesome action and reaction that the immobility of the Chinese civilization must be ascribed, and it is to the presence of these forces that the civilization of Europe owes its pre-eminence over the civilization of Asia. By parity of reasoning it follows that the country of Europe in which the relation of these political forces is most clearly defined should be the country which stands at the head of the European nations in all that pertains to constitutional government, to progress in free ideas and progress in economical reform. And of this political headship, as well as the source to which it is due, England has just given to the world a fresh illustration in the result of the recent elections, which has called the party of "Her Majesty's Opposition" to resume the political control from which it was displaced in the year 1874.

The basis of all political confederation must be found in a theory of government, and in practical or administrative measures designed to give to that theory a due development. Without an underlying theory of government a party has no right to permanent existence. Without practical measures giving to this theory a new extension and a normal projection, no party can expect, in a free country, to retain its hold on power, and just as little can it expect to retain that hold if it gives a too great extension or an abnormal projection to the measures and policies of which it is the peculiar exponent. Hence it is that in England the Tory Party is the traditional defender of the Royal prerogatives—the aristocratic and conservative side of the British Constitution—while the Liberal Party, in its several sections and in its different degrees, espouses the rights of the people as far as they seem antagonistic to the pretensions of royalty or aristocracy—the popular and progressive side of the British Constitution.

In our own country the Democratic Party has always accepted as its favorite slogan the "rights of the States" as against the pretensions of the Federal Government, and the rights of the individual citizen as against the dominion of corporate interests. It has been the general aim of its statesmen to minimize the sphere of government, and to leave the largest possible room for the free development of an untrammeled individualism in point of civil liberty and of business activity. On the other hand, the rivals of the Democratic Party, whether known as Federalists, as Whigs, or as Republicans, have elected to be the defenders of the federative or national principle in our system, and have inclined to that theory of government which looks to the protection of civil rights and the protection of business interests by the agency of the Federal Government. And so it comes to pass that the forces in our politics have alternately swayed between an excessive federalism and an excessive separatism. When the former culminated under John Adams in the tyranny of the Alien and Sedition Laws, it was displaced by the political separatism of Thomas Jefferson. When political separatism culminated in secession and civil war in 1860, it was superseded by an intensified and belligerent nationalism as the natural and necessary antitheels of an intensified and belligerent theory of State Rights. As the champions and exponents of this militant nationalism, the statesmen and leaders of the Republican Party have been intrusted with the Chief Executive control of the country since the year 1861, and with both legislative and executive control down to a recent day. Hurled from power in the popular branch of Congress in 1874, it was displaced rather by its own excesses than by the prospect of any particular reforms to the attainment of which the country had been educated by the Democratic opposition. As the Republican Party failed to fulfill its mission by giving to the country a wise and honest and constitutional Administration under President Grant, so the Democratic Party failed to fulfill its mission as an intelligent opposition by neither educating itself nor educating a majority of the people into a readiness for the civil, financial and economical reforms which had been made necessary by the centralism, the extravagance and the protectionism of the Republican Party.

The country, therefore, is called to witness to-day the extraordinary spectacle of an Administration party which has lost the art of administering free government by the methods which commend themselves to the popular approval, and of an Opposition party which has lost the art of educating the people into a ripeness for the measures seen to be essential for a restoration of civil concord, of financial security and of economical justice. On the one hand we have an Administration party confessing to the decadence of political ideas and of constitutional policies in its inspiration and management by clamoring for the government of "a strong man"; and on the other, we have an Opposition party which does not know how to oppose error in the best of all possible ways, by teaching a body of truth that is antagonistic to it. Hence it is that the politics of the hour revolve so largely in the sphere of negations, and that "men of light and leading" are neither wanted by the managers of the Republican "machine," nor can find their way to the front through the confusion which prevails in the Democratic ranks.

OUR WATER SUPPLY.

WHEN New Yorkers go abroad and take apartments in Paris, or Berlin, or Vienna, or Rome, and find, as a rule, neither hot nor cold water running to their rooms, but only a lonely and inadequate washbowl and pitcher, they feel, perhaps for the first time, how inferior are other cities to their own beloved mart. But when they are home again, instead of appreciating and wisely conserving the blessed Croton supply, they waste it wantonly, and then pay out other millions for new reservoirs and mains to bring water that is not needed.

The question now immediately before the people is whether New York City shall spend $20,000,000 for a new aqueduct. The present aqueduct brings to the city no less than 93,000,000 gallons a day, which is at least ninety-three gallons for every man, woman and child on the island. Who uses ninety-three gallons of water? It is enough to enable each person to wash his hands and face nine times, bathe all over in a bath-tub twice, and drink ten gallons, and then there would be sufficient left for ten gallons more for each horse, dog and cat on the island. Of course, as a matter of fact, much water goes to manufactories, livery-stables, etc.; but it would be absurd to argue seriously that far less water than the present supply would suffice. It has been found, by actual experiment, that fifteen gallons a day for each inhabitant is enough for all uses in a city with such a sewage system as ours; and it is estimated by competent engineers that twenty gallons to the inhabitant would abundantly supply all the people and all the manufactories and other large consumers on Manhattan Island, if it were used economically—in other words, that more than three-fourths of our whole supply is utterly wasted. In the face of this showing, it would be no less than plunder for the Board of Public Works to tax the people for an enlargement of the Croton system.

An able engineer, who has been investigating this matter, has decided that at least one-third of the water that comes to the city (30,000,000 gallons a day) is never delivered at all, but runs to waste through defective piping and fittings; and that the remainder of the lost water, say 30,000,000 gallons more, is wasted by the recklessness and improvidence of the people themselves. If this double waste can be stopped the aqueducts at present in use will be sufficient for the next half-century, and water will flow to the upper floors; if it goes on, faucets will soon cease to run above first floors, and a supply of 200 gallons a day per head would not prove sufficient. To remedy the great loss through defective pipes, we may take a lesson from Liverpool. That city, about three-fourths as large as this, was recently confronted with the same evil. The city was divided into 230 districts, in each of which the consumption of water was measured by meters at the confluence of mains. The wasteful districts were overhauled. In some districts it was found that five-sixths of the water was wasted. Leaks were found in this way and stopped, and the evil was remedied at a very small expense. The city has now a great surplus of water by the same system, where before the supply was altogether inadequate. The amount of water now used is only twenty-one gallons a head daily.

Wastefulness on the part of the people can be prevented by applying the meter system to all manufactories, livery-stables, hotels, publishing-houses and other large consumers, and compelling payment for all water used in excess of a specified amount. This measure has been partially adopted in Worcester, Providence and other cities with the most excellent results. There might be sanitary objections to limiting the amount of water used in tenement-houses; but if there is any reason why the ordinary profligate consumer of water should not pay for the luxury of extravagance, it is not obvious. No increase in the aqueduct capacity will remedy the evil as long as the tremendous waste under ground continues unabated, and reckless consumers are free to turn their faucets and leave the water running without restraint. Where waste is unchecked there can never be "enough."

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

THE Liberal Party of Great Britain is pledged to extend household suffrage to the counties, and to redress, as far as possible, the existing inequalities in the distribution of political power. There can be no two opinions as to the desirableness of action in this direction. It is simply impossible to conceive of any valid reason why the present differences in the county and borough suffrage should be maintained, or why, as the Nineteenth Century states it, "political power should be so unequally distributed that 47,000 people in ten small English and Irish boroughs should return ten members to the House of Commons, while only nine members are returned by Liverpool, Glasgow and Manchester with a population of 1,349,000, and only eight are returned by four metropolitan constituencies with a population of 1,671,000." But while the continuance of these inequalities cannot be defended, the settlement of the precise principles on which the new distribution of seats should be based will be found no easy matter. Complete symmetry, perfect equality, cannot possibly be obtained without a wholesale demolition of existing constituencies, and for this the English mind is as yet obviously unprepared. The most that will probably be attempted will be the attainment of an approximation to equality sufficient to satisfy all reasonable demands. Possibly some of the smaller boroughs may be grouped together, as has been done in Scotland and Wales since 1832, thus forming constituencies of adequate size, and providing a sufficient number of seats to meet the wants of the large constituencies, which are now either inadequately represented or not represented at all. As to the extension of household suffrage to the counties, no mere general Act will be satisfactory. As is generally known, the borough and county suffrage at the present time rests on entirely different bases. Residence is an indispensable qualification for the exercise of a borough vote, whereas a man may vote for a county, and, except on the day of election, never spend a single hour within its borders. A man may own half a borough, and, if he does not reside within seven miles of it, he cannot obtain a vote; but however far away a man resides from a county, if he owns within it a freehold or rent charge of the annual value of forty shillings, or a copyhold or leasehold, either during the life of one person or for a period of not less than sixty years, of the annual value of five pounds, he obtains a vote for the county. Obviously, simply passing a Bill to extend household suffrage to the counties would by no means secure equality between the franchise in boroughs and counties; on the contrary, the suffrage in the counties would be much less restricted than in the boroughs. Resident householders would be able to vote on the same conditions in boroughs and counties; but in addition, the non-resident freeholder or householder would be able to vote for counties, whereas he would be precluded from voting for a borough. How to secure equality in this direction will be one of the problems which the new Government must solve in dealing with this general subject, and so far there are no intimations of any plan which would probably command a majority vote.

The latest announcement in connection with this whole subject is to the effect that the Government will not introduce a Bill for the redistribution of Parliamentary seats until the result of the census of 1881 is ascertained. If action shall thus be postponed, time will be afforded and data supplied for more mature and careful judgment than may now be possible, and, besides, a coherency and unity of sentiment may be reached among the Liberals which will constitute a safer and more secure foundation for the Reform structure than it seems possible to lay in the existing conditions of doubt and uncertainty.

THE GREENBACK HERESY.

TO suppose that the Greenback idea is dead, or even in the last throes of dissolution, is to commit an egregious blunder. Although the advocates of that idea are not so blatant as formerly, the heresy still lives, and possesses vitality enough to work mischief should the opportunity offer. As an independent movement, Greenbackism has undoubtedly attained the maximum of its success, but it cannot be ignored for the reason, as a contemporary remarks, that "a situation is quite possible within the next six months in which it can make its indirect influence very distinctly felt, and in which that influence may have a decided, and even a disastrous, effect upon the country."

However blindly ignorant the following of that party may be with reference to finance, it cannot be denied that the leaders are well educated in all the quips and quirks of political chicanery. It is not for a principle, or a well-founded idea, that they contend, but for place, power, and bread and butter. They well understand that the Greenback Party, acting without special reference to other parties, would amount to little more than a pinch of snuff in effectiveness. It might bring about an explosive sneeze, but the effect would be harmless. The Greenbackers, then, knowing their own party weakness, will seek to obtain recognition of their "idea" in the platforms of the two great political parties, and more particularly in that of the Democracy. With a paper show of strength they will court alliances in the nomination of Representatives and State officers, and compel the candidates of such a coalition to express views favorable to their ideas of finance.

That the Greenbackers can expect little or nothing from the Republican Party is quite evident. That party must stand by its record made through resumption, and its defense of sound money principles in the Congressional canvass of last year. The drift of Greenbackers must, in such a case, be towards an alliance with the Democracy. Already in Maine and Iowa there are signs of a Greenback-Democratic combination in the coming elections. The danger of such co operation is not to be apprehended in the choice of national candidates. It is in the Congressional districts that Greenbackism will seek to do its work. There the restraining considerations existing in such pivotal States as New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, will not be felt. The mass of Democratic Congressmen, to secure re-election, will scarcely hesitate to make such a bargain as the Greenbackers will be ready to dictate. In this manner, and by this means, the Greenback sentiment in the next Congress may be greatly strengthened. We do not mean to say that Republicans, under like circumstances, would not adopt the same tactics, but it so happens that Republican candidates are under no necessity to hitch horses with the Greenback jockeys.

If the elections of last year are to be accepted as a criterion by which we may measure the present strength of parties, then we may assume that the Democrats will find hot work in preserving their majority in the next House. There can scarcely be a doubt that if Representatives to the Forty-seventh Congress had been chosen last year the Democrats would have suffered defeat. Their conduct during the late extra session did not tend to commend them to the country, as the minor and local elections since held very plainly show. Since then they have avoided giving new cause of offense, and particularly on this Greenback question. When, in a series of resolutions, Mr. Weaver endeavored to get before the House the extreme doctrines of the Greenbackers, the Democratic members sought to prevent, and Speaker Randall exercised a power almost despotic to suppress, the Greenback leader and his avowals. But when at last no further cause for repression could be found, and the resolutions were admitted to a vote, they received the joint support, with two exceptions, of Democrats and Greenbackers. The moral of this is that, the two elements, at a pinch, will run together like two drops of water.

There are obvious reasons why the people should not permit the Greenback idea to gather strength in the way and manner to which we have called attention, or, for that matter, in any other way. The country has suffered from the curse of long unredeemed government paper issues, and the people have tasted the dregs of poverty through a depreciated currency. Should the Greenback element be so strengthened in the next House as to hold the balance of power, and should circumstances arise causing a reversal in the balance of trade, a stringency in the money market, a decline in prices, and a stagnation in business, there would doubtless be a cry raised for new issues of paper by the Government. It will be wise to make the success of such a scheme impossible by securing in the next House a clean majority of members in favor of an honest currency and a safe financial policy.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE composition of the new English Ministry has been decided upon. Parliament has met and adjourned to allow the members of the House of Commons who have accepted office to be re-elected, the acceptance of office in England necessitating a new appeal to a member's constituency. The most notable feature in the composition of the Liberal Ministry is the entire absence of any members of the extreme Liberal, or Radical, Party, and there will be probably a good deal of discontent at this failure to recognize the undoubted claims of a certain division of the party. It is not unlikely that one of the most serious difficulties the new Ministry will be called upon to face will be the proposed disestablishment of the Anglican Church and the Scotch kirk. Both Lord Hartington and Mr. Gladstone have intimated their willingness to consider the feasibility of the abolition of the Scotch kirk, but it is certain that any attempt to disestablish the Anglican Church would at once alienate the High Church Party which were detached from the Conservative side by Lord Beaconsfield when he supported the Public Worship Regulation Act. With disestablishment, disendowment must also come, for no party would sanction the application of the enormous revenues of the church to what would be sectarian uses.

Another probable element of disunion among the Liberals will be the extension of suffrage to women. Mr. Gladstone is scarcely less opposed to it than was Lord Beaconsfield, and many Liberals think that it would be a conservative measure. At the same time it is likely that the women's supporters will be well represented in the new Parliament. In the majority of English constituencies the topics here alluded to, and such others as the sale of beer, for instance, are of far greater importance than the maintenance of England's prestige on the Continent or in India. And this tendency of a Liberal Government is well understood in Europe, where there is a good deal of dissatisfaction at the result of the election.

The election of M. Beauquier, a Red Radical and disciple of M. Clémenceau, as Deputy from the Department of Doubs, in France, is fraught with significance. The election was to fill the seat vacated by Albert Grévy—a brother of the President—just appointed Governor-General of Algeria. It was, no doubt, partly owing to personal influence that the more moderate M. Ordinaire, the representative of Gambetta and Freycinet, was beaten by his Radical opponent, but still the strength of Clémenceau and his party is evidently increasing. Clémenceau is now the rising man in France, and the elections next year will be a struggle between the Republicans of Gambetta's color and the pupils of Clémenceau's school. The latter is not an orator like the President of the Chamber of Deputies, but his logic is of that trenchant, incisive kind that is especially dangerous nowadays, when a speech is multiplied a thousand times by the power of the Press.

Colonel Synge, who was captured by some Greek and Wallachian brigands last January and ransomed by the English Government, has returned to Salonica, and the tale that he tells is like a leaf from the "Roi des Montagnes." The brigands laid siege to his house in the most systematic fashion, having first given some meat to his dogs to keep them quiet. He attempted to defend his house, but the brigands got possession of some hay, which they set on fire, and threatened to burn him out. They succeeded in making him surrender at discretion, and Nico, the leader of the band, a young man of twenty-five, but possessed of much intelligence, and the idol of the band, tied Synge at the two elbows, the rope passing across his neck. Thus bound, his eyes were bandaged and he was taken, by a long detour, into the mountains, where he was given a bed of leaves to rest on, and bread and goats' flesh for food. Otherwise he does not appear to have suffered any harsh treatment, except that on one occasion the brigands threatened to flay him alive, cover him with petroleum and then roast him over a slow fire. When the ransom-money was being counted out, Nico examined each piece carefully lest it should be marked, and insisted upon a delay of twenty-four hours before allowing the colonel to go free, so that he and his band might leave the neighborhood, having from the first refused an amnesty.

The racing season has opened with considerable brilliancy in England, and, although the American contingent has not quite walked away with everything, as was the case last year, still there is no reason to complain. The victory of Mr. Lorillard's Wallenstein in the New Market Handicap—the race in which Parole made his début last year—was complete. He cantered easily away from his horses and won, hands down. Indeed, as a discontented Englishman remarked, "If this sort of thing goes on, the name of the race had better be changed to the 'New York' Handicap."

In yachting great things are promised. Two new sloops, or, rather, cutters, have been built, and it is expected that they will revolutionize the yacht-building of the future. One has been built on the Clyde, in Scotland, and the other at Lymington, in the south of England. Like the new Cunarder, which is to be soon launched, the Scotch vessel is built of steel, while the other is of oak. In both, the present system of yacht-building has been carried almost to its furthest point of development: both are very narrow and deep, and both carry an enormous amount of lead ballast on the keel. The contest between these yachts and other English boats is looked forward to with great interest, and perhaps a struggle with one of our own speedy ships may be possible.

The fate of the English Government training-ship, the Atalanta, which has for some time been the cause of much uneasiness, has, perhaps, been settled by the reported finding of a bottle containing a paper stating that the Atalanta was dismasted and in immediate danger of foundering as long ago as March 16th. The Atalanta was cruising in the West Indies, with orders to return home about April 4th. Yellow fever broke out, and the captain resolved to return at once. This was on January 31st, when she sailed from Bermuda, and nothing has been heard of her since then.

Prince Bismarck is suffering intensely from neuralgia, and is only remaining in Berlin for the passing by the Reichstag of some important Government measures. As soon as he has finished this business he will retire to Lauenberg until Autumn, and Count von Hatzfelt will take his place at the Foreign Office. In a letter that the Prince has lately addressed to a member of the Reichstag, he does not believe that he shall see a day of peace, and thinks that it is quite useless to bother about it, as it is outside the region of practical politics. The Parliament has had a full discussion of the various clauses of the Army Bill, and so warlike was the feeling that a motion to exempt the clergy from liability to military service was almost unanimously rejected. At the same time the military aspect of the recent legislation by which the Government becomes possessor of the railways of the kingdom, is most important. The Prussian State not only purchases several of the largest lines, but it is empowered to build several new ones, some of which will be of the highest strategic importance. The policy of Prussia is still that of the dominant state; the railways at present in her possession and those in course of construction will enable her to crush any rebellion of the smaller States against the empire, and in this the cause of the opposition of the smaller States to Bismarck's schemes for a union of the German lines is to be found.

One of the most interesting events of the coming Summer in Europe will be the renewal of the "Passion Play," at Ober-Ammergau, in Upper Bavaria. It has been customary since the year 1634 to give a decennial representation of the passion and death of Christ in this little Tyrolese village. In 1870 there was no performance, for many of the actors were serving in the field during the Franco-Prussian war. But in the following year the play was acted and drew enormous crowds of spectators from all parts of Europe and the United States. Since then a permanent theatre has been built to hold 4,500 spectators, and the railroad from Munich, which used to run only to Wellheim, is now continued to Murnau. There will be twenty-four performances, beginning on Whitsun-Monday, May 17th, and ending on September 26th. Most of the performers will be the same as those who supported the different characters in 1871. Although few strangers visit the "Passion Play" from religious motives, it must not be supposed that the peasants, who take part in it, are not influenced by a certain superstitious feeling, for it is in accordance with a vow taken in the time of a plague that these representations are still given.

Theatrical and musical affairs have been rather dull. In London revivals of old pieces are to be found at almost all the theatres, and Joaquin Miller's "The Danites," with an American company, has met with a fair success at Sadler's Wells Theatre. The Royal Italian opera season was opened with a performance of "The King of Lahore," but neither the artists nor the operas have yet given call for special mention. A rather interesting revival is to take place at the Gaiety Theatre, where a series of matinées is to be given, at each of which one of the works of the old half-forgotten dramatists will be acted. The first play will be Lillo's "George Barnwell," and the list includes such antiquated productions as Steele's "Tender Husband," Rowe's "Jane Shore" and "Fair Penitent," Cibber's "Lady's Last Stake," Sheridan's version of Kotzebue's "Pizarro," and many others. The difference between these plays and the fashionable drama of to day is very striking, and it will be curious to observe what the result will be.

THE New York Assembly has passed the Bill prohibiting discriminations by railroad corporations in charges for freight transportation. The Bill is in every way just and proper, and there ought to be no doubt of its passage by the Senate. But it would be unsafe to conclude that that body will pass the measure because it is meritorious and demanded by the public.

THE supporters of General Grant set out with the exultant prophecy that the ex-President would be nominated by acclamation. Now a good many of them are content to boast of his strength as "a good second choice." And none pretend that his nomination will be possible without a sharp struggle. Not one of the strongly Republican Northern States will give him anything like a unanimous support in the National Convention, if the real sentiment of the party is consulted.

THE action of the Pennsylvania Court of Pardons in recommending the pardon of Wm. H. Kemble and others, who had been sentenced to one year's imprisonment for the attempted bribery of members of the Legislature, is very justly and generally condemned outside of "Ring" circles in that State. The offenders, who are now at liberty, were guilty of a deliberate and shameless crime, and to set them free within five days of their sentence is simply to put contempt upon the law and invite a wholesale defiance of its penalties by lobbyists intent on debauching the legislation of the State.

RECENT disclosures as to the operations of Superintendent of Insurance Smyth during the closing hours of his administration justify the severest criticisms which have been leveled against him. Correspondence submitted to the Legislature present him in the character of a "striker," seeking to levy tribute upon the leading insurance corporations of the metropolis, and so satisfy his spite because of their refusal to urge his retention in office. A more flagrant exhibition of official impropriety can scarcely be conceived of than this last exhibit of the superintendent whom the Governor of the State has persisted in keeping in position until public opinion compelled his removal.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL KEY having accepted the appointment to the United States District Judgeship of Tennessee, made vacant by the death of Judge Trigg, it is said that Postmaster James of this city will be strongly urged for the position of chief of the Postal Department. Certainly no better selection could possibly be made by the President. Mr. James has exhibited a competency and fidelity in the position he now fills which place him at the head of all officials connected with this particular service, and should he be made Postmaster-General, doubtless there would be introduced into the methods and administration of that department a coherency and efficiency which have heretofore been conspicuously lacking.

A NOTABLE incident in financial circles last week was the action of the foreign banks in calling in their loans, owing to the passage by the New York Legislature of a Bill to tax the foreign capital employed in the State. Several millions of dollars were thus called in by Canadian banks, and as a result the money and stock markets were much disturbed. That the Act passed by the Legislature is a piece of downright stupidity scarcely admits of a doubt. A tax on profits of capital employed here would not perhaps be objectionable, but the effect of the present Bill will be, necessarily, to drive away foreign bankers, and possibly merchants, together with the capital of insurance and other companies and commercial enterprises which have their headquarters outside of the State.

ANOTHER illustration of Turkish perfidy is afforded in the matter of the Montenegrin frontier. The convention between Turkey and Montenegro provided that certain frontier territory should be evacuated by the Turks, and that the fortified positions in the ceded territory should be handed over directly to the Montenegrins, so as to admit of no interval between the evacuation and the new occupation. Instead of complying with this agreement, the Turks have winked at the occupation of the strategic points of the new territory by the Albanians; and now, although the Powers have interposed in her behalf, Montenegro will be pretty certainly, for a time at least, defrauded of her rights. The new British Government may, perhaps, be relied upon to act in the matter with a decision befitting the gravity of the offense against treaty stipulations.

THE annual report of the operations of the United States Life-Saving Service for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1879, shows very clearly the heroic work done by its employés. The statistics of the disasters which have occurred within the scope of life-saving operations, from November 1st, 1871 (date of introduction of present system), to close of the last fiscal year, are as follows: Total number of disasters, 797; value of vessels, $10,722,733; value of cargoes, $5,923,294; total value of property saved, $9,510,408; value of property lost, $7,099,619; total number of persons on vessels, 8,392; number of persons saved, 8,030; total number of lives lost, 362; number of persons sheltered, 1,753; number of days' shelter afforded, 4,790. The mortuary record of the year is happily free from any fatality of great magnitude like that of the Circassian, the Metropolis, or the Huron, and the individual groups of the lost are comparatively small. The report shows the efficiency of this valuable service under a bright light.

THE sentiment is growing that the country can well afford to dispense with the services of the officers now in charge of the Military Academy at West Point. It is quite obvious from the incidents of the Whittaker investigation that some of these officers have no sort of sympathy with the law which admits colored cadets to that institution, and not only fail to do anything to secure these unfortunates proper treatment, but sometimes actually go out of their way to aggravate the color prejudice in the minds of the white cadets. General Schofield's recent order, in which the cadets were held up as models of chivalry, right in face of the fact that they had been shown to have treated Whittaker with cruel contempt and injustice, was a marked specimen of this official tendency, and we are not surprised that his superiors have felt called upon to avow their dissatisfaction with a proceeding so utterly unjustifiable. The Government should either place the West Point Academy in charge of men who are abreast of the spirit of the times, abolish it altogether, or, as the Times suggests, "break down the aristocracy of place by making scholarships so numerous that, instead of creating a narrow caste, the Academy will turn out a thousand or more of graduates each year."

Blaine has ten of the delegates. The South Carolina Republicans instructed for General Grant. The Pennsylvania Democratic Convention, after considerable debate, resolved, April 29th, to oppose the abrogation of the two-thirds rule in the National Convention. METHODIST EPISCOPAL GENERAL CONFERENCE.

THE General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which convened in Pike's Opera House, Cincinnati, May 1st, is expected to prove one of the most important in the history of the Church. It will include many of the most distinguished men of the denomination, and will deal with several questions of commanding interest. One of the principal subjects which will occupy attention will be the preparation of a uniform order of worship. A strong effort will also be made to bring about some modification in the Presiding-Eldership system. Another measure which will elicit discussion is that which looks towards the introduction of lay representation into the Annual Conferences. The lay delegates to the General Conference will, of course, favor this measure, but by many of the ministers it will be bitterly opposed. One thing that has rendered lay representation rather unpopular than otherwise with ministers is the fact that the greater voice laymen have in the councils of the Church the more influence they will necessarily have with the bishops when the appointments are made. Their influence at this point is supposed by many to be already much greater than it ought to be.

Still another important proposition that will be brought before the Conference will be one providing for the extension of the limit of the pastoral term. At present the longest period a Methodist minister can have one charge is three years. This is felt by many to be not long enough. Those favoring an extension say that it takes about three years for a minister to get thoroughly acquainted with his flock, and that to arbitrarily remove him after so short a pastorate is to deprive him of the privilege of building upon his own patiently-laid foundations. The disadvantages of the three years' system are, it is claimed, especially felt in cities, where churches having a settled pastorate get a firmer hold upon the general public, and are, in consequence, more influential and prosperous. There is, however, doubtless something to be said on the other side of this question, and it is thought to be certain that the limit will not be entirely removed, equally certain that it will not be very much extended, while the probabilities are that the little extension that is made will be limited in its application to large cities. Another thing which makes the General Conference of this Church a very important gathering is the fact that it has at its disposal a large number of influential and remunerative offices. It is generally believed that the Conference will make several additions to the episcopate. By some it is thought that there will be four new bishops created; others put the number at six; others, again, at eight. Other offices to be filled are two missionary secretaryships, four book agencies, and several editorial chairs.

In connection with our illustration of the Conference, we give a picture of Wesley Chapel, the mother church of Methodism in Cincinnati. The first class was organized in 1804, and consisted of only eight persons; but so rapid was the growth of the church, that in less than two years the leaders of the society determined to secure a lot and erect upon it a house of worship. They accordingly purchased a site on the northwest corner of Fifth Street and Broadway, at that time in the midst of open fields. A small stone house was put up in 1805; and when this became too small, a brick addition was built in the rear. In process of time, even this was outgrown, and in 1829 the present building was erected.

HEATING RAILROAD CARRIAGES.

A FRENCH railway company is trying a new method of heating express trains. The method consists simply in the use of acetate of soda in the foot-warmers in common use on French trains. The substance has considerable latent heat; dissolving at a certain temperature, it thus absorbs a large quantity of heat, which becomes sensible during crystallization in cooling. All that is required is to fill the ordinary cases with a sufficient quantity of the acetate, close them and place them in a stove at about 300 degrees. The cooling of a case thus charged and heated takes from twelve to fifteen hours. The warmers are thereafter taken from the compartments and placed in a stove (where the crystals of soda acetate are redissolved); they are then ready for fresh use. The advantages of such a system are obvious—no necessity of changing warmers every two or three hours, or of maintaining a numerous body of men at stations to attend to them; economy in cost of heating, etc. Moreover, most of the existing foot-warmers can be utilized. Acetate of soda is not very expensive, and it could easily be manufactured in much larger quantities than at present if the demand required. The new system has been tried on an express train leaving Paris at 7:15 and reaching Perrache at 4:31. The compartments were each supplied at starting with two warmers containing acetate of soda. At Perrache most of the warmers were still so hot that one could not apply the back of the hand to them.

FOR PASTIME.

"WHAT on airth, Jerushy Ann Brooks! be you goin' clean daft? Ef you hevn't sizzled off half yer front hair!" And Mrs. Brooks, a gaunt, raw-boned woman, pale of face, hollow-eyed, with the worn out, over-worked look of a farmer's wife, gazed at her sixteen year old daughter with decided disfavor.

Jerusha, a lank, tall girl, who seemed all made up of loosely-hung joints, was staring into the glass with a pair of lack-lustre blue eyes, vainly trying to coax her stiff, ash-colored hair into a becoming friz over her forehead.

She looked rather abashed and turned a sheepish glance upon her mother. "It's the style," she muttered.

"Lor's a massy! Ef that ar Miss Ogden's goin' to turn yer head to that extent, yer par will rue the time he ever took Summer boarders. That woman's furbelows and flounces and vanities will send her soul to hell! Hain't ye heard in the Bible what becomes of the women folks that paints their face and tires their hair? I guess that means the frizzes and bangs and puffs and crimps. They're tiring enough in all conscience! Jerusha Ann, consider 'the adorning of a meek and quiet spirit,' and jest skim off them milk-pans and pick over the strawberries, and slap up a cake for tea, and git out the sheets for the supply's bed, and slick up his room. He'll be here to tea, and I want him to see we're scrumptious, not as I suppose he's any great shucks. Widow Leith's son, of Summerville—poor as Job she was, I heerd, but so ambitious, and slaved and slaved to edicate him. I hope he'll reward her. Children don't very often! I hope she'll never know 'how much worse than a thankless tooth it is to have a serpent child,' as Shakspeare says. There, go!"

Jerusha Ann turned sulkily away, and Mrs. Brooks faced about suddenly to see a graceful, slender figure standing in the doorway—a woman of perhaps thirty, but looking as if every year had bestowed upon her some new beauty and grace. The hair, brown, yet lit with sunlight as it were, was like a crown to the well poised head. Its ripples and curls looked as fitting as the moss to a moss-rose. The eyes were bluish-gray, dark, beautiful, cold and pitiless, beneath straight, delicate eyebrows. The nose was perfect, the mouth good, but not sweet or tender, though the lips were ripe and red, and perhaps a little voluptuous in expression. The lady wore some wonderful combination of batiste and lace, such as had never dawned upon the natives before—indeed all her dresses made Jerusha gasp with envy and admiration. She had careless-looking knots of pale-pink ribbon over it here and there. Her throat was round and white; her hands wonderful white, rose-lined and dimpled, every pink nail a study. Miss Ogden devoted an hour a day to her hands! Just now the high-bred face was languid, the dark eyes a trifle heavy. There was a dullness in the active brain, a torpor in the system. The past Winter had overtaxed her, so the obsequious city doctor had said, and so she had been banished to some out of the way spot—any place where mountain air and perfect quiet could be obtained—that was her sentence. Miss Ogden had breathed mountain air for two weeks, and had tested the pleasures of solitude for the same time, and she began to groan in spirit. Good Mrs. Brooks colored up a little. "The cat," she thought, "comin' up in them slippers so a body never hears her. I wonder how long she's been there now."

But she tried to compose her face to a pleasant expression. This woman, so fair and gracious to behold, who looked like the lilies of the field that toil not neither do they spin, somehow roused the lurking devil of envy that was generally deeply buried in good Mrs. Brooks's heart. When she looked up at her she had some sort of that feeling that maddened the Republicans of old France and impelled them to tear off crowns and send the heads of the languid and beautiful aristocrats rolling in the dust. She would have been frightened at her own sentiments if she had read them aright, but she called them righteous indignation against seeing an immortal soul wholly given over to the pomps and vanities of life.

"Did I hear you say you expected a new boarder to-night?" asked Miss Ogden, in her sweet, low voice, with a languid stir of interest in her heart.

"Yes. Old Mr. Putnam has a leave of absence for his health. He's got confluence of the liver awful, and they've got a young man from Summerville to dispense the gospel; 'twon't make much difference to you, 'cos you don't attend meetin' I believe."

"I'm an Episcopalian," said Miss Ogden, smiling; "that is, I go there. I'm not a member."

"Oh, they're high-flyers and very fashionable, I know," answered Mrs. Brooks, with a slight sniff; "it's easy to be 'Piscopal pious. You kin go right on with theatres and parties and dancing; 'taint no sort of interruption. Yes; the young man who's a supply will stay here, and I must go and look after things, if you'll excuse me!"

Genevieve Ogden laughed—a low laugh that had an unsympathetic ring to it—lifted her pretty draperies and went out into the garden. It was nearly time for the sunset of a long, fragrant June day. The skies already were kindling with flame, though overhead cool, pale-green tints were still lingering. All the world was fresh and green and beautiful. The softest haze rested over the mountains, pale-purple, soft-gray, filmy as a bridal vail. All about her flowers were blooming, and the roses were in full beauty—pale ones of creamy tints and subtle fragrance; great, dark, crimson ones, with heavy, musky odors; soft, blushing ones like a young girl's cheek, and some regal-looking ones, perfect in form, matchless in coloring, but with the fragrance which is the soul of the flower wanting. These were like Genevieve Ogden.

She picked one idly as she passed, held it carelessly in her hand and plucked the leaves from it one by one, dropping them on the green grass, where they lay like little pink shells. She was not thinking of them, but of the dreariness of the place.

"Two weeks without a single ray of man on my benighted pathway," she said, with a laugh.

The gate clicked at that very moment, and one entered—a tall young man, well-made, handsome, though rather too pale and sallow, with somewhat heavy, slumbrous black eyes, crisp, black, curly hair, a silky mustache and a sensitive mouth. He had a worn expression, perhaps from over-study, was somewhat haggard and sad, as if life were too hard for him, and he had scarcely the strength to conquer it.

Of course Genevieve Ogden did not see all of this at once while the young man opened the gate and walked up to the house. She had leisure to examine him thoroughly at tea that evening, at which she brightened up considerably, and said that the air of the place was beginning to do her good. Ambrose Leith opened his slumbrous eyes with new lights kindled in them when he saw her sitting at that table, in pale-blue silk and Breton lace. She seemed to bring with her an atmosphere he had never known. She was to him the champagne, the flower, the sparkle of another life; so unlike his prosy work-day world, that he breathed the faint fragrance of it with enchantment. What soul so saintly that it cannot be tempted by the world, the flesh and the devil? To Ambrose Leith this fair woman was a trinity of the three, and he did not know it.

He only knew that she soothed him and yet roused him at the same time. She was clothed in wonder to him—the delicate, beautiful fabrics, the diamonds that glittered at the lace knotted so carelessly about her throat, or that shone in her ears and on her round, white fingers, the fall of her drapery on the humble floor, the glimpse of her perfect foot in its pale-blue silk stocking and tiny slipper, were all a beauty and a mystery. He knew something of hard-working, unlovely womanhood, full of the graces of the spirit. He had, of course, seen something of rustic beauty in his time, but this—ah! this was something ethereal, yet glowing, a living poem that a man might long to learn by heart.

Genevieve, leaning back idly in an easy-chair on the little porch that sweet June evening, watched the young clergyman pacing the garden walks with an odd sensation.

"He is a new type," she thought. "It will pass the time away to study him a little. He is rustic, shy and morbid, but I think I could find the key-note of his nature if it were worth the trouble."

Ambrose Leith cast many a glance at her as he paced the walks. He scarcely knew how to talk to her. He felt that her world was so different, her thoughts so unlike. There seemed no plane upon which they could meet.

Mrs. Brooks, sitting at the kitchen-door shelling peas, and thus taking time by the forelock for another day, or Jerusha washing the tea-dishes with a rattle and bang that displayed a good deal of temper—a sort of crockery drama—seemed more approachable. The young girl was engaged in a wrathful inward rebellion against fate while she slammed about the blue-and-white cups and saucers. Why would not her hair wave and droop over her forehead? How would her hands look, if she had not wrestled with hard work all her life? The instincts of her sex were budding in her heart. She had put on her best dress—a white one—and had a blue ribbon at her neck, and now ma had given her a scolding and made her lay aside the holiday attire and don her work-day clothes. She was beginning to feel that her life was all drudgery, now that she had seen Genevieve Ogden. She knew the young minister had scarcely looked at her.

Farmer Brooks, tilted back in a chair under one of the trees, with a pipe in his mouth, was the most serene of the party. He, too, found Miss Ogden gracious to look upon, and he voted between the whiffs that she was a "reg'lar thoroughbred."

After a time the soft, June twilight deepened; the air grew heavier with fragrance; the sky, all wide, blue azure, lit up its golden lamps; the moon set sail its silver boat, and, in the pale radiance, the figure on the porch, with the dim-blue, glistening draperies, seemed more unreal. Mrs. Brooks finished the peas and went in to rest; Jerusha sat up in her bare little room trying to plait up some lace, in imitation of Miss Ogden's ruchings; the farmer went in to doze over his newspaper, and then the young minister came and sat down on the low steps near Genevieve.

"Do you not find it very lonely here?" he asked.

"I did," she answered, with a subtle flattery in her tone.

"Yet for a little time it must interest you, I should think. You can study the aborigines"—a little bitterly.

"Why do you take that tone?"—this in a very bland and caressing voice. "Why should I not love Nature and enjoy and commune with her?"

"Do you?"—with a laugh.

"I would if I had some one to whom I could say 'How lovely!' That is what young ladies always say; or, 'How perfectly lovely?' English girls vary it by saying 'It's too awfully jolly!'" But she added, with a sudden recollection of the person to whom she was talking: "I shall have a new pleasure now—I shall hear you preach."

The young man flushed a little.

"I try to make my sermons short—they have that merit."

"After all," said Genevieve, with just a little sigh, "I am glad to get out of the old life for a while. This is Arcadia, you know. It's like Marie Antoinette playing at dairymaid. There! that will sound conceited to you, but I only mean it's something of that sort. I am as tired of my state life as she was. I will forget the forms and conventionalities of the society I have left. But I need a pilot on this untried sea. I must find the channel—I must avoid the quicksands."

And Ambrose Leith, looking up into the eloquent eyes, just suffused with a tender melancholy, as if life had somehow been a failure with her, offered his services in any way.

"Thank you. Every one here seems to have too much work on hand to think of pleasure. I am somewhat run down—so my doctor says—and I have come here to be wound up again. Do you know how it feels to be run down—as if the sky had grown a little clouded—as if the pulse was too tired to beat—as if life were scarcely worth the trouble of living?"

"I have felt that," answered the young man, with a sudden keen pang piercing his heart—"and as if I would be satisfied to let it all ebb away from me for ever."

"He has had some bitter heart experience," thought Genevieve, as she put up her bright hair that night. "He looks as if some sort of stupor had seized him. It would be a good work to rouse him from it.

And it was with this laudable effort, perhaps, that she bestowed so much of her society upon him. For they walked together, rode together and talked together in the long, fragrant June evenings without stint. The mountain air, the cream, and the stimulus of hunting her prey, brought newer bloom to the young woman's cheek. She found herself really interested in this morbid devotee, who, unconsciously to even himself, lavished more worship at her shrine than before his Maker's. She saw his heart in his eyes—in his devotion, but he had never put it into words. He had times of moodiness, when some secret sorrow preyed upon his soul, and times of exhilaration, when it seemed supreme happiness to be near her—times when he absented himself for a day or two. Yet he spoke not.

Genevieve, who had been accustomed to having her lovers open their inmost souls to her, that she might read "motives, conditions, means, appliances," did not understand this reticence. Why would he not talk of his life to her? Why did he not talk of his love to her? She had a morbid hunger for passionate speeches. She loved to read her power in a man's agony, to see her victim writhe and suffer for her. She had so far failed with Ambrose Leith, and it was a mystery she longed to solve. Mrs. Brooks was glad the young man took her lady boarder and her amusement off her hands.

"He's a pious critter—one of the salt of the airth," she said to Jerusha, as that young lady was savagely cutting out cookies with a heart-shaped cutter, "and that woman needs sermonin' some, you bet! There ain't no limit to the grace of God, and who knows but he may bring her round in time. I'm sure he's a wrastlin' fur her at the throne o' grace, for I heerd him gin two or three heartbreakin' groans last night when he was goin' to bed."

"Fiddlesticks!" said the skeptical Jerusha, stabbing the sugar hearts with a fork as fiercely as if they had been Miss Ogden's and Ambrose Leith's. "He's dead in love with her; anybody kin see that with half an eye."

"Good Lord!" exclaimed Mrs. Brooks. "If he was a permanency here instead of a temporary, I'd git the elders to visit him. That woman a minister's wife!"

"Lor," cried Jerusha, with a sniff, "she's a playing with him. He's in earnest and she ain't—that's the difference."

The young girl's own feelings towards the minister had sharpened her vision.

Miss Ogden came down-stairs the next morning in the palest of crisp pink muslins, frilled with lace. Not a rose in the garden looked fresher or sweeter. It was a hot day, but she was cool and placid and serene. The most fervid sunlight only brought out the pearl tints of her skin and the gold gleams of her hair.

"Let us have a long drive to-day," she said to the young man, as they rose from the breakfast-table.

She spoke with an air of proprietorship that made Jerusha writhe with envy.

"I feel like flying away on the wings of the wind somewhere," added Miss Ogden.

"If we can find the wind," laughed Ambrose, "It's a dead calm, not enough to fill the sails of Pleasure's sail-boat."

"Well, we must raise a breeze somehow!"

"She kin do that if any woman could," muttered Mrs. Brooks to Jerusha.

"I wish I could take the wind out of her sails," answered the girl, spitefully. "She has a good time drivin' round and dressin', while I've got pots and pans to wash, this meltin' day. I'm just about tired of pot-wrastlin', ma. 'Tain't no use o' living—I wish I was dead."

"Jerusha Ann, I'm surprised at you. I shouldn't wonder if some visitation would happen to you a-flyin' in the face o' Providence this way, after all yer blessin's—of pious parents and good bringin' up. Where'd you be if it warn't for me and yer pa?"

"I wouldn't be washin' dishes. I wouldn't be livin', and perhaps that would be better," said Jerusha, in wrath.

"Lor's a massy! Miss Ogden's turned your head," sighed good Mrs. Brooks, leaving her moody daughter alone and going up to make the beds.

In the meantime the two sources of Jerusha's discontent were spinning merrily along the road. The motion of the carriage made a gentle breeze. The country all about was dewy bright; the distant mountain-tops, with a tremulous golden haze over them, seemed to heave and throb away

> "At the sight of the great sky,
> And the silence as it stood,
> In the glory's golden flood,
> Audibly did bud and bud."

"Let us take this road," said Genevieve, suddenly; "we have never been over it."

"There is a romantic cave to be seen down this way," said Ambrose, with hesitation, "and a wishing-spring."

"No; I like the looks of this. There is a wood just before us and a gleam of water. I don't care for the wishing-well just now," with a dangerous glance. "I have nothing to wish for!"

Ambrose raised his dreamy black eyes to that lovely face, and a sudden passion leaped into them, but he only answered, quietly, "Nor I!"

"What book have you there?" she asked.

"Coleridge," he answered. "You always like to have a little reading."

"Yes; I feel I am improving my mind and having a good time all at once. What a pleasant scene! Strange we've never came this way before."

"It's tamer than the other roads."

"But sweet, smiling, innocent and rustic-looking. You can't fancy any tragedies in these white houses, nothing but content and—and ennui," and she laughed.

"But the human heart is the same everywhere," he answered, moodily. "Where that beats with its strange freaks of passion, its wayward will, there will be the same tragedies, the same pangs, the same tortures, the same unutterable happiness."

"What is your favorite in Coleridge?"

> "'Few sorrows hath she of her own,
> My hope, my joy, my Genevieve,'"

he recited, in a low, intense way, to which she certainly

> "Listened with a flitting blush,
> With downcast eyes and modest grace."

Suddenly he took her hand.

"I would give all I hope for in this world or—heaven forgive me!—in the next, to be able to say 'my Genevieve.'"

The sudden passion of his words really stirred her. She lifted to his eyes in which an answering love seemed to dawn. She faltered one word, "Ambrose!"

But he dropped her hand as suddenly as he had taken it.

"Forgive me!" he muttered, and did not say another word.

And Genevieve, quivering in every nerve, leaned back in silence, wondering and half-indignant that he had checked the passionate outburst she expected. The sun began to be very fervid, the silence more oppressive still.

"I see an old-fashioned well there," she said, glancing out. "What a queer old brown cottage! It looks like the one Anderson tells about in the 'Ugly Duck,' that was so old it was ready to fall, but did not know which side to fall on, and so stood up. Mr. Leith, I have a sudden longing for a draught from the 'iron-bound bucket, the moss-covered bucket.'"

The young man looked about in a bewildered way, then appeared to wake with a start. He grew pale and his hands trembled, but he gave her the reins and got out, and went through the little gate between tall ranks of hollyhocks into the garden.

Genevieve looked after him. There was an old woman washing at the back of the house, and a younger woman, with a calico sunbonnet on, picking beans. She could not hear what was said, but Ambrose soon appeared bearing a goblet of clear cold water.

While she drank, the young woman came to the fence and seemed to watch her curiously.

"I thought you'd bring a tin dipper," Genevieve said smiling; "you destroy the unities."

Ambrose bit his lip and glanced towards the young woman. Genevieve gave her a passing look, and saw that she had a pale, worn, spiritless face, straight dark hair, and strange, sad, wistful eyes.

"Poor thing! She's worked to death, evidently," she said, as they drove away; "with a husband that beats her, I dare say."

"Why this rash conclusion?" he asked, with an effort.

"Oh, she has an oppressed, unhappy look," answered Genevieve, carelessly. "I'm sure her husband is a brute. Poverty is a brutalizer!"

"Do you think so?" asked the young minister; "and yet our Saviour chose it for His portion. He was worse off than the people you are pitying, for He had not where to lay His head."

Somehow the rest of the ride was singularly silent. It was afternoon of the next day. The house was remarkably quiet, for both Mrs. Brooks and Jerusha were away at a quilting. The farmer, of course, was absent; the minister was making pastoral calls. The sheep under his charge were growing mutinous over the time spent with the city belle. Genevieve found the back porch shaded and cool. She had taken a book and was giving herself over to a good read. She wore a dress of écru grenadine, filmy and cool, save where knots of scarlet ribbon glowed. In her hair and at her breast she had clusters of jacquiminot roses. The lace falling back from her arms showed all their rounded whiteness. She was dreaming a sort of waking dream, when a shadow came between her and the light. Looking up, she did not at first recognize her visitor.

A young woman stood there, dressed in rusty black, with a large-figured printed shawl, with gay palms over it. Her hat, of coarse straw, was tied down by a faded blue ribbon. She wore white cotton gloves on her hand, and stood nervously twisting her fingers together as the looked into Genevieve's face.

"I—I saw you yesterday," she said, in a faint voice, and her face was very pale and wan.

"Oh, yes. I recollect," answered Genevieve, graciously. "Won't you sit down? You look pale and sick. Can I do anything for you?"

"No. I won't sit down!" she burst forth, passionately. "You can do everything for me if you will—if you choose. You can save my life—for if it goes on I will die; I know it. Yes, I am sick in body as you see—sick at heart, too. Mebby you never felt that. They say fine city ladies don't have hearts."

It would be impossible to depict Genevieve's astonishment. She began to look around in alarm. The woman was surely crazy.

"You are takin' him away from me. Perhaps you don't mean it. It's second nature, perhaps, for you to make eyes at the men."

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Genevieve, in an insulted tone. "What do you mean? I am taking some one away from you?"

"Yes, my husband—Ambrose Leith."

"Your husband?"—the words seemed to drop from her lips in a dazed way.

"Oh, perhaps I'm not grand enough for his wife," said the young person, coloring. "But he did love me once. He belongs to plain folks, and so do I. It's education makes the difference, and I'm sure"—with a burst of tears—"I wish he was a poor farmer's boy if he only cared for me—and—and the child that's coming—as he did once. But—excuse me, ma'am—since you've come he dreams of you. He is changed to me. I heard him say a name once in his sleep, and it was yours, of course; and people are talking. Oh, it will kill me if it goes on!"

"Talking of me!" exclaimed Genevieve, with superb disdain. "Make yourself easy, good woman. I have no wish to estrange your husband. I did not even know our young parson was married. Here he comes now. I will congratulate him."

The young woman turned white and sick, and put her arm about one of the pillars for support.

Leith came up to the piazza with great, angry strides, and stared at her with blazing eyes.

"What does this mean?" he asked, in a choked voice.

"You did not tell me you were married!" said Genevieve, softly.

"Could I think you would care?" he answered. "Go home, Letty. You have done all the mischief you could, and scenes are vulgar."

"That is what you always say," she sobbed out. "I am vulgar. All I do is vulgar; but to go flirting with other women and making love to them. Oh, that's not vulgar, I suppose!"

"Go, go?" he answered, between his set teeth. "There is no need for insults. I think Farmer Stone is waiting for you."

"Will you come?" asked the girl, with imploring eyes.

"No!"

She tottered down the steps in a weak, uncertain way, but he did not look at her. His eyes were fixed upon Genevieve's face. The blaze of passion frightened her.

"You should have gone," she said, quietly.

"Will you forgive her insults," he asked.

"Certainly; she is your wife. I shall leave here to-morrow."

He dropped on his knees at her side. "I love you—I love you," he cried; "if you care for me I can find a way out of this. Have you not seen how this passion has taken possession of me? Having known you, how can I ever think of her again? My marriage was a mistake."

"People have to suffer for mistakes," answered Genevieve, drawing herself away from him. "I must remind you now, Mr. Leith that your love is an insult to me."

"You do not care for me?"

"Only as a friend."

He had risen to his feet. His face was sahen, but his eyes gleamed like coals.

"You could not love me under any circumstances?"

"Under no circumstances."

"Then, good by; you have a sweet gracious manner, Miss Ogden. You remember Lady Clara Vere de Vere:

> "Oh, your sweet eyes, your low replies,
> A great enchantress you may be;
> But there was that across his throat,
> That you had hardly cared to see."

Genevieve had risen. "Good-by, Mr. Leith; since I must go to-morrow, I must pack. I think your wife is waiting for you at the gate." As she turned a sudden report stunned her. At the same moment the young man fell heavily on the ground, and dropped a pistol from his nerveless hand.

"I have sinned," he groaned. "God forgive me, I am not worthy to live. I am not fit to die, but I love you, Genevieve. Take my hand, hold it to the last—give me one kiss. I have been starving for one kiss—you will not mind, now that I am dying."

But it was not Genevieve who bent over him, but a pale, wild-eyed woman, who kissed him amid convulsive sobs, who forgot her own agony or the death-throes that racked her body with pain in watching that dear face grow pale and cold. Then when the death-shadows gathered on it, the young wife sank into forgetfulness.

"What a horrible tragedy!" said Genevieve Ogden to herself, as she gathered her pretty traveling-dress about her in the carriage the next day. "It is well I am going, for this has quite destroyed the good effect of the air. I will never have a rustic lover again, they are so horribly in earnest."

POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

HON. JOHN SHERMAN, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

NEW ENGLAND may well be proud of her children. From the hardy men and women who drew a scant subsistence from the sterile rocks of the Northeast have sprung a race which the world may well be challenged to equal for enterprise, courage, genius and patriotism. They are scattered in all parts of the Union, and wherever they have lived they have left their impress. Thoughtful, studious, patient and enduring, it seems that no problem has ever been submitted to them too difficult for their solving. If any part of our country is entitled to feel a sectional pride, New England certainly is.

The subject of our sketch, John Sherman, of Ohio, Secretary of the Treasury and a prominent candidate for President, was born of New England parentage. His father, Charles R. Sherman, removed from Connecticut to Ohio in 1810, where, a successful lawyer, he became one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of that State, which office he held until the time of his death in 1829. Charles Sherman, the grandfather of John Sherman, adorned the bench in Connecticut for many years. The old historical figure, Roger Sherman, came from the same English ancestry as John Sherman, and the peculiar and admirable traits of the old patriot have characterized the children of both branches of the family. The old saying that "blood will tell" never received a better exemplification than in the case of the family which produced such brothers as John Sherman, William T. Sherman, the General of the Army, and the late Charles R. Sherman, for many years Judge of the United States Court for the Northern District of Ohio.

John Sherman was born at Lancaster, Ohio, in 1823, and is, consequently, about fifty-seven years old. When he was six years old his father died, leaving his mother with but a moderate provision for eleven children. The late Thomas Ewing assumed the guardianship of William T. Sherman, and had him educated at West Point. John was put to such superior schools as were available in that section at that day, and at the age of fifteen he struck boldly out into the world to work out his own future. His life began as a subordinate on a public work of his native State, known as the Muskingum improvement, in the capacity of a junior rod-man; afterwards he was put in entire charge of the work, which presented problems of engineering skill that must have fully tested the capacity of the beardless youth. He succeeded, however, and here, doubtless, his character, formed by previous buffetings with fates more or less adverse, became dignified and solidified. Later in life he studied law, and was admitted to the Bar at the age of twenty-one. After ten years of steady, profitable practice, "riding the circuit," as well as appearing before the highest courts of the State, he was elected, at the early age of thirty-one, to Congress, and began that remarkable career which has made him for a quarter of a century one of the most conspicuous figures in our national history, and which may possibly be crowned by his election to the Presidency.

From his entry into public life John Sherman took a commanding position. He was born a Whig, and he never lost sight of the teachings of that great party. He steadily grew with events—indeed, his growth was beyond them—so that in all the startling changes which the nation has witnessed in the last two or three decades, no one of them found him undecided or unprepared. In his first term he was made the prominent figure in the committee sent to investigate the Kansas troubles. In all the discussions upon questions growing out of slavery—the efforts to extend it to the Territories, the efforts on the other hand to abolish it, the Lecompton compromise—he took an earnest part and unhesitatingly identified himself with the Free Soil and Abolition parties. At the age of thirty-five years he was the candidate of his party for Speaker of the national House of Representatives, but being too advanced for some of those whose votes were necessary to elect, he retired from the contest after seven weeks of steady balloting, and Mr. Pennington, of New Jersey, was chosen. He was recognized as a leader, however, and at the same session was made Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, where his natural taste for dealing with questions of finance and economy had full sway, and where he demonstrated even more fully than before that he was a man born for the emergency. In 1861 he was elected to the Senate, which he left only to accept the position of Secretary of the Treasury upon the inauguration of General Hayes in 1877.

In the Senate he was at once placed upon the Finance Committee, becoming subsequently the chairman. His labors here gave the country the national banking system, which has been pronounced the most perfect in the world; and eventually, after years of trial and discouragement, at the close of which he was called upon as the executive officer to carry into effect the law which as a legislator he had devised, he succeeded in securing for the nation the blessings of the resumption of specie payments, which have brought in their train the wonderful revival of business prosperity to-day felt in all channels of trade and commerce. It cannot be disputed that to Mr. Sherman, more than any other one man, is due the success of resumption.

During the war Mr. Sherman was an unswerving supporter of the cause of the Union. He not only supported the cause in his place in the Senate, but he raised a brigade of troops, volunteered and served for a time in 1861 with the veteran General Patterson, and at one time was only dissuaded from resigning his place in the Senate to go into the military service by the earnest solicitations of President Lincoln and Secretary Chase. They were wise in this, for, while he might, and probably would, have made a successful soldier, his place in the national councils would not have been easily filled. His public as well as private life has been without blemish. While his position as a bold and uncompromising party leader has brought him under the animadversions of his political opponents, the fiercest criticism, the most searching investigation, has left him with a spotless reputation. By the exercise in his private affairs of the same skill by which he contributed in so marked a degree to the success of resumption, he has acquired a modest private fortune adequate to the requirements of his tastes, which are simple; but even political malignity has failed to find a hook in all his record upon which to hang the charge of peculation or dishonesty of any sort.

It is not remarkable that the friends of such a man should be enthusiastic in his support for the Presidency. Of a pure and unassailable private character, a public record of, perhaps, unequaled usefulness, and a long training in the school of statesmanship, which would peculiarly fit him for the duties of the Chief Magistracy, it would certainly appear that the party which can present such a candidate is exceptionally fortunate.

Time's Revenges.

AMONG the strangest of time's revenges is the reappearance upon Count Mellkoff's commission of the Count Von Pahlen, a historic name in Russia. Eighty years ago the tyranny of the weak and cruel Paul had reached such a pitch that it became necessary to strangle him, and the man who undertook to see the job done was Count Peter Von Pahlen, called Peter the Ready, grandfather of the Count of to-day. Pahlen, Beningsen and two others went to the palace, now the Riding School, and represented to the heir-apparent, Alexander, that his father had to sign a liberal constitution. Under this plea they were admitted to the Emperor's apartments, Beningsen keeping guard at the door while the other three fell on the Czar, got him down, strangled him, and made sure of their work with the knife. It was a desperate vengeance, as the Czar's apartment communicated by a subterranean passage under the Neva with an island fortress, from which he could have defied all St. Petersburg, but he was caught unaware. The trifling odium of murder did not prevent either Pahlen or Beningsen from rising to high honors in the Russian service. It is said that the present Count is a chip of the old block, as ready as his illustrious grandsire, but it is certainly a curious incident to find the especial guardianship of the Czar's safety confided to the grandson of one who showed so little compunction about strangling a Czar.

Foreign Decorations for Americans.

THE Senate Committee on Foreign Relations has reported a Bill permitting a large number of office-holders to accept titles, gifts and decorations from foreign potentates. Mr. F. A. Walker, the Census Superintendent, will become a Knight Commander of the Swedish Order of Wasa, and also a Commander of the Spanish Order of Isabella; Mr. Irish, a marine, is to have the second-class Spanish Grand Cross of Naval Merit; Lieutenant B. H. Buckingham will receive the French Cross of the Legion of Honor; Lieutenant Metcalfe is to be raised to the Turkish Order of Osmanie; Admiral Almy to the Hawaiian Order of Kamehameha; Lieutenant Tahner is allowed to take a lacquered box and a pair of vases from the Japanese Government; Lieutenant F. V. Greene is to have Russian decorations of the third-class of the Order of St. Anne and of the fourth-class of the Order of St. Vladimir; Surgeon Wilson will be made a member of the Egyptian Order of Nejidieh; Commander Nicholson will receive the Spanish Grand Cross of Naval Merit, with a White badge.

These titles, gifts and decorations are conferred for various services; in one or two instances for humane and gallant conduct in rescuing the distressed; in some, apparently, for showing foreign potentates and their families polite attentions on shipboard; in one case for services as chief of awards in the Centennial show, and in another for inspecting Connecticut firearms for Turkish buyers, and seeing that no Quaker guns were slipped in among them.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The General Election in Scotland.

Our illustration represents the mobbing and pelting of the fagot voters at Peebles, Scotland, and the carrying of two absurd made-up figures, supposed to bear a droll resemblance to gentlemen connected with the less popular party. The polling at this place was for the joint counties of Peeblesshire and Selkirkshire, where some riotous behavior was displayed. The election was severely contested between Sir Graham Montgomery, the late Conservative member, and Mr. C. Tennant, the Liberal candidate. A party of seventy alleged fagot voters, who arrived by special train from Edinburgh and Glasgow, were ill treated by a large mob, although escorted by a numerous body of policemen. There had been a shower of rain previously to the arrival of the train, and the unfortunate "fagots" had a great deal of mud thrown at them. Sir Graham Montgomery and his two sons were also mobbed and bespattered with dirt, but although stones were freely thrown about, no serious injuries to persons were reported.

The Jesuits in Paris.

The adoption of Clause Seven of the Ferry Educational Bill has created much excitement throughout France. The restrictions against the Jesuits have had the effect already of driving thousands of them from the country, and it now looks as if there would be a general exodus of this class of people, either to Spain or Portugal. The Jesuits of Paris have many valuable institutions and hitherto have been exceedingly powerful. Their colleges have attained considerable renown, and their influence has occasioned alarm in many official quarters. Our views of the residence of the Provincial and the College of the Immaculate Conception are from recent photographs.

Professor Nordenskjold in Paris.

In every city where Professor Nordenskjöld stopped on his homeward voyage after the memorable navigation of the Northwest Passage, extraordinary honors were paid to him and his intrepid associates. In Paris, particularly, the heroes of the Vega created a decided sensation. The Municipal Council gave the explorer a grand reception, during which the President presented him with a diploma and a commemorative medal, and learned societies strove to outdo each other in the brilliancy and heartiness of their congratulations. Unusual honors now await the traveler at the hands of his sovereign.

The Conversation Haus, Baden-Baden.

The Conversation Haus is the general rendezvous of all visitors at Baden-Baden. In olden days it contained the gambling saloons; now, however, the building is devoted to various reading and smoking-rooms, and a very handsome concert hall. Outside there is a long terrace, beneath which is the fashionable promenade. The company is thoroughly international, and the exquisitely played waltzes of Strauss—played as only South Germans or Austrians know how to play them—are sometimes almost overwhelmed by the Babel of tongues that arises around the orchestra. Three times a day does this promenade teem with its motley throng—at 7:30 A.M., when "invalid" Baden turns out to take the waters at the Trinkhalle; again about four in the afternoon, when "fashionable" Baden takes its seat on the comfortable chairs, and gossips uncomfortable things about its dearest friends and neighbors; and, finally, in the evening after dinner. This is its prettiest time, especially on a moonlight night, when the dark masses of the surrounding pine-clad hills are bathed in a flow of silver light, and the walls of the Alte Schloss may be dimly distinguished peeping out from their mantle of fire.

A Pagoda Festival in Burmah.

Kke-ka-taza Pagoda is situated about five miles from Rangoon, and in the midst of a paddy-cultivated district. After the harvest is gathered in, the rural population of Kke-ka-taza hold their annual religious festival—a species of harvest thanksgiving—which consists in various religious ceremonies, and in the offering of numerous gifts, such as cakes, sweets, scents, oranges, rice, plants, flowers, etc. Owing to the close proximity of the Pagoda to Rangoon, the festival is also largely patronized by the city folk, though in this case more for amusement than for any religious purpose, as the chief incident of the festival is a Puppet Poozy, or play, performed at night. The whole scene resembles a vast picnic, and thousands of people, with carts laden with refreshments, begin to arrive on the spot early in the evening, and to encamp round the puppet stage, which is erected at some 300 yards' distance from the pagoda. The carts and oxen are so placed as to form a large ring, and the inclosed space is left for the accommodation of the spectators who have come to see the Poozy. As soon as each party have settled themselves, the evening meal is prepared and cooked on the spot, and at seven the puppet performance begins, lasting until five in the morning.

It is believed that Mr. Bradlaugh's seat will be declared vacant.

MY LADY'S CHARM.

LET Petrarch sing his lady's clinging hand;
And Dante tell of calm, angelic eyes,
Holding the faultless color of clear skies;
Let Shakespeare chant, in numbers sweet and grand,
Of hair that shone like sunlight in the land;
And Spenser, of a voice whose low replies
Made souls all armed to dare some great emprise,
Its melody to hold in sweet command.
Yet even these, though mighty singers all,
Are not the lords to say whose grace is best.
Nor with their judgment my love's charms eclipse.
Ah, but her mouth so dainty is and small,
That I, secure in this one thing, can rest,
No kiss can match the one given by her lips.

CHAPTER XV.—REGINALD DISCOVERS THE NAME OF THE PUEBLO.

WHEN the sun had ceased to be an object of admiration to Don Manuel and his guest, the two returned to the house from the plaza, whither they had gone to witness the spectacle of the orb of day rising slowly into view above the mountain-tops.

Pepita had breakfast awaiting them, and they at once sat down to enjoy the meal. When breakfast was over, Don Manuel excused himself to Reginald, telling him that he had business which required his presence a mile or two out of town, mounted his horse and rode away.

After his departure, Reginald lit a cigar and sauntered into the library. The room was a small one, with two windows framed in roses looking out on the front veranda and on the street. The furniture of the apartment was old-fashioned, and was covered with a material resembling nankeen, while on the walls hung two or three ancient portraits of Don Tomas's ancestors, and as many pictures of saints. On the library-shelves, which occupied one side of the room, were ranged four or five hundred volumes, whose venerable appearance, many of them being bound in vellum, testified to their antiquity.

While he was engaged in reading the titles of the books, the door opened and Pepita entered.

"Have you come to read to me, señorita?" he asked.

"Yes, señor. When you are ready to listen, I am ready to begin."

"I am ready now," he replied. "What book shall I get you?"

She pointed to a bulky, vellum-bound volume on the second shelf.

"That is Fray Gregorio's manuscript 'Chronicle of New Mexico,'" she said. "We shall read from that, if you have no objection. It contains all that is most interesting in the history of our ancient province."

Reginald reached for the volume, a manuscript work of some two hundred pages, brushed the dust from it, and presented it to Pepita. Then he drew up a chair for her, near one of the windows, and seated himself, half-reclining, on a lounge opposite, which stood beside the other window.

Pepita spread a handkerchief on her lap, opened the book, and placed it on the handkerchief.

"And now, señor," she said, "where shall I begin?"

"Oh, at the beginning," replied Reginald, with a laugh

"At the beginning of the 'Relation of the Reverend Father Friar de Nizza, Touching his Discovery of the Kingdom of Cibola'? Shall I commence there?"

"If you please, señorita."

She turned the leaves for a few moments, and then, having found the page she was searching for, read how, as is shown in the relation of Father Marco de Nizza, that missionary in the year 1539, under instructions from the Emperor's Viceroy and Captain-General in Mexico, Don Antonio de Mendoza, journeyed into those unknown countries lying to the west and east of the headwaters of the Rio Grande, in the region now known as Arizona and New Mexico; how, returning to the viceroy, after many months of absence, he reported what had befallen him in his journey and of the discoveries he had made; how, then, Mendoza dispatched an expedition under Francisco Vasquez de Coronado to search for the Seven Cities of Cibola, the chief of which is now called the Pueblo of Zuñi, in Arizona, whereof Father Marco had spoken; and how Coronado departed from Culiacan, of which province he was governor, and discovered the Kingdom of Cibola.

Having read of these things, and of how other Spaniards, priests and soldiers followed in the footsteps of the earlier discoverers at various periods, Pepita continued:

"'It was given to the holy order of the Franciscans in later years to plant the Cross among these people and to bring them within the fold of Mother Church. All went well with them until that most calamitous year, 1680, when the Pueblo Indians became apostate to the faith, rose in insurrection against their spiritual guides and the other Spaniards in the province, and massacred all who fell within their power. In this revolt also joined the pueblo of Pecos, not many miles distant from where Santa Fé now stands, and one of the chief Indian towns of the province. It was in that most horrid martyrdom that the faithful and devout Fra Pablo, of the Order of St. Francis, was slain, while endeavoring to escape from the Pecos church, as is recorded in the archives of the Franciscan Monastery of Durango on the authority of a certain Chevalier St. Evremond Deville, a French adventurer of that period, who fled from the church with Fra Pablo, and who escaped the fate that afterwards befell his companion.'"

For the first time since she had begun her reading from Fray Gregorio's manuscript, Pepita paused and looked up. The noise of something fallen to the floor attracted her attention to Reginald, and she saw that the cigar which he had been been smoking had dropped from his hand and was lying at his feet.

The expression of his countenance puzzled her.

"Señor Grey," she said, rising and closing the volume. "You are not well. Your face——"

"It is nothing, señorita," he replied, controlling himself with a strong effort. "It is the heat, I think. Thanks for your kindness and sympathy. I will not trouble you to read any more to-day."

"But still, if you are ill——"

He left his seat with a smile.

"It was only for a moment," he said, as he bent and kissed her hand. "I have been very much interested in what you have read to me and I thank you. Now, with your kind permission, I will walk out in the air a while."

"Then you are only faint—that is all?"

"Yes. A breath of fresh air will be my best medicine."

"In that case let me not detain you."

He bowed to his charming hostess and left the library, on his way to the plaza, where, seating himself in the shade of the trees, he reflected on the strange chance that had revealed to him the missing clew to the last mystery involved in the old manuscript.

CHAPTER XVI.—THE TREASURE OF ST. EVREMOND DEVILLE.

THE pueblo was discovered at last; it was the pueblo of Pecos, and the long journey to Durango was now unnecessary. But one doubt remained in Reginald's mind, and that was whether the church were still standing, or had undergone any repairs which might have resulted in the discovery of the box. That doubt, however, could easily be solved by questioning Don Manuel on the subject of the church, for certainly if so great a treasure ever had been found in its walls, the intelligence of so unusual an event would have reached Santa Fé.

On the other hand, it was possible that the people of Pecos, at some time in the past, by an accident, may have found the box, and, not knowing the value of what it contained, may have scattered and dispersed its contents. In that case, probably, no knowledge of its discovery had ever reached the settlements of the Rio Grande.

As Reginald reflected on the subject, he was disposed rather to accept the view that the box was still reposing in the wall where St. Evremond Deville and Fra Pablo had placed it.

"I understand now," he said to himself, "how Melchior could so easily fill up the blanks left in the manuscript by the ravages of the moths. This tradition of the death of Fra Pablo and the escape of Deville is probably an old one in New Mexico and Melchior has undoubtedly heard the story related in his youth so often that he had no difficulty in recognizing the writer of the manuscript as the St. Evremond Deville of the tradition. But why he should have made a mystery of this to me I cannot understand. There was nothing about it to be concealed, and certainly his noble and honest conduct in giving me the clew, which, by keeping to himself, he could have used to his own advantage, could not have been made more meritorious by imparting to me the source of his knowledge of the subject."

In his thoughts he already saw himself the possessor of the immense riches that the old church held in its moldering walls, and he resolved in his mind that Pepita should not be forgotten in the distribution of his gifts. Then, too, as his thoughts reverted to the lonely man who had died in the gloomy dungeon of San Juan de Ulua, far away from kindred, friends and country, he felt an imperative duty on him, if he should recover the treasure, to endeavor to obtain some clew to the descendants of St. Evremond's brother, if any were living, and to give them at least a part of their kinsman's legacy. The wealth that he would derive from it would be great enough to enable him to be both generous and just and yet to remain a rich man.

He lingered in the plaza until he saw Don Manuel riding up on his return from his visit to the country, and joining him, together they went to the house.

When his host had alighted and delivered his horse to a servant and was seated with Reginald in the little parlor, the latter, broaching the subject of Fray Gregorio's chronicle, brought the conversation round to the pueblo of Pecos.

"Are you familiar, Don Manuel," he said, "with the history of Pecos?"

"Perfectly," was the reply.

"Have you ever visited the place?"

"Yes."

"And the old Pecos church, is that still standing?"

"It is, but in a dilapidated condition. Its adobe walls, nearly seven feet in thickness, still survive the shocks of more than two hundred years."

"It was built, then, before the rising of 1680?" asked Reginald, who became more interested in proportion as Don Manuel's words confirmed the truth of the declarations of St. Evremond Deville.

"So says tradition. You passed it in the stage on your way to this place."

"Indeed, Don Manuel!" exclaimed Reginald, in a tone of genuine surprise. "I have no recollection of having seen it."

"Did you not notice, after the departure of the stage from the village of San José on the Pecos River, certain ruins on the roadside—among them the remains of a large adobe structure with walls of immense thickness?"

Reginald reflected for a moment.

"Now that you recall these ruins to my mind," he said, "I remember them. In 1680, as Señorita Pepita read to me to-day in Fray Gregorio's chronicle, occurred the rising of the pueblo Indians against the Spaniards. A missionary priest, Fra Pablo by name, was killed by the inhabitants of Pecos."

"Yes; such an event really occurred in the massacre of 1680, and this ancient church, built by the Franciscans, to which Order Fra Pablo belonged, is still there to attest to the presence and the martyrdom of the ministers of Mother Church in those remote days of the history of our country. You must know that Santa Fé was not founded until two years after the revolt and massacre of 1680. When the Spaniards, under Don Antonio de Otermin, who was the Governor of New Mexico at the time, were driven out by the Indians, they retired to the southward to the site of the present town El Paso, on the Rio Grande, where they were saved from destruction by some friendly Indians whom they met there. After laying the foundation of El Paso, Don Antonio marched again to the north, and in 1682 founded Santa Fé. A hard struggle ensued with the natives, whose final subjugation was not accomplished until 1690."

"Then the Pecos church referred to in the chronicle is Fra Pablo's church—the same church? Are you sure, Don Manuel?"

"I am very sure."

"And there has been no change in it—it has never been added to or altered?"

"We have no record of any change in its architecture. It is to-day, with the exception of the ravages of time, as it was in the beginning, and it certainly is more than two hundred years old. Thus, it is one of the most interesting memorials of the early Europeans on this continent. The old Pecos village, which is now in ruins, having been deserted by its inhabitants in 1840, was founded by Montezuma. It contains the ruins of a temple erected by him, and in its subterranean chambers he built a fire, which, on leaving the pueblo on his way to Mexico, he told the people to keep alive until he should return."

"A beautiful tradition, Don Manuel."

"Beautiful indeed, señor. The unfortunate monarch never came back, but the faithful Indians maintained the sacred flame for three hundred years, still expecting the coming of their emperor, until their numbers had become so decreased that they abandoned their village and sought refuge in the neighboring Indian pueblo of San Domingo, where each morning, at sunrise, a sentinel still ascends to his housetop and looks towards the east, watching for the return of Montezuma. Montezuma, it is said, found the tribe without shelter and with no other homes than certain caves on the Rio Grande, which still remain. Among other things, he planted a tall tree in an inverted position in the pueblo, telling the people that when he should disappear from among them a strange and foreign race should invade them and overcome them, and there would be no rain, but that they should guard the sacred fire until that tree should fall, at which time white men journeying from the east would come and drive out their oppressors. He also promised that when that should happen he would return and restore his kingdom—rain should fall and silver and gold be found in the mountains. Curiously enough, as the Indians relate, the tree planted by Montezuma fell as the American army marched into Santa Fé."

While Don Manuel was speaking, Reginald was rapidly making up his mind as to what his immediate course of action in regard to his search for the treasure should be. Should he start at once for Albuquerque to see if Manuela had returned to her home, or should he undertake the brief journey to the church and solve the doubt that agitated his mind?

Now that he had his hand, as it were, upon the box, he began to experience a restlessness lest its existence in the wall of the church should come to the knowledge of some one who would be in advance of him in recovering it. He even saw in imagination the form of Vellani, as he had once before seen it in a day-dream, digging into the adobe with frenzied eagerness in his search for the treasure. It needed but this to induce him to come to a decision, and before his companion had finished his remarks he had determined to proceed immediately to the church.

"What you have just told me, Don Manuel," he said, as his host ceased speaking, "has aroused my curiosity. The Pecos church is but a few hours' journey from Santa Fé, and as I should like to visit it before leaving for Albuquerque, I think I shall go there to-morrow."

"The visit will repay you, I am sure, Don Reinaldo," replied his host, "and I would offer to accompany you had I not already made a pressing engagement for to-morrow."

"Thanks, señor," returned Reginald, thinking more of St. Evremond Deville's treasure than of the exact import of Don Manuel's words.

In order that he might be free to return at any time from his visit to the church, without depending on the movements of the stage between San José and Santa Fé, he resolved to engage a horse on which to ride to the latter place. He mentioned his desire to Don Manuel who at once offered him the use of his own horse. For a long time the two continued to converse on the subject of the Pecos church and the pueblo. But as Reginald did not wish that Don Manuel should have any reason for supposing that his interest in the church was due to anything more than a natural curiosity in regard to a structure so venerable in years and so invested with a romantic history, he limited his inquiries to such guarded questions as might satisfy his mind on the point of the discovery or non-discovery of the concealed treasure. From what his host told him, he inferred that no hand had ever disturbed the legacy left to the safekeeping of the adobe by Fra Pablo and St. Evremond Deville.

With this knowledge to inspire and encourage him, early next morning he bade his host and Pepita farewell, promising to return in a day or two, and to remain another day with them before proceeding on his journey to Albuquerque.

Before entering the stage he provided himself with a pick and a large, strong knife, which implements, he thought, would be needed in operating on the wall. He had with him, moreover, his pistols and his valise, and was provided with sufficient luncheon for two days; but his rifle he left behind in charge of Don Manuel. Thus prepared for his important mission, he took his seat in the vehicle, after attaching his horse by a strong rope to the rear of the stage, and, with his heart beating high with hope, swept through the narrow street that led out into the San José road.

He was too much absorbed in his thoughts to give much heed to his three or four fellow-passengers, and when, to while away the tedium of the journey, they endeavored to engage him in conversation, he contented himself with polite but brief replies to their questions, and was soon left alone to his musings.

When the stage left the mountainous country to the eastward of Santa Fé and entered the pleasant valley of the Pecos River, he aroused himself and, looking out, caught the first glimpse of the church.

"Driver," he said, as he pointed to the ruin, "is that the Pecos church?"

The man replied in the affirmative.

"Then I will descend here. You need not wait for me."

The stage stopped. He alighted and untied the horse, and, as the vehicle moved off briskly, he sauntered slowly towards the ruin, leading the horse by the bridle.

While walking, his mind insensibly reverted to the day when, in a somewhat similar manner, he had approached the Palazzo Albergati to await the coming of Vellani. The trains of ideas that connected the two localities in his mind, and which associated Vellani with his present mission, were so identical, that almost involuntarily he looked up the road expecting to discern the figure of the Italian approaching him.

In a few minutes he stood before the doorless portal. Except in places here and there, the walls, as he could see in the rapid glances he cast around the interior, had not fallen in at the rear of the church to such an extent as to suggest the belief that the box had been disturbed.

Tying his horse to a small cedar-tree, he looked around him. As at the Palazzo Albergati, the distant mountains, clothed in their garb of pine and cedar-trees, or with frosty summits, stretched away dimly to the right and the left of him. The sun, already sloping in the western sky, and approaching the line of the lofty heights towards Santa Fé, threw its golden rays on the landscape and bathed the church in a flood of yellow light. Swallows twitted merrily as they darted swiftly by him from their nests in the crevices of the walls, and, like passing shoots of flame, red-plumaged humming-birds flashed in the sunlight, speeding from flower to flower, or hung poised in the air.

He entered the church, and, stepping across the obstacles that impeded his path, he walked towards the opposite end of the structure. The unexpected visitation of his presence frightened from their repose certain yellow-spotted lizards that were lying asleep upon fragments of the fallen wall, and aroused from slumber an owl which, leaving its nook above a moldering window, flapped about the inclosure wildly for a minute or two until it found another resting place.

Making his way to the rear wall, he proceeded at once to examine it. The wall was intact, but the ravages of years had seamed it with great gaps and scars which destroyed its symmetry. Rain and dust and the natural disintegration of the adobe had so discolored and eaten into the surface, that only a bleak, uneven blank, relieved by an occasional patch of whitewash, was left where once, possibly, had been gildings and ornamentation.

A subdued light, more mystical than that of burning wax-tapers, filled the ruin with half-shadows. He held his face close to the wall and scrutinized it closely, walking slowly along its length as he did so. As he thus peered, he passed his hand over the adobe. In this way he went back and forth for a distance of some twenty feet, two or three times. Finally, he paused, and a look of disappointment spread over his countenance.

"Where can it be?" he said, thoughtfully. "The inscription which served as a guide to the box has disappeared."

He sat down on a small mound of earth and gazed contemplatively at the wall, seeking from that little distance to discern any fragmentary outlining of the inscription, "Justo infra muros," that might still remain, and which might be more apparent to his eye from where he sat than from a point nearer to it. For several minutes he thus endeavored to trace the vanished legend, but in vain. The holes and broken places in the wall baffled his search.

"I must dig for the box," he said, finally, as he rose and began to unwrap the covering of his pick. "Let's see; here's a good place at which to begin operations—'a man's height from the ground,' as the old manuscript says."

As he spoke, he lifted the pick above his head, poised it for a moment, and fixed his eye on the wall, selecting a spot at which to strike. But the intended blow was not given, and for several seconds he gazed intently at the wall, still holding the pick with both hands above his head. His look had fallen on a minute object that was different from anything that he had yet seen in the wall, something of a dull, bluish color, resembling metal, which faintly appeared, imbedded in the adobe, in the hollow of a large space from which the clay had fallen.

He lowered the pick and bent forward the better to examine it. Then he put forth his finger and touched it, tapping it lightly with his nail. When he had done this, with an eager haste he drew his knife from its belt and passed the point across its surface. The knife-point left a bright, silvery line in its passage.

"The box!" he exclaimed, as he struck the knife into the surrounding adobe.

Gradually, as he excavated, the outlines of the object became more apparent. First, a corner, and then an entire side of it, was exposed; and at last it stood revealed, lying free of its adobe sepulchre, a leaden box about eight inches square, with the edges securely soldered.

As Reginald appreciated the fact that the treasure of St. Evremond Deville lay before him, only awaiting the grasp of his hand to become his own, a countless throng of fancies passed with the rapidity of thought through his mind. The old church was again peopled with worshipers. He saw, in imagination, the forms of Fra Pablo and St. Evremond Deville, and the crowd of wondering natives, looking on with half-pious and half-reluctant eyes. He heard, as in a dream, the chanting and the hymns, and the sweet smell of frankincense came to his nostrils from unseen, swaying censers. In a vision, he crossed the bridge between the present and two hundred years ago.

It was with a feeling akin to reverence that he held the box with both hands and slowly drew it from its resting-place. In doing so, however, he miscalculated its weight, for when it had reached the edge of the hole it slipped from his grasp and fell to the ground with a dull sound. Then he remembered the gold-dust that it contained, and he understood the cause of its heaviness.

He bent down and lifted it. No slight exertion of strength was necessary to do this, for the gold in it weighed nearly a hundred pounds.

He had determined to defer the examination of its contents until he should see Manuela and Melchior, for he wished them to be present at its opening.

Wrapping the pick in its covering, he restored the knife to its sheath, and, placing the box in the valise, walked with his burden towards the entrance.

As he advanced slowly, picking his way amid the débris, and with his eyes fixed on the ground at his feet, a shadow suddenly fell across his path.

He looked up quickly, thinking that his horse had broken his bridle and had wandered to the entrance of the church and was thus intercepting the sunlight. But the spectacle that met his gaze caused him to pause in astonishment. It was not the horse that stood in the doorway, but as he looked he saw that the day-dream, which twice had come before his mind, was realized.

The object standing there, blocking his passage, was a man whose face wore a dangerous scowl, not unmingled with an astonishment as genuine as his own.

This man was Vellani.

THE NASHVILLE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

THE incidents attending the celebration of the centennial of Nashville, Tenn., have possessed throughout more than ordinary interest. The procession on April 24th is described by all observers as the most imposing street pageant ever witnessed in the State. The display of bunting was profuse and the decoration of stores and residences was general. The principal thoroughfares were spanned by arches of evergreens, flowers and flags, and emblems illustrating the industrial and intellectual progress of the past hundred years were everywhere manifest. The old landmarks about the city and historic spots made memorable by encounters with the Indians in the days of early settlement were indicated by placards. The decorations on the Public Square were especially fine.

The procession was one hour in passing a given point. The military display was a brilliant one, the turnout of colored orders of various societies making a pleasing variety. The industrial arts were emblematically illustrated everywhere in the procession. A company of soldiers in old Continental uniform and veterans of the Florida and Mexican wars, with battle-torn flags, were greeted with cheers all along the line of march. The procession, which included the Fire Department and local societies, and 204 wagons representing the industries of the city, halted in Capitol Square at noon, where an address was delivered by Governor Marks, followed by an oration from Mr. John M. Bright, on "The Pioneers of Tennessee." The prize centennial ode was read, and also a sketch of the history of Nashville. A speech was also made by Rev. Nelson Merry, colored.

While the procession was passing the residence of Mrs. Polk, the widow of President Polk, who was standing at the gate, two hundred pupils of the High School, under Professor A. D. Wharton, stationed in her yard, sang a Centennial Hymn, written for the occasion by Mrs. Anson Nelson, and the music of which was composed by Professor J. E. Bailey. The division of veterans then marched into the yard of the mansion with uncovered heads and formed a circle around the tomb of the deceased President. After a brief halt here, the veterans marched into the mansion, where General W. B. Bate, on the part of the company, made a brief address to Mrs. Polk, expressive of the esteem in which she, as well as the memory of her husband, is held by the people of Tennessee. This was one of the most gratifying of the many pleasant incidents of the day. It is estimated that the procession was interviewed by 60,000 people, 20,000 of whom were visitors.

On the evening of the 24th, the Centennial Industrial Exposition was formally opened in the building erected for the purpose. From an early hour the building was thronged with visitors, who manifested the greatest delight in the brilliant effects presented. Rows of lighted gas-jets on the balconies exhibited the symmetrical and graceful outlines of the roof and dome, while from the inside of the dome was suspended a powerful electric jet which shed a light over the entire building as bright as sunshine, yet as soft as the rays of the moon.

The opening exercises consisted of addresses by Mayor Kercheval, W. G. Brien, of the Independent Order of Foresters; Governor Williams, of Indiana; Captain William Stockell, President of the Centennial Exposition Managers, and Dr. T. A. Atchison, President of the Board of Centennial Directors, all of which appropriately referred to the prosperous growth and development of Nashville, and the bright prospects of the beautiful and enterprising city.

The exhibition of articles in some departments of the Exposition was, at the opening, somewhat incomplete, but the display was quite sufficient to justify the belief that the Exposition would far eclipse any ever held in Nashville, and this belief has been fully justified by the additions subsequently made.

THE GLADSTONE MINISTRY.

The new War Secretary, Hugh Culling Eardley Childers, has been for twenty years prominent in the House of Commons as member for Pontefract. Born in London, June 25th, 1827, he graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1850, and sailed the same year for Australia. He settled in the new colony of Victoria, took an active part in politics, was speedily elected to the Colonial Parliament for the town of Portland, and filled the post of Commissioner of Trade and Customs in the first Government of that colony. Returning to England as Agent-General for Victoria in 1857, he was elected to Parliament in 1860, made his mark at once in the House, and was influential in putting an end to the system of penal transportation to Australia. He acted as Lord of the Admiralty in 1864-66, was Financial Secretary to the Treasury in 1865-66, and was a Royal Commissioner on the law courts in 1867. In the Gladstone Cabinet of 1868, Mr. Childers held the post of First Lord of the Admiralty until March, 1871, and effected important changes in the administration of naval affairs. In 1872 he again became Agent-General of Victoria and also Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. His re-election to Parliament on that occasion was memorable as the first instance in England of a political election by ballot. Mr. Childers is author of pamphlets on free trade, railway policy and national education, is Chairman of the Indian Peninsula Railway Company, and a director of many banking, steamship and railway enterprises. He visited the United States and Canada in 1873.

Lord Selborne (Sir Roundell Palmer), the new Lord High Chancellor, was born in 1812, and educated at Oxford, where he carried off several prizes, a fellowship, a law scholarship and a Chancellor's prize. He was called to the Bar in 1837, and was made Queen's Counsel in 1849. He entered Parliament in 1847, was defeated in 1852, and re-elected several times. In 1861 he entered office as Attorney-General, and went out with the Russell Ministry in 1866. Mr. Gladstone offered him the Chancellorship in 1868, but he declined it on the ground that he could not support the Premier on the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. His disinterestedness in resigning a great prize which might never again come within his grasp gave him the reputation of a statesman of high principle, for few men in English public life would have declined the office under the same circumstances. In 1872 he was counsel for the British Government at the Geneva Court of Arbitration, and was subsequently raised to the peerage under his present title. The physical infirmities of Lord Hatherley created a vacancy in the Chancellorship, and Lord Selborne was offered the Great Seal under conditions which precluded a second declination. He remained in office until the downfall of Mr. Gladstone's Ministry. He is a man of unblemished character, a devoted churchman, and a compiler of a Book of Praise from the best English hymn-writers.

Few British statesmen are more heartily appreciated in the United States than the Rt. Hon. W. E. Forster, the new Chief Secretary for Ireland, and well-known as the most outspoken friend of the Union cause in Parliament during the war of the rebellion. His father, a member of the Society of Friends, died in Tennessee many years ago, while on an anti-slavery mission to this country, and his mother was a sister of the eminent philanthropist, Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton. Born at Bradpole, Dorsetshire, July 11th, 1818, Mr. Forster was educated at the Friends' School, Tottenham; became a worsted manufacturer at Bradford, distributed in Ireland in 1846-47 the famine relief fund raised by the English Quakers, and married in 1850 the eldest daughter of Dr. Arnold, of Rugby. He first entered Parliament in 1861, and at once took a prominent position. He was Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1865-66, entered the Privy Council as Vice-President of the Committee on Education in 1868, was admitted as a member of the Cabinet in 1870, passed the Education Bill through Parliament in that year, and was the principal sponsor of the Ballot Act, passed in 1872. He was spoken of for the Liberal leadership on Mr. Gladstone's retirement in 1875, but declined that post in advance. He was chosen Lord Rector of the University of Aberdeen in 1875, and received the doctorate of laws from that institution in 1876. He was received with honor in the United States on his visit here in 1874.

Right Hon. John Wodehouse, first Earl Kimberley, Secretary for the Colonies, has had an experience of many years in diplomatic affairs. Born January 7th, 1826, he studied at Eton and graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, with classical honors, in 1847. He succeeded to the barony of Wodehouse in 1846, became Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in 1852, was appointed Ambassador to Russia in 1856, was again Under Secretary 1859-61, was Commissioner of Schleswig-Holstein in 1863, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland 1864-66, being raised to the Earldom of Kimberley June 1st, 1866. He was Lord Privy Seal under Mr. Gladstone 1868-70, and Secretary of State for the Colonies 1870-74. He has had recent experience in diplomacy relative to the Eastern question, and is thoroughly familiar with Colonial affairs.

John Bright, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, is better known in America than almost any other Englishman as the typical friend of our country and our institutions. It is, therefore, only necessary to state that he was born at Rochdale, November 16th, 1811, took part in the reform agitation of 1831-32, was the principal associate of Cobden in the long agitation for the repeal of the Corn laws, entered Parliament in 1843, and was the principal author of the electoral reforms in England. He was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the former administration of Mr. Gladstone, a post chiefly valuable as conferring a seat in the Cabinet.

Mr. Stansfeld, M. P. for Halifax, President of the Local Government Board, was born in 1820, graduated at University College, London, was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1849, entered Parliament in 1859, and was a Lord of the Admiralty from 1863 until April, 1864, when he resigned on account of difficulties arising from his intimacy with Mazzini. He was Under Secretary of State in 1866, Third Lord of the Treasury 1868-69, Joint Secretary to the Treasury 1869-71, President of the Poor Law Board 1871, and President of the new Local Government Board 1871-74. He now returns to that post, for which he has eminent qualifications.

The Right Hon. Earl Spencer, K. G., the Lord President of the Council, was born October 27th, 1835, and married, in 1858, Charlotte Frances Frederica, third daughter of Frederick Seymour, fifth son of Lord Hugh Seymour. In 1868 he was appointed by the Liberal Cabinet Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

A Religious Power in Scotland.

THE Episcopal Church of Scotland is now a power in that land, and numbers among its adherents the bulk of the Scottish aristocracy, but up to forty years ago it was a much-enduring body. Being devoted to the Stuarts, an Act was passed in 1719 by which every clergyman who had not taken the oath to King George, and who did not pray for him by name, should suffer six months' imprisonment for performing divine service in any meeting house: the presence of nine persons, beyond the resident household, constituted a meeting-house. In 1748 it was enacted that no ordinations should be valid unless granted in England or Ireland. Even as late as 1822, when George IV. visited Scotland, it is related in the highly interesting memoir, lately published, of Bishop Jolly, that the visit threw the whole House of Bishops into a state of much anxiety, between their own loyalty, their knowledge of lingering Jacobitism, doubts whether they would be received if they came forward, and the certainty that they ought not to hang back. The primate wrote at this time: "There is another thing about which Bishop Sandford (of Edinburgh) is distressing himself exceedingly. It is Bishop Jolly's wig. He alleges that the King will not be able to stand the sight of it, and assures Lord Russell it would convulse the whole court." The wig is described as snow-white, and standing out behind his head in enormous curls of six or eight inches in depth. The episcopal agitation was allayed, however, by the discovery that a nobleman had given the bishop a splendid modern wig, which he donned on that occasion. Bishop Hobart, for many years bishop of New York, once said, "If I had gone from America to Aberdeen, and seen nothing but Bishop Jolly, as I saw him for two days, I should hold myself greatly rewarded."

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

It is Stated that a new Belgian expedition is to leave this month for the purpose of establishing commercial stations along the Congo.

The French Committee of the International African Association have dispatched M. Binyet to Zanzibar to undertake the formation of their station in Usagara.

Professor Boyd Dawkins, F. R. S., of Owens College, Manchester, Eng., has accepted an invitation to give a course of lectures at the Lowell Institute, Boston, Mass., in October and November of this year.

The Italian Minister of Agriculture and Commerce has decided to present to Parliament a project for executing a great geological map of the kingdom. The expense is calculated at 6,000,000 francs.

The Caravan which went on a preliminary survey for the proposed Sahara Railway has returned to Algeria. They thoroughly explored the country between Quendrim and Elegolah, to the south of which they perceived passes through the great sand-banks barring the Insalah route. They were unmolested.

The Huston Self-leveling Berth, by which sea-sickness is averted, is proving a practical success, and has been introduced on several of the most important lines plying from this port. A perfectly level berth, no matter at what angle the ship may pitch or roll, is always obtained by the application of the universal joint and of spiral springs. An illustration of this berth will probably appear in this paper later in the season.

At the Recent Meeting of the Institution of Naval Architects, England, Admiral Selwyn recommended every one to study Professor Rankine's admirable paper on "Combustion," when they would know the exact amount of oxygen necessary to burn the different varieties of coal with the greatest advantage. The student would learn, he said, that the British were far behind in what has been done in America with anthracite.

Baumgartner, the inventor of a navigable balloon, having three cars attached, each with ten or twelve wings, set in motion by a crank, has attempted an ascent at Leipsic. On the rope being cut the balloon rose very slowly, skimming the house-tops, whereupon the two assistants jumped out of the centre car in alarm. The balloon shot up to a great height, then burst and fell. Baumgartner was not seriously hurt, and is resolved on a second experiment.

M. Slatin, an Austrian traveler, is about to visit Dara, in Darfur, and proposes to explore the country to the south of Hoirat-el-Nahas and Kalaka. MM. de Müller-Captiany and De Lacken have recently left Cairo for Massowah, whence they intend to visit the region bordering on Northern Abyssinia. After spending a year there they will direct their course to Fazokl, by way of Valkait and Gallabat, and they will then endeavor to penetrate southwards into the Galla country.

MM. Popelin and Carter, with the second Belgian Expedition, have arrived at Karema, M. Cambier's station on Lake Tanganyika, but it is said that only one elephant has survived the journey. Under the auspices of the King of the Belgians an establishment is to be formed in Eastern Africa for the capture and training of elephants. A further Belgian expedition is to be dispatched to Karema under Captain Hennekens and his brother, who will take with them three artisans and also a small steamer for use on Lake Tanganyika.

Count d'Ursel, in a recently published work on South America, asserts that in Bolivia, Peru, Chili, La Plata and Brazil, he has met with an insect which after its death is transformed into a plant. He describes and figures this creature as a thick, hard grub, with distinct articulations. When about to die it buries itself some centimetres deep in the earth, and there gradually increases in circumference till it presents an appearance very like that of a potato. A stem is then put forth, which in the Spring months bears a crop of blue flowers.

The University of Buda-Pesth, which was founded in 1635, intends to celebrate, on May 13th, the hundredth year since its revival and development by Maria Theresa. There will be a thanksgiving service in the morning and a grand academical and civic procession through the streets. An oration will be delivered and an ode recited, and there will be a banquet, to be followed by a grand ball. In honor of the occasion medals will be struck, honorary degrees will be conferred on distinguished men, and a work by the Hungarian Minister of Justice, Pauler, describing the work of the University during the last one hundred years, will be published.

Colonel Gordon-Pasha has recently informed the Church Missionary Society that the Egyptian military station on the Uganda frontier had been moved back, and that consequently the country between Egypt and Mtesa's kingdom is in an unsettled and insecure state, being overrun by Kaba Rega's men. The road to the Victoria Nyanza by way of the Nile is therefore not now practicable. The two members of the Nyanza Expedition, the Rev. C. T. Wilson and Mr. Felkin, with three Waganda chiefs, are expected to arrive in England during the present month, as they had reached Suakim on March 16th. Mr. Wilson will thus be the first Englishman, since Speke and Grant, who has traversed Africa from Zanzibar to Uganda, and thence down the Nile.

Dr. W. B. Carpenter, F.R.S., in a lecture delivered at the Royal Institution, January 23d, maintained, in accordance with Professor Geikie, that the present Continental ridges have probably always existed in some form, and that the present deep ocean-basins likewise date from the remotest geological antiquity. He considers it, however, possible that at some period a band of connection may have existed between Europe and America, and that New Zealand, Tasmania and South America may have been linked together by ridges of dry land, whilst Madagascar may have been joined in a similar manner to the African continent, and even with Asia. He does not consider that there is satisfactory evidence for the supposed continent Atlantis being between Africa and America.

PROFESSOR C. H. HITCHCOCK, of Dartmouth College, has been visiting Minnesota and gathering points for a geological map of the United States for the use of his classes.

MASTER FRANK GUERTIN, U. S. N., was recently married according to the rites of the Greek Catholic Church, to Miss Nina Kashrometeriuff, a Russian lady, a resident of Sitka, Alaska.

GENERAL S. D. LEE has accepted the Presidency of the Mississippi Agricultural and Mechanical College, and says that he will endeavor to make it conform to its name in its strictest acceptation.

FIFTEEN-YEAR-OLD PAUL BARTLETT has sent a bust of his grandmother to the Paris Salon. The jury of nine of the most eminent sculptors of France accepted it, and sent to the boy their personal felicitations.

MISS MARY SPRAGUE, the young woman who wrote "An Earnest Trifler," is described as twenty-six, a modest, dainty, enthusiastic and very pretty girl. Her father is a prosperous lawyer at Newark, Ohio.

IT now turns out that King Theebaw was only in a three-days' trance, to which he is occasionally subject. During this time the priests burned twenty-seven virgins each day as a sacrifice and propitiatory offering.

MISS LOUISA ALCOTT has no "study," or regular writing-place. She uses whatever pen, ink or paper is nearest, composes rapidly, and writes in a free, back-sloping hand, never copying her manuscript, and rarely going back to make alterations.

PARIS journals assert that a fresh attempt is to be made by the Count de Chambord and the Orleans Princes to devise some acceptable mode of united action. The Count de Paris is said to be endeavoring to raise a loan of $4,000,000 for the good of the cause of the white flag.

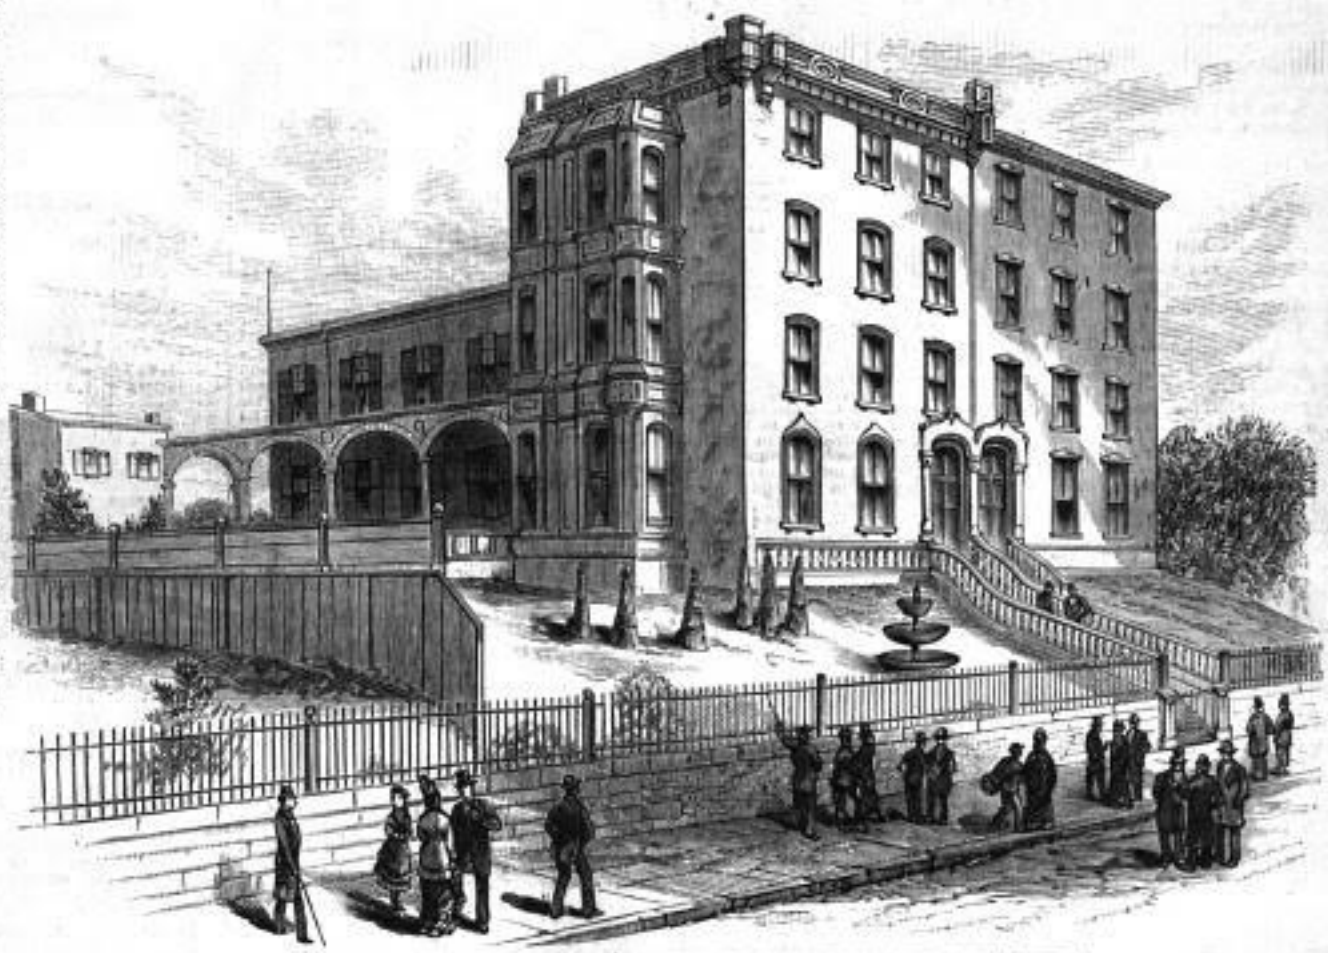
AFTER all, the M. de Pressensé, who has recently been appointed Secretary of the French Legation at Washington, is not the well-known Protestant theologian of that name in Paris, but his nephew. The new Secretary is about fifty years of age, and has grown up in the French diplomatic service.

MR. D. W. MIDDLETON, clerk of the United States Supreme Court, died, April 27th, from gout in the stomach. He had been connected with the Supreme Court for over fifty-five years, and was its clerk for nearly twenty years. It is remarked that he was never suspected of using his office in the interest of political partisanship or favoritism.

ARCHBISHOP PURCELL said, in a recent sermon at Cincinnati: "I now solemnly declare before Almighty God and this congregation that not one dollar of the money that was intrusted to my care was lavished in luxury by myself or agents, or expended in any manner for our personal benefit, and, no matter how unworthily I may appear in your eyes, I humbly ask that you pray to Almighty God for me." His health has been very bad since the financial disaster to his diocese.

TEWFIK, the new Khédive, is as economical as his sire was extravagant. He is correcting that sire's tendencies as much as possible. He discovered not long ago that the venerable gentleman had carried off a certain collection of coins valued at $80,000, which had been purchased with the state money, and which should rightly have been left in Egypt. It is asserted that the Khédive intends to rebuke this want of ceremony by quietly subtracting the item from his father's allowance during the next twelve months.

THE Princess Metternich is a clever actress. The Sunday night that the news of the Crown Prince's betrothal came to Vienna she was just about to go on the stage erected in her own palace for private theatricals, to sing a ballad adapted to her part, and ending with the refrain, "To that we'll all say hurrah!" On she went, according to Octavia Hensel, but not a word of the original song did she sing. With her charming talent for improvisation she made up some pretty verses announcing the engagement of Prince Rudolf to the lovely young Princess Stephanie of Belgium, and when the refrain came, more than one voice joined in the "hurrah!"



MLLE. CROSNETTE, who has taken Sarah Bernhardt's place at the Theatre Français, is an artist of robust rather than delicate intelligence. Her physique as a woman seems to reveal her temperament as an artist. Whether in the smoothest passages or in the difficult moments that mark the crisis of a drama, her intelligence is to be counted on; but you cannot count as surely on her sympathetic power; not surely on her aptitude to win laughter; still less surely on a capacity to provoke tears. But she can plant her dialogue brilliantly. She can be always audacious or good-natured; if not often refined nor often distinguished. Her individuality is not wholly French.

AN approaching marriage is announced between Count Herman de Merode and Mlle. Amelie de la Rochefoucauld d'Estissac. This union will connect two of the greatest houses in Europe. The count is the son of Count de Merode, Senator for the Deuhs. His grandfather, Count Felix de Merode, was on the point, in 1830, of being elected King of the Belgians. The family of Merode is allied to those of Arenberg, Monaco, Montalembert, Nouilles, Gramont, the Cisterns, and by them to the Italian dynasty. The ancient seigniorial residence of Ireion, in the Department of the Nord, belonging to them, is surrounded by an immense extent of land and forests. Count Herman is the nephew of Mgr. de Merode, who was Minister of War to Pius IX. As to the Rochefoucauld family, no occasion exists in France to speak of its eminence, so mixed up is its history with that of the country. All the eldest sons of the line bear the name of François, since a certain François de la Rochefoucauld, who held François I. at the baptismal font. The Rochefoucauld who wrote the "Maximes" bears the name of François II. in the series of family portraits. The future Countess de Merode is the third daughter of the Duke d'Estissac.

WM. H. KEMBLE'S RESIDENCE.

WE illustrate on this page the residence of Mr. Wm. H. Kemble, ex-State Treasurer of Pennsylvania, who was last week sentenced to one year's imprisonment at hard labor and to pay a fine of $1,000, for the attempted bribery of members of the Legislature of that State. Mr. Kemble's residence, of brown stone, is located on Green Street, near Fairmount Park, in Philadelphia, and is one of the finest in the street. The grounds are neatly terraced, and a fountain adds to their attractiveness. Mr. Kemble, who is wealthy, and has hitherto occupied a conspicuous position in the politics and business of Philadelphia, was surrounded in his home by everything necessary to a life of elegance and comfort; and although already pardoned, he now probably regrets as keenly as his friends can do that he ever permitted himself to hazard his reputation and his domestic happiness by practices so criminal as the corrupt solicitation of the votes of sworn legislators.

PENNSYLVANIA.—WILLIAM H. KEMBLE'S RESIDENCE, ON GREEN STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT ARMORY.

THE Seventh Regiment, N. G. S. N. Y., took formal possession, April 26th, of its new armory at Fourth Avenue and Sixty-seventh Street, New York, being escorted from its old quarters by the Sixty-ninth and Seventy-first Regiments and its own Veteran Corps. The parade attracted a good deal of attention from the populace. All the way up Fifth Avenue crowds lined the sidewalks and filled the stoops, and in the neighborhood of the armory there was a veritable crush. When the right of the column reached Sixty-sixth Street and Fourth Avenue, the different commands wheeled into line and presented arms, while the Seventh marched past, and, entering the building, took formal possession. In the neighborhood flags waved from private residences and hotels, which were thronged with spectators.

In the armory and near the main entrance there was such a throng that it was some time before the escorting organizations could enter. Tables were spread the length of the large drill-room, and after a collation and inspection of the armory, amid numerous cheers, the escorting bodies marched away, the Sixty-ninth to take possession of the old armory over Tompkins Market. After the pressure to enter had subsided with the departure of the military, hundreds went in and out throughout the evening, inspecting what is said to be the finest armory in the world.

The armory, of handsome brick with stone facings, occupies the whole block between Fourth and Lexington Avenues and Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Streets. Since the fair, last Fall, much had been done, though the inside will not be entirely finished until next October. On the Fourth Avenue side is the administration building, three stories tall, 200 by 100 feet. It contains company rooms, field and staff and non-commissioned staff quarters, small squad drill-rooms, band and drum corps rooms, a gymnasium, the Veterans' room, Board of Officers' room, etc. The company rooms are in the second story. There is a kitchen in which rations for 1,000 men may be cooked. The main drill room is 300 by 200 feet, and the ceiling is nearly 100 feet high. The room is neatly decorated, and has galleries for spectators. In the basement are the rifle range, furnaces, and all the necessary interior appliances. The company rooms are being fitted up lavishly, at a cost ranging from $11,000 down to $7,000. Outside of $150,000 raised on bonds and about $25,000 from the city, the entire cost of the building (nearly $600,000) has been raised by subscription among the active and veteran members and residents. The New York public, which has always felt a just pride in the character and history of this regiment, may well felicitate its members upon their occupation of quarters creditable in every way to the city and the "noble Seventh."

THE CHINESE ARMY AND NAVY.

SEVERAL Russian newspapers, in view of the contingency of a war with China, give some particulars of the military and naval forces of that country. The chief portion of the Chinese Army consists of "the First Army Corps," composed of eight Manchou, eight Tartar, and eight Chinese corps, and the garrison of Pekin. The soldiers of "the First Army Corps" are seldom drilled, and are mostly armed with old swords, bows, spears, and other antiquated weapons. Being badly paid, they earn their living by working at all sorts of trades, and are of but little use as soldiers. Their total strength, exclusive of officers, is about 105,000 men. The garrison of Pekin, also badly armed, consists of 17,500 men. Besides these there are two corps 16,500 strong, which form the Emperor's bodyguard, and a division of infantry of 20,000 men, whose duty it is to keep order in the capital and its suburbs. There is also a third army, which during the present century has been almost exclusively employed in time of war.

This is the so-called "Green-banner Army," which is composed of eighteen army corps, in correspondence with the eighteen provinces of the Empire. Each army corps has five divisions, and each division five camps. A General commands each division, and the civil Governors are the Commanders-in-Chief of the troops stationed in their respective districts.

The strength of the "Green-banner Army" on paper is about 651,000 men, with 7,000 officers, but it is probable that not more than one-half of this force could be brought into the field. Barely 50,000 of them are armed with European weapons and drilled according to the principles of European tactics; the remainder still carry spears, matchlocks and short swords. Finally, there is a kind of irregular volunteer corps, which is called in when the regular army has proved incapable of suppressing an insurrection or putting down brigandage. This corps is even worse armed than the others, possesses but little training and is scarcely amenable to discipline. As for the Chinese Navy, its ships are for the most part badly constructed and insufficiently manned. There are a few European officers, but the majority of the naval officers are Chinese, who are very ignorant and inefficient. The fleet is divided into three groups, those of Canton, Fukien, and Kiang-su. The Canton division consists of twelve vessels, three of which are screw junks, two English gunboats and seven steamers, also purchased in England, and commanded by foreign officers. The ships of the Fukien fleet were built at the docks of Foochoo, under the direction of a French lieutenant of the navy in the Chinese service. These ships are provided with good engines, and are armed with French naval guns; among them are a corvette with thirteen guns, six gunboats, and eight transport ships. The Kiang-su division consists of two frigates, nine gunboats, and a few transports, badly built and manned.

It is said that the Chinese Government is now prepared to reorganize its army and navy, and some Chinese officers have been attached to a Prussian regiment with this object.

THE GLADSTONE MINISTRY.

THE new English Premier has been successful in calling to his aid men at once strong and well-known in public life. With a few exceptions, his Cabinet of 1880 is identical with that of 1874, as far as the members are concerned; there has simply been a rearrangement of the various portfolios. We gave so recently an eminently characterisic portrait of the Liberal Premier, that we now omit his familiar face, and present our readers with portraits of the leading men he has placed in the Ministry.

EARL OF KIMBERLEY, COLONIAL SECRETARY.

His Grace George Douglas Campbell, K. T., Duke of Argyll, Lord of the Privy Seal, was born at Ardencaple Castle, Dumbartonshire, in 1823, and succeeded to the dukedom in 1847. At an early age he entered Parliament, and has had large experience of public life. He was Lord Privy Seal under the Aberdeen and Palmerston ministries, Postmaster-General in 1860, and Secretary of State for India 1868-74. He became Chancellor of the University of St. Andrews in 1851, Rector of the University of Glasgow in 1854, was President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in 1855, and has been President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh since 1861. He has taken an active part in debate and committee work in the House of Lords, has written much on ecclesiastical subjects, and is the author of learned philosophical works on "The Reign of Law" (1866) and "Primeval Man" (1869). He is the father of the Marquis of Lorne, Governor-General of Canada, and visited New York City last year.

EARL SPENCER, LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL.

RT. HON. JOHN BRIGHT, CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER.

Lord Granville, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, is one of the veterans in English public life. He had sat in the Commons ten years when he succeeded to the peerage in 1846, so that, although he is now in his sixty-sixth year, he has been in politics forty-four years. He served an early apprenticeship in diplomacy as attaché in Paris during his father's Embassy there, and was Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs for a few months before the downfall of the Melbourne Government. His reputation as a courtier statesman may be traced to his official relations with the Royal Household, where he held the office of Master of the Buckhounds during the first two years of Lord John Russell's first administration. In 1848 he was transferred to the Vice-Presidency of the Board of Trade—an appointment ridiculed by John Bright at the time, but fully justified by subsequent service. The expulsion of Lord Palmerston from the Foreign Office in 1851 enabled Lord Granville for a few months to fill the post which he subsequently occupied during Mr. Gladstone's administration. In the administrations of Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell he was President of the Council, and occupied subordinate positions, accommodating himself to the political exigencies of his party chiefs. In 1859 he narrowly escaped being made Premier, when the Queen found it difficult to choose between Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell. Under Mr. Gladstone's administration he was Colonial, and subsequently Foreign, Secretary, and the leader of the Liberal party in the House of Lords. Lord Granville's conduct in office and as the leader of the minority in the Upper House during the last six years has been characterized by self-possession, moderation, patience and good temper.

LORD NORTHBROOK, FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY.

RT. HON. J. STANSFELD, PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

HON. HUGH CHILDERS, SECRETARY FOR WAR.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, LORD OF THE PRIVY SEAL.

Right Honorable Spencer Compton Cavendish, Marquis of Hartington, M. P. for Northeast Lancashire, and leader of the House of Commons, Secretary of State for India, is the heir-apparent to the great whig dukedom of Devonshire, to which he will probably soon succeed, his father being now in his seventies. He is a cousin of Earl Granville, and on the mother's side is descended from the Howards, Earls of Carlisle. Born July 23d, 1833, he graduated at

EARL GRANVILLE, SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, SECRETARY FOR INDIA.

HON. WM. E. FORSTER, SECRETARY FOR IRELAND.

Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1854, and accompanied his cousin Granville on his special mission to St. Petersburg to attend the coronation of Alexander II., in 1856. Entering Parliament for North Lancashire in 1857, he moved in 1859 the vote of no confidence which overthrew the Derby Ministry in 1859. He became a Lord of the Admiralty and Under Secretary for War in 1863, and was Secretary of War four months in 1866. He lost his seat in the elections of December, 1868, but was immediately elected for the Radnor boroughs, was Postmaster-General 1868-71, and Chief Secretary for Ireland 1871-74. On the retirement of Mr. Gladstone from the Liberal leadership in 1875 the cousins Granville and Hartington divided the succession, the first in the Lords, the second in the Commons. His leadership of the House of Commons has been marked by wisdom and moderation, and his conduct during the late elections has greatly strengthened him in popular estimation.

What Emigrants are Bringing to this Country.

THE average amount of cash brought by emigrants during the present year, Superintendent Jackson estimates, is at least $60 per head, and, taking the total of 400,000 emigrants this year, it will thus be seen that here is at once an addition of about $25,000,000 to the ready cash of this country. This $25,000,000 of ready hard cash brought into the country is, of course, but a very small proportion of the actual and immediate addition of our production and wealth which the present flood-tide of emigration supplies, for Mr. Jackson estimates that nearly one half of the total, or about 200,000 of the emigrants this year, will be male adults, who will sustain themselves by their own labor, and directly add to the production of the country. The statistics of the Custom House for the year ending June 30th, 1879, show a total of 177,000 emigrants who arrived during that period, and 111,000 of these, or about two thirds, were males, while only 65,000 were females. Again, out of the 111,000 males, only a very small proportion—17,000—were under the age of fifteen, while of the females only 16,000 were under that age; but not only was the proportion of those who were of too tender an age to make themselves useful to the labor and production of their new Fatherland very small, but also the number of those too feeble and aged to work was infinitesimal. Out of these 111,000 males, only 13,000 were over forty years of age, so that it is clearly shown, as ex-Governor Tilden has so ably pointed out, that emigrants come at a time of life when their labor is likely to be the most useful and the most highly productive. Railroads are at first the greatest beneficiaries of the present emigration, for about sixty per cent. of the emigrants arriving here leave at once for the Western States, and Mr. Jackson estimates that out of the average $60 cash they each bring over, probably $30 of it goes for railroad passage. This money, though immediately spent, still remains in the country, and is not, therefore, to be regarded as lost.

THE SUNDAY MAGAZINE FOR JUNE.

THE June number of FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE will contain, among other important articles, an interesting paper on "The Gospel in Africa," by the Rev. Daniel Edwards; an article on "Moses," being a continuation of the series of Old Testament Portraits; "Drachenfels, a Legend of the Rhine," a poem by Alfreton Hervey; "The Little Maid of Syria," being No. 5 of the Children of the Bible; an appreciative and well-written paper on "Ignatius Loyola," the celebrated founder of the Jesuit Order, by Principal Tulloch, and a companion sketch of "Francesco de Paula Rued, a Spanish Protestant"; an article on "Ahasuerus," by Herbert Lee, in the series of Gentile Rulers mentioned in Scripture; a sketch of "Philip Melancthon and his Influence in the Reformation"; a short paper on the "Channing Centenary," by Alfred H. Guernsey; besides the usual amount of poetry, fiction and the editorial departments.

FUN.

A NEW YORK man who was troubled with insomnia took a situation as night watchman, and was asleep half an hour after he went on duty the first time.

A NEGRO, after gazing at some Chinese, shook his head and solemnly said: "If de white folks be so dark as dat out dar, I wonder what's de color of de black folks?"

IT is claimed that a man never loses anything by politeness, but this has proved to be a mistake. As an old Philadelphian lifted his hat to a young lady the wind carried away his wig.

"YES, yer riverence, all thim names he called me, an', sis I, 'I wouldn't demane meself to lose me timper wid such a low blackguard,' so I just knocked him over wid a stick and come away."

AN Illinois youth, husking corn in a field near the railroad, saw a new locomotive, with a red smokestack. He became frightened, and ran to the house crying: "That 'ere engine is going to bust, sure; it's red hot clean to the top of the stove-pipe."

HUSBAND OF PROFESSIONAL BEAUTY: "Another casualty! More poor widows and orphans!" Professional Beauty: "How awful! And of course there'll be another fancy fair, and I shall have a stall, and wear my new 'confection' from Madame Labinsky's. Poor creatures!"

ADJUTANT (referring to young militia officer attached for instruction): "Sergeant, Mr. Skipling doesn't seem to be getting on fast enough." Sergeant Drill Instructor: "It's not my fault, sir, whatever! You cannot expect it when his eyes is constantly a-riveted on all the young ladies as passes!"

A STORY is told of General Butler's sarcastic retort upon a Massachusetts judge, whom he was teasing for a ruling favorable to a cause he was defending in court. The judge got out of patience at last, and somewhat testily exclaimed: "Mr. Butler, what do you think I sit here for?" The General quietly shrugged his shoulders and replied: "The Court has got me now."

NEAR Cape Town a polyglot innkeeper has suspended over his door a gayly-painted sign, bearing the following quaint inscription: "Multum in parvo, pro bono publico—Entertainment for man and beast, all of a row. Lecker Kost, as much as you please; excellent beds without any fleas. Nos patriam fugimus—now we are here; Vivamus, let us live by selling good beer. On donne à boire et a manger ici; Come in and try it, whoever you be!"

ONE very hot day a case was being tried in a court of law in one of the Western States. The council for the plaintiff had been speaking at great length, and, after referring to numerous authorities, was about to produce another imposing volume, when the judge inquired what was the amount in dispute. On being informed that it was two dollars, "Well," said he, "the weather is very hot, I am very old, and also feeble—I'll pay the amount myself."

A CONSCIENTIOUS ARTIST.—The Dean: "Mr. Snipe, I want you to make my son a hunting-suit; just what you used to make for me, you know." Clerical Tailor: "I beg your pardon, Mr. Dean. May I inquire if the young gentleman is in holy orders?" The Dean: "No." Clerical Tailor: "Ah! to be ordained shortly, I suppose?" The Dean: "No, no; he's not thinking of anything of the kind." Clerical Tailor: "Then, I'm sorry to say I must decline the order, Mr. Dean."

NOT A DRUG.

THE public have suffered long enough from drug poisoning, and have become afraid of pill and potion. "COMPOUND OXYGEN" is not a drug, and does not cure by the substitution of one disease for another, as when drugs are taken, but by an orderly process of reestablishment. See what has been said before in this paper, and send for our Treatise giving full information. It will be mailed free. DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard St., Phila., Pa.

"WHY do you keep all the caramels yourself, Johnny?" asked a West Philadelphia mother of her son; "why not give Lucy half of them?" "Oh, because," said Johnny. "Because what?" "Just because I'm a monopolist. Didn't you say the other day that if papa hadn't been a monopolist he couldn't a succeeded so well?"

PRESIDENT HAYES.

THE validity of Mr. Hayes's title may always be questioned, and his administration criticised; but the payment of one dollar gives a valid title to one bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and its administration can never be criticised in cases of coughs, colds, incipient consumption and general debility, for leading physicians of all schools indorse the Discovery and prescribe it in their practice. Sold by Druggists.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE.—Relish for Soups, Fish, Steaks, Chops, Cold Meats, Gravies, etc.

A NATIONAL POLICY in which all parties can agree—an Accident Policy in THE TRAVELERS.

IT is impossible to find a cough or cold remedy to compare with DR. BROWNING'S C. & C. CORDIAL. Try it. 50 cents per bottle.

SORE THROAT, COUGH, COLD and similar troubles, if suffered to progress, result in serious Pulmonary Affections, oftentimes incurable. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" reach directly the seat of the disease, and give almost instant relief.

MESSRS. J. B. G. SIEGERT & SONS, of Ciudad Bolivar, whose fame has been carried all over the civilized world by their Angostura Bitters, have now placed on the market a new article, the "ANGOSTURA LIQUEUR." It contains the same ingredients as the bitters, in a reduced quantity, and toned down by the addition of sugar. But it retains the tonic qualities of the former, and is aromatic, pungent, bitter and sweet. We have no doubt but what this new article will rank with the finest liqueurs in the estimation of the public, and advise all who have not seen it to give it a trial.—Stanford's Wine and Liquor Circular.

NOBLESVILLE, IND.

ONE of the finest hotel buildings in New York is the St. NICHOLAS, facing Broadway, the grandest of American boulevards, with its imposing marble front. It is such a hotel as Americans, who are princes of hotel-keepers, can afford to be proud of; elegant in its finish, furnishings and appointments; perfect in service, with a first-class table and genial, able proprietor. Mr. Welch not only has the best of theories about hotel-keeping, but he has the rarest of qualities—an executive ability which enables him to carry out what he plans.

AUBURN, N. Y., March 1st, 1878.

H. W. JOHNS MFG. CO., 87 Maiden Lane, New York:

Dear Sirs—In answer to your inquiry, as to how we like your Paint, we are more than entirely satisfied with it. As you are aware, we are large users of paint, and of all that we have ever used, are satisfied yours is far superior; it is put on with less labor, covers better, flows more easily, has a better body, and, as far as our experience goes, will stand the weather better than any other paint we know of.

Your roof paint is unsurpassed; we used one coat on a tin roof, and to-day it looks as fresh, and the color is as bright, as when first applied. Respectfully yours,

EPPS'S COCOA.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

A NEW SERIAL.

IN No. 1,287 of the ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, we shall commence the publication of a powerful serial story, entitled, "The Schaffuskie Lands," written expressly for our columns by the author of "In the Meshes." The scene of the story is laid in Russia, and is crowded with pictures of Russian life and vivid descriptions, also, of the terrors of Siberia. The story is in every respect one of the most effective and striking we have ever published, and will, we are sure, command the admiration of the most critical readers.

THE NEW VETO.

THE Deficiency Bill making appropriations, among other objects, for the salaries of United States Marshals and their deputies employed in the enforcement of the Federal election laws, has encountered a veto at the hands of President Hayes. It will be remembered that the Bill contained a proviso (originally draughted by Mr. Garfield), according to which the appointment of such deputies is vested in the Judge of the United States Circuit Court for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or in the District Judge when the Circuit Judge is absent. It is further provided that the deputy election marshals shall be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties, and shall be persons of good moral character, besides being well-known residents of the voting precinct in which they are to act.

The President bases his avowed objection to the Bill simply and solely on the ground that it is loaded with this "rider." He does not enter into any criticism of the proviso in point of its contents, but protests against its place in an Appropriation Bill, and repeats, in almost identical terms, the objections which he formulated against "riders" in his veto message of April 29th, 1879. He then called attention to the fact that the practice of tacking to Appropriation Bills measures not pertinent to them did not prevail until more than forty years after the adoption of the Constitution, that the enlightened public opinion of the country was opposed to the practice, that the Constitutions of more than half of the States contained a prohibition against it in matters of State legislation, and that the whole theory and policy of such legislation tended to hamper the Executive in the discharge of his constitutional functions as an integral part of the legislative power when giving effect to new legislation. In his present veto message the President does but repeat the substance of those statements as a sufficient reason for withholding his signature from the Deficiency Bill which contains this proviso modifying the Federal election laws.

In the general justice of these representations we entirely concur; and when the President's veto message of April 29th, 1879, was addressed to an Army Appropriation Bill containing a "rider" designed to nullify the Federal election laws without undertaking to repeal them, it seemed to us that his exceptions were well taken on both particular and general grounds. And we still admit the force of these objections, while not seeing that they lie quite so conclusively against a proviso which, whatever may be its incongruity in point of form and place, does not seem objectionable in point of legislative force and effect, being, in fact, designed to correct admitted evils and abuses in the present administration of the Federal election laws.

In commenting on the policy of the Bill at the time of its passage we referred to the objection which might be brought against it on the score of this alleged "rider," and intimated the opinion that such an objection was scarcely tenable in view of the fact that a "rider in the true acceptation of that term is always something straddled upon an Appropriation Bill because it has not merit enough of its own to procure for it the honor of an independent passage." It then seemed to us that an amendment drawn by a distinguished Republican leader in the House of Representatives, and accepted as a "compromise" by the more moderate of the Democrats, had the appearance of being something better than a "rider" in the objectionable sense of that term, though even then we expressed a wish that the Democratic majority, instead of aiming a blow at the most flagrant defects of the present Federal election laws, "had addressed themselves to the task of digesting a well-considered measure under this head, in the shape of a separate Bill designed to correct all the 'oppression' and 'partiality' of the existing statutes."

Now that the President has set his face like a flint against the modification of these statutes by any provisoes, which have the form of "riders" because they are attached to Appropriation Bills, it is to be hoped that there is enough of statesmanship in the Democratic majority of both Houses to mature such a well-considered measure as we have indicated. As President Hayes has, on several occasions, avowed his willingness to co-operate with the majority of Congress in correcting "any oppression, any partisan partiality which experience may have shown in the existing laws" under this head, and as it is a matter of notoriety that "the existing laws," in the hands of Republican marshals and their deputies, have been grossly abused to the "oppression" of voters, and are always liable to the charge of "partisan partiality" in their present administration, it is at once the dictate of political prudence and of constitutional duty that the Democratic majority should meet the President on the high public ground to which he summons them. This can be done only by digesting a Bill designed to correct the inequality and injustice of the present statutes. Such a Bill, when sent to the President, will test the sincerity of his public professions, and the debate had on its passage would enable the people to weigh the real motives of the Republican opposition in the balances of public scrutiny. The present laws, under the guise of protecting the purity of Federal elections, place a large corruption fund and a body of political "strikers" at the command of the Republican Party for the purpose of "carrying elections." The deputy marshals are elected with the power of making arbitrary arrests not only on voting-days but during the whole period of registration, and the appointees, being selected by a partisan official, and responsible to him alone for the administration of their high trust, have often been men of depraved character and infamous antecedents. We have before us the records of an official inquiry into the character and conduct of some of these deputy marshals at the election of 1876, in which "convicted thieves," "habitual drunkards" and professional "repeaters" figure as custodians of the purity of our Federal elections. It is high time that a law subject to such maladministration should be amended, but it should be amended by the regular processes of direct legislation, and not by the piecemeal and patchwork methods of parties "manœuvring for a position" in the small strategy of political warfare. Let the whole question be advanced at once to a field in which the larger strategy of a comprehensive statesmanship shall set clearly before the people which of the two great parties is the more honest in its professed desire to secure a free and fair election in the coming contest. The attitude of the President and of his supporters in Congress does not call for idle vaporing or for fluent and angry inculpation of motives. It calls for firm and decided action in the open and manly paths of legislative procedure, and if such action shall encounter the banded opposition of the Republican minority in Congress, the Democrats will have succeeded in procuring for themselves the best of all possible "political cries" by the simple expedient of doing their plain constitutional duty in the premises. In the game of politics, as in the game of war, according to the dictum of the Duke of Wellington, that party succeeds which commits the fewest blunders of its own, and knows how best to profit by the blunders of its adversary.

A BRIGHT AND DARK SIDE.

OUR financial situation has both its bright and dark side, and this we shall endeavor to make apparent. The Treasury statement for April is pleasant reading because of the announcement that the net public debt has been reduced to the extent of $12,078,070. This, taken by itself, is inspiriting, and gives a hopeful hue to the national prospects. With the exception of March, there has been no monthly reduction to equal it since April, 1872. True, a cancellation of Alabama bonds in February, 1877, showed a reduction of $14,107,016, but as those bonds, principal and interest, amounted to $9,550,000, the real debt reduction was only $4,557,016. The reduction during the past two months has been $26,797,467, and with the exception of February and March, 1872, no two consecutive months has shown a like reduction since the Summer of 1870. Although the present rapid debt reduction is largely due to an increasing volume of imports, yet it must not be supposed that the imports begin to equal those of 1872. This may appear strange to many, but the reduction, in fact, owes somewhat to the previous payment of bonds, the successful refunding operations of the country, and a diminution of the monthly interest charge. In March, 1872, this charge was $9,015,000. Now it is only $6,747,171. The difference is $2,357,828, and this difference saved counts $2,357,828 in favor of reduction. The revenue for the month of April was as follows:

From Customs	$17,566,540
From Internal Revenue	10,747,748
Total	$28,314,288

For the corresponding month of last year the receipts from customs were $11,940,052, and from internal revenue $7,846,513, the aggregate being more than eight and one half millions less than now. The figures show a gain in customs equal to forty-seven per cent., and thirty-seven per cent. in internal revenue. This exhibit is quite satisfactory and represents the bright side of the matter.

With all its seeming brightness, the account has its dark side. The available cash in the Treasury, as it appears, only increased to the extent of $64,000 during the past month, while the gold reserve decreased $5,227,111. At the same time the amount of silver dollars increased in the sum of $1,631,331—the coinage having been $2,300,000—and fractional silver to the amount of $777,867. According to this showing, the Treasury continues to coin nearly four times as many silver dollars as it can, by any device, put into circulation, and only succeeded in getting rid of about $668,669 at the expense of taking into its own vaults a larger sum in fractional coins. This is in nowise encouraging. In fact, there is quite enough in the dark side of the account to excite apprehension as to the final ability of the Government to meet its obligations in gold coin. Within the past four months the gold reserve has been reduced about $19,000,000. Should Congress adjourn without considering this matter, before the next session the reserve will be cut down to less than $100,000,000. In the meantime the silver in the Treasury, now amounting to $68,186,677, will be greatly enlarged by new coinage, which, at the present rate, will run the amount up to at least $86,000,000 by the close of the present calendar year. In these several facts we have the dark side of the account, and it cannot be held to be reassuring.

Let the Treasury be depleted of gold and loaded with silver, and all that has been done towards putting the country on its business legs, all that has been done towards placing the currency and the credit of the Government on a firmer basis, will have been undone. Exports remain stationary while imports are on the increase. A little prosperity seems to have turned the American head, and the old shadow of extravagance appears to be returning. With the changing state of the Treasury, and the former order of things as to an adverse balance of trade restored, the country can only look forward to new financial perils and another era of business depression, attended with the usual bankruptcy and suffering. As yet we are only sailing in the outer circles of the vortex. If the present tendency be allowed to drift on unchecked, it will be found that the circles will grow less, and that each contraction hastens the approach to ruin. It behooves both Congress and people to look at the dark side as well as the bright one, and to act promptly and with wise precaution.

LIBEL AND THE LAW.

IT is not surprising that with the immense increase of newspapers and other publications, and the present facilities for distribution, malicious libels should also have increased, but it is at least discreditable to the spirit and intelligence of the age that no adequate steps have been taken either for the suppression or the punishment of the evil. Indeed, although the law offers its promise of redress to those who have suffered in this respect, yet it is only in rare cases that any punishment is meted out for the offense, while he who seeks pecuniary compensation for an injury to his character is generally laughed at for his pains. Hence it is not unnatural that parties smarting under an injury of this character, incensed beyond control and feeling that the law will afford them no satisfaction, frequently take the law into their own hands, and practically attempt to avenge one crime by the perpetration of a greater one. This weakness of human nature is recognized to a certain extent by the law, since one of the reasons given by the old English judges why a libel is of a higher degree of criminality than mere slander is that the former naturally incites to a breach of the peace. And how the matter is regarded by juries may be ascertained by the acquittal of Landis, of Vineland, even at the hands of a New Jersey jury, after killing the editor who had made some reflections on his domestic relations.

The recent Kalloch and De Young vendetta, with its present horrible and fatal results, and the end of which, perhaps, has not yet been reached, affords a proper text for a few remarks on the general subject referred to. Without attempting to excuse or even to palliate the conduct of any of the actors in that terrible drama, may we not reasonably inquire whether it is probable that they would have resorted to acts of violence if the law had afforded them a sure, speedy and adequate remedy for their supposed wrongs? And here it is safe to say that, in this State at least, the punishment for the most malicious, unfounded and damaging libel is absolutely insignificant. The pickpocket who filches a trifling amount from your person is branded as a felon, and is consigned to hard labor in State Prison for a number of years at the discretion of the Judge. The trite quotation of Shakespeare, "Who steals my purse steals trash, etc.," is on every one's lip and is cited with universal approval, and yet the man who deliberately, maliciously and falsely composes, and secretly disseminates, beyond the power of recall, a libel which causes you to lose the esteem of your fellow-men, which may blast your life and even follow your memory beyond the grave, is guilty only of a misdemeanor, and the utmost punishment he can be made to suffer, and which is rarely inflicted, is imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding one year, and a fine not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars.

Now this is manifestly wrong. There should be vested either in the court or jury a wide discretion both as to the nature and extent of the punishment dependent upon the facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case. The publisher of a great newspaper, with a number of subordinates upon whose judgment and fidelity he relies, and who is guilty, if at all, of negligence, and not of malice, should be credited with all such matters of extenuation; while he who with malice and deliberation attempts to injure character by the circulation of unfounded and unjustifiable accusations should be made to suffer proportionately, and certainly should not fare better than the petty thief who steals from necessity.

The method adopted for the circulation of a libel should also have great weight in determining the extent of punishment. And here it may be remarked that the vilest form of attack, and which should be most severely punished, is that of an anonymous pamphlet. A moment's reflection will prove this. A newspaper, especially a daily, has generally the same readers. If an article appears on one day injurious to personal character, it is within the power of the publisher to atone for the offense by repeated publication of explanation or apology. The newspaper is rarely preserved in permanent form except in great libraries, and its contents are soon forgotten except in special cases. In the case of the anonymous pamphlet it is in a form most likely to be preserved and to pass from one hand to another than a newspaper. As it is distributed secretly, no one but the libeler himself can tell to whom it was at first sent, and it would be almost an impossibility to reach all its readers with a contradiction or retraction. Its anonymous character, too, greatly aggravates the offense, not only from the difficulty and expense attending detection, and the meanness of the mode of attack, but also for the reason that it is likely to make innocent persons the objects of suspicion or resentment of the injured party while the author remains concealed.

Much more could be said in confirmation of these views, and we may recur to the subject hereafter. For the present it will suffice if the attention of the public is directed to what we believe to be a much needed reform.

THE BARON OF TONSORIA.

THE question, "Is a baron necessarily any more worthy than a barber in this free country?" is one which is just now agitating New York society quite profoundly. And accompanying it is the collateral question, "If a baron is superior to a barber, how is an innocent American to know which is the baron and which is the barber?"

These conundrums have been suddenly inflicted upon the society of the metropolis by the death, from pneumonia, of a person who was widely known as Doctor Hector Carlos, the Baron de Maincy. He chiefly preferred the society of artists and literary people, musicians, journalists and professional men and fashionable women, and is reputed to have made over a hundred calls at the residences of such last New Year's Day. That he could live in New York for fifteen years as the Baron de Maincy, not tolerated but petted and made much of by what may properly call itself good society; that he could attend hundreds of receptions a year as an illustrious bachelor from France and have his name in the society papers every week; that he could borrow thousands and probably tens of thousands of dollars from fashionable and respectable ladies, and that, finally, after his death, it should be discovered that he was not Baron de Maincy, "head of the great Bourbon family"—not any baron at all, not a titled person, not a Frenchman, not even a bachelor, alas!—but only a German barber, with three wives! This is astounding, and this is the whole of the curious revelation that is making a very reputable segment of metropolitan society blush scarlet. The proof was found in his trunk; and it would certainly have been better for the peace of mind of the acquaintances of the ambitious hair-dresser if that trunk had been committed to the flames, with its queer contents, without exposure. But in that case a grave duty to the public would have been left unperformed; the French wife of the barber would never have been able to prove that her husband, Horace Carlos d'Arget de Fouget, as he called himself to her, who ran away six weeks after marriage, carrying the whole of her little fortune, $10,000, was really dead; the little German wife would never have known of the death of her faithless lord, Carl Haase, and so could not have inherited the property that has been left her; and well-to-do married ladies of New York would have gone on giving to distressed noblemen their husbands' money, while unmarried ladies would have gone on accepting the flattering homage of pretenders, and inviting them to their houses, and thinking them "so distingué." No; it is well that the lion's pelt has been taken off and hung up to dry.

Probably Carl Haase was a skillful and faithful barber before the bee of nobility got in his bonnet; and the question should recur to his late victims, who now probably mourn for him for one reason or another, whether a good barber is not better than any sort of a baron who will borrow money from ladies. This, by-the-way, is a good place to draw the line. It is really not of much consequence to others whether a man be actually a baron or a barber, or both; but if there are Mrs. Leo Hunters in society who think it important to have a test, it will be financially safe to assume that any man is a nobleman if he is able and willing to lend money to you, and that a pretended nobleman is a fraud if he wants to borrow money of you. For this is a country where honest manual labor is rewarded; and a nobleman, if he be really noble, will go to building fences, felling trees, or working on a railroad, before he will ask a loan of money from newly-made acquaintances. A nobleman may actually be in distress, but there is no excuse for his being, in this country, a beggar—well fed and well clad, living on money that he has "borrowed." A baron who "has seen better days" is not a pleasant sight; and he is a very suspicious character if he seeks for a precarious livelihood as a professional nobleman, when clearly he ought to hide his rank even from his best friends and go before the world as an industrious citizen to take his chances with the rest. A baron who lives upon his friends, on his elegant manners and distingué air, and distributes his baronial card on New Year's Day bearing his coronet with the lion couchant and the intrepid motto of "the family," would seem to be too transparent an impostor to gull any intelligent people. The rule is, Never believe in a foreign nobleman in America unless he obviously have a fortune, for, if he be impecunious, he will hide his rank and take honest care that it be not discovered. There are some such in this country, and they are respected, not for the factitious and unimportant title that is buried in oblivion, but for the true nobility within them that causes them to fall back on the domain their right hand can win.

"You see yon birkie ca'd a lord,
Wha struts and stares, and a' that,
Tho' hundreds worship at his word,
He's but a coof for a' that;
For a' that, and a' that,
His ribband, star, and a' that,
The man of independent mind,
He looks and laughs at a' that!"

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THERE has been a lull in European affairs after the excitement caused by the English elections, and the only important political event has been the defeat of the Cairoli Ministry in Italy and the subsequent dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies. Cairoli in Italy is now the leader of the Left, and owing to a coalition between the Right and certain portions of the Left the Ministry was defeated. The King, however, refused the resignation which Signor Cairoli tendered and immediately after issued a decree dissolving the Chamber of Deputies. The election is to take place upon the 16th instant, and the Chamber will meet upon the 28th.

It is probable that the Liberal majority, which was unwieldy from its very strength, will be reduced, but the chances of defeat are infinitesimal. Still the ecclesiastical party is very powerful in Italy, and it is understood that the present Pope will not pursue the policy of his predecessor in advising his party neither to vote nor to run as candidates. In a speech which Signor Cairoli recently made in the Chamber of Deputies, he explained at considerable length the foreign policy of Italy. He said that her relations with all foreign powers were excellent; that the greater number of the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin had been carried into effect; that Italy had assented to the British proposal for an International Commission to settle the confines of Turkey and Greece, and he assured his hearers that the Government would forbid and punish any act that might compromise Italy's international relations.

The distribution of food, clothes and seed potatoes still goes on among the Irish sufferers from their so-called famine, but there is a growing dissatisfaction both there and in England at the shiftless manner in which the Irish live. Some writers have lately gone as far as to suggest that the magnificent help given by America and England has been lavished upon a lot of people too lazy to work, but not too proud to beg. The Duchess of Marlborough, the wife of the late Lord Lieutenant, whom it is customary to abuse in the Emerald Isle as a purse-proud Saxon, collected in England the munificient sum of $560,000, a large part of which has not yet been expended. Yet there does not seem to be the slightest gratitude, and the elections that have just taken place have returned the men of promises and not the men of deeds. One thing is really remarkable in the composition of the contingent members of Parliament from Ireland, and that is the great number of journalists who have succeeded in obtaining seats. As a witty Englishman lately remarked, "The Irish Distress Fund has been such a success that it is contemplated to make it an annual affair. One beneficial result is already evident to any tourist or visitor—you can have a game of cards with the parish priest for ready money."

The famous Bagot will case has just been privately arranged. It will be remembered that a wealthy Irishman, Mr. Neville Bagot, amassed a large fortune in Australia, and, having returned to England, married a young lady of very high family. The evidence that was given at the trial after his death exposed a most extraordinary manner of life among the British aristocracy, and was much commented on at the time. Mr. Bagot denied that the child which his wife bore was his, and he left all his property to his brother. A lawsuit ensued, but the decision was appealed from, and the case has now been compromised by an agreement stipulating that the child shall receive $125,000 on coming of age, that Mrs. Bagot shall have $40,000 in addition to her jointure of $5,000 a year, that the brother shall take the estates, worth about $30,000 a year and the personal property, and that the enormous costs shall be paid out of the estates.

The English Conservative Ministry, before going out of power, presented themselves with all sorts of honors. It is, of course, all nonsense to think that the Queen has any personal desire to decorate an outgoing Ministry, and the honors that have been appropriated by them are very amusing. Mr. Disraeli, not content with making himself an Earl, conferred the Order of the Garter upon both himself and Lord Salisbury, when they came bringing "peace with honor" from Berlin. And now he has made two Earls, a Baron, and given away a host of orders and baronetcies. It is well for the English people that these honors do not entail any expense to the nation at large, and that the Ministry did not think of pensioning each other.

The part played by the Clerical Party in the English elections is a decidedly curious one. The High Church Party was, to a certain extent, alienated from the Conservatives on account of the Public Worship Act, but it is now asserted that a great part of the Liberal triumph is due to the canvassing of the parsons. They say that the Conservatives put law above the Church, and that the Anglican Church is the Church of no party. As Mr. Gladstone disestablished the Church in Ireland, almost certainly will do so in Scotland, and probably will do so in England, their action is at least curious. One clergyman who is very well known has, for some reason or other, resigned his emoluments. This is Mr. Duckworth, who was formerly tutor to Prince Leopold, and to whom the Princess Louise, the present Marchioness of Lorne, used to write love-letters. Mr. Duckworth was a good-looking, black-whiskered young graduate, but he had a sensible head on his shoulders, and he handed the amatory epistles to the royal mother of his pupil. Shortly afterwards he was given an important parish in London, and, when the illustrious Kinsley died, he succeeded to the vacant canonry at Westminster. Rumor is, of course, making very free with his name, and suggesting all sorts of scandalous reasons, but nothing is known positively as yet why he should resign a living of $5,000 a year.

Richard Wagner's music—the music of the future—has always been sneered at in Italy, but now it is proposed to play "Lohengrin" at Rome. An Italian deputation was sent to Wagner asking him to conduct the first performance, but he has sturdily refused. His wife, Madame Cosima Wagner, who is remarkable for the want of a sweet temper, met the Italians, refused to allow them to even see her husband, and told them that they might have played it any time these thirty years, and that it was now too late for Herr Wagner either to conduct it or to be present at the performance in the Holy City. Wagner is, however, to lead the orchestra at the performance of "Tristan and Iseult," at Leipsic.

The only new operas to be given at Covent Garden this year are Hérold's "Pré aux Clercs," with Madame Albani, and the "Bluets," with Adelina Patti, who is still in Paris.

One of the principal events of social life in Paris this year is the marriage of Baron Frank Sellière with Mlle. Diane Gallifet. The bridegroom is one of the millionaire Parisian bankers, and brother of the famous Princesse de Sagan, whose house is the headquarters of the Prince of Wales when he is in Paris. Mlle. de Gallifet is daughter of the famous General de Gallifet, of Third Empire fame, and of Madame de Gallifet; the daughter of Charles Laffite. To Americans the marriage is one of special interest, for the nephew of the bridegroom is engaged to a young lady well known in New York society, while the bridegroom himself paid us a visit in his yacht during the Centenial Exhibition; and Miss Slidell, daughter of the Slidell of the Trent notoriety, is married to Baron Erlanger, the divorced husband of Madame de Gallifet's sister. The bride is only eighteen years old, has been well educated in a convent, is pretty, but rather stout, and is exceedingly good-humored. The Prince of Wales is one of the witnesses to the wedding contract, and all Paris is excited at this important social event.

THE big Brooklyn Bridge has already cost $11,557,087, and $1,250,000 has just been called for, to be used in the completion of the structure. Taxpayers will rejoice that the limit of expenditure is about reached.

IT is now believed that Congress will not be able to adjourn on the first of June, as some of the members have proposed. A great deal of important business remains to be considered; but partisan discussions absorb so large a part of the daily sessions that measures of real public importance fail to receive the careful attention they deserve. The session is quite as likely to continue until the middle of June as to terminate on the first of the month.

GOVERNOR CORNELL has very wisely vetoed the Bill providing for the taxation of foreign capital employed in this State. While desiring to co-operate with the Legislature in maturing any measure which will insure a more equitable distribution of the burden of taxation, he objects to the present Bill on the ground that it would fail to produce any material revenue, and would tend to drive from the State a large amount of capital which in times of financial stress is sent here for temporary use.

THE city of Memphis, in Tennessee, profiting by the terrible yellow fever experiences of the past two years, is adopting thorough sanitary precautions, in the hope of averting future epidemics. During the past few months, nearly fifteen miles of new sewers have been laid in the business and thickly-settled portion of the city, and it is intended to extend the system until the entire city area is supplied with the facilities heretofore lacking. There can be no doubt that the liability to disease and contagion will be greatly diminished by this introduction of an adequate sewerage system.

MR. WASHBURNE has again announced that the various movements looking to his nomination for the Presidency are without his approval, and that under no circumstances will he be a candidate. His "desire is that every true friend of his shall support General Grant, and he expresses himself as entirely out of patience with the men who are parading his name against his will." On the other hand, it is charged that, while making this declaration publicly, he has been secretly at work to secure the nomination. Such a course would be altogether inconsistent with his record for honesty and candor, and for the present we must doubt the truth of this damaging charge.

AN illustration of the disturbed condition of Russia is afforded by the fact, stated in the recent returns of the provincial authorities, that the prisons of Russia, constructed to hold 46,000 inmates, at present contain 63,000 individuals of both sexes. The Examiner calls attention to the fact that concurrently with the growth of Nihilism has been an alarming development of crime, which, in certain districts, has assumed proportions needing the constant employment of the military. In South Russia, where a few years ago the traveler could journey for days along the most unfrequented roads without any fear of attack, bands of masked men, armed with breech-loaders and revolvers, scour the country and strike terror into the hearts of the population.

WHILE the members of the new British Cabinet carefully refrain from indicating the probable policy of the Government as to foreign matters, there are intimations from unofficial sources which quite likely reflect the views of the prominent ministerial minds. Thus Lord Derby, in a recent interview, while declaring that all treaties must be carried out, adds that England cannot afford to enter into any alliances that would impair her independence. As to Austria, he thinks that any close understanding would be altogether unwise. As to Turkey, he is of the opinion that "she cannot be saved. The sooner her end comes the better for the world. Cyprus must remain under English protection. If Turkey will not fulfill her duties in Asia Minor, England will leave her to herself." This is just what England should have done years ago, and if it shall be done now, the "sick man" will very speedily cease to trouble European politics.

THE formidable character of the Republican opposition to the renomination of General Grant for President is shown by the election, from all the Assembly districts of this city, of delegations to the Chicago Convention, with instructions to do everything in their power to defeat the third-term project. Among the delegates are some of the most prominent Republicans of New York, the list including Thurlow Weed, Frederick W. Seward, General Francis C. Barlow, Sheridan Shook, Freeman J. Fithian, Felix Adler, A. Dittenhoffer and Benj. F. Manierre. These gentlemen will speak at Chicago for tens of thousands of Republicans who, in the event of General Grant's nomination, will be compelled, conscientiously, either to refrain from all participation in the canvass, or to oppose the party with which they have been identified. It is simply amazing that, in the face of this attitude of a large element of the party, the managers still persist in their effort to force upon it a nomination and policy which must provoke certain defeat.

IN the Methodist General Conference at Cincinnati last week, the bishops communicated to the Committee on Episcopacy that they consider it desirable to elect three additional bishops. As it has been customary in previous conferences to elect more than the bishops suggest, it is thought that the number will be fixed at four. Of the candidates named, Dr. C. W. Foss is conceded to be certain of election.

IN a recent conversation with a friend, Mr. Tilden is asserted to have said that he would be a candidate before the Democratic Convention, no matter who might be named at Chicago by the Republican Party; that while he had not formerly intended to be a candidate, except in case of the nomination of General Grant at Chicago, he had now resolved to be one in any event, and that Mr. Payne, of Ohio, would be his choice for Vice-President.

THE Republican Conventions of New Jersey, New Hampshire, Wisconsin and Delaware, last week, elected Blaine delegates to Chicago. A committee was appointed to take further action in the event of his nomination at Chicago.

LOYALTY.

WHEN in our strong youth Love's fashion is now to us,
Royal in purple and crowned with fine gold,
Question we never if passion be true to us,
Dream not that years can bring cypress and rue
to us;
Poppies and roses around us unfold
In a glamour untold.

Warm is our blood and our manhood the knightliest,
Loyal our service and gracious our quest.
How should we doubt when the sunlight falls
brightliest?
How should we fear when time's yoke presses
lightliest?
What should we see but the glow of the West
In the eyes we love best?

Shall it be so when Love sets his hard tasks for us,
Time brings us burdens and fate brings us loss?
No sweet desire at the heart's gate then asks for us;
No dancing fawn in the sunny glade basks for us;
Laurel and roses and myrtle seem dross,
And a twig makes a cross!

Worthily wait, if it may not be cheerily;
Serve Love as erst ere the heyday was done;
Lay the wan ghosts of a past that looms drearily;
Live our lives straightly, although it be wearily,
And when his kingdom past death is begun
The crown is well won!

JOHN MOHAN.

THE MYSTERY OF THE LILIES.

BY ESTHER SEARLE KENNETH.

WHY, that year, Henry Gayhart chose to occupy himself with teaching, I cannot say. Perhaps it was a mere fancy; perhaps because he decidedly preferred occupation to idleness. Then he had a decided talent for it, which had no scope until he went to The Lilies.

Fate had ever been kind to him. From boyhood legacies had showered upon him. He had a charming personal presence, agreeable manners. His intimates said that he was restless and fickle; if so, these were his only faults.

He chose to present himself at The Lilies unauthorized save by his talents. Having come, it was no wonder, we think, that he staid, such a paradise of fragrance and color as he encountered when he emerged from the winding avenue upon the mansion to which he had been directed! The owner had evidently chosen

"Lilies,
Which bloom the whole Summer through"

for her favorite flower. The wide garden lying under the sun was filled with them, in all varieties and shades. Dazzling with whiteness, gleaming with gold and scarlet, or glowing with azure and purple, their rainbow brightness was dazzling, while the incense floating upon the air became almost overpowering. Gayhart involuntarily took off his hat as he looked about him, then glancing up at the long windows overlooking the grounds he replaced it and walked on.

The structure was large, irregular, built of cream-colored stone, with a variety of entrances, windows, balconies and adornments decidedly handsome and picturesque. Gayhart, looking at it critically, saw how the architectural effects had been heightened by the foliage of vines and trees which surrounded it, and pronounced it, outwardly, the most beautiful residence he had ever seen in his native country.

His ring at the wide portals brought a mulatto servant, who showed him into an exquisite little ante-room and took up his card. As Gayhart looked about him, he decided that the style of the interior at The Lilies corresponded with the exterior. But in a very few moments a lady entered the room.

She was dressed from head to foot in white. She was young, she was graceful. That she was mistress of herself, her tone and the first penetrating glance of her blue eyes confirmed.

"I am pleased to see you, Mr. Gayhart. I am Mrs. Lorne. Will you be seated?"

He was a well-bred man and could not conceal his surprise that this slight young creature could be the mistress of this large establishment.

"I have presented myself in person, Mrs. Lorne, as an applicant for the position of teacher to your son," he said, and as briefly as possible he set forth his claims and qualifications.

"And you think you will like teaching!" she said, at last.

It amused Gayhart faintly to see, in the exquisite gentleness of her manner, that she considered him impecunious and forced to turn his talents to the earning of his daily bread.

"I am quite sure of that," he answered.

"Your personal appearance, Mr. Gayhart, and the references you offer, make it impossible that I can have any hesitation in wishing to come to terms," said Mrs. Lorne. "But I must warn you that life here is most secluded and uneventful. I never entertain company. Yours is the first face outside the family that I have seen for many a year. In view of this you will, perhaps, wish to reconsider the matter. Not that I do not like social life or shall be indifferent as to how the time passes with you, but circumstances over which I have no control, compel me to live a life of retirement. To me it is not unpleasant; and perhaps you may come to think that there are some advantages here. The climate is fine, my garden blooms nearly all the year through. I am very fond of music, and my library is quite a good one. There is some very nice boating on the lake, and you will find a good horse always at your disposal at the stables."

Her evident earnest wish that he should accept the situation surprised him. Certain that it was a most exceptional one, and peculiarly fitted to his taste, he hastened to assure the lady that he was not only willing but decidedly wished to remain at The Lilies.

"In that case," she said, with a dazzling smile, "I will show you your pupil."

She rang a bell. "Send Arthur down," she said.

A moment after a manly little fellow of seven years, showing exquisite training, was in the room. The child manifested a grace and dignity which surprised and charmed Gayhart.

"You may go, Arthur," said his mother, after a few moments. "I have taught and disciplined him almost alone so far," she said, turning to Gayhart, when the boy had passed out of the long French window into the garden. "But he has been without a father's influence, and I have feared that I have been at fault in training him, and decided to put him in a man's care as soon as I could meet with a suitable person." In a few moments she rose. "Come up to the music-room, if you please; it is the hour for Arthur's lesson. I would like your judgment on his receptive faculties. It seems to me that he is singularly apt; but perhaps I am too partial."

Gayhart obeyed. Mrs. Lorne gave the lesson herself. It was evident that the boy was unusually intelligent, and, also, that he was his mother's idol. When not referring to Arthur, her manner betrayed a slight weariness and sadness. Gayhart could not but look at her critically. She was exquisitely feminine, almost beautiful. In age she could not have been more than twenty-three. Her delicacy and fairness of complexion, however, generally gave her a look of being much younger. It was the quality and thrill of her voice which conveyed the certainty of experience and character; and he found himself generally regarding her as a person much older than she was.

It was evident to him that she thought him poor, but he said to himself that he could scarcely be so while in Mrs. Lorne's service. His salary was princely. The circumstances combined to make him a wonderfully good teacher. Arthur learned rapidly, admired, loved him, and in two months Henry Gayhart found himself a very happy man at The Lilies.

The habits of the house were very regular; the attendance, it seemed to him, large for the size and character of the family. There was Mrs. Dorothy, the housekeeper; two housemaids, butler, Arthur's nurse, a lad who waited on table, coachman and hostler; and, besides these, two large, powerfully-built, civil-spoken men, whose office Gayhart could not determine. He often puzzled over this, because he frequently observed Mrs. Lorne in close conversation with them, and her manner at these times betrayed an unusual seriousness. But she never spoke of them to Gayhart, and he never thought of questioning the other servants.

Whatever her perplexities, she never spoke of any grievance or trouble. With Gayhart and Arthur she was ever gracious, affable; ready to join in conversation, or to play or sing for them. Usually she went to drive with them, often upon the lake. Arthur being unusually well-grown for his years, Gayhart taught him to row, drive and ride. Mrs. Lorne never rode, but it pleased her extremely to be rowed across the water by Arthur.

It was a little cushioned, canopied boat, gay with flags and pennons. The surface of the lake was usually smooth as glass. No influence could be sweeter or more peaceful than that which surrounded them one Summer evening as they floated on the limpid tide.

Mrs. Lorne reclined among the blue cushions; Arthur was gently rowing, carefully observed by his tutor. On, on they floated, as the sunset faded and the twilight gathered, until the terraced walls, bowery trees and twinkling lights of The Lilies were far in the distance.

"See, mamma," said Arthur—"see how far we are from home!"

"Yes," she answered, lifting her eyes and looking shorewards. "Ah! how happy I should be to float on and on like this, and never go back again!"

Gayhart was too surprised to attempt an answer. Evidently she expected or wished none, and scarcely realized what she had said. She shivered soon, drew a fleecy white shawl about her shoulders, and requested Arthur to row ashore.

As Gayhart took the oars to bring the boat safely to the steps, he took advantage of the half-light to look critically at this woman's slight figure and half-averted face.

"She is very lovesome," he said to himself. "May I not love her?"

Suddenly she leaned forward and grasped Arthur's arm.

"There is some one waiting on the bank. Do you see who it is?"

"It is Dave. No, it is Jake," answered Arthur. The men were evidently brothers, and looked much alike. Mrs. Lorne rose hastily as the boat touched the bank. In the half-darkness she stumbled, and Gayhart, catching her in his arms, thrilled with the contact of her sweet person and magnetism. Apparently heedless that she had fallen, and that he had caught her, she sprang ashore. Jake, the mysterious attendant at The Lilies, came quickly to her side, and, listening closely to some communication he had to make, she passed with him out of sight.

When Gayhart had fastened the boat he came ashore, leading Arthur, and listening absently to his artless talk. As they emerged from the trees they observed lights moving rapidly through a wing of the mansion, where they were generally stationary and inconspicuous. It occurred to him that something unusual had happened, and, fearing some disaster, he quickened his pace.

On reaching the house, Mrs. Lorne was not to be seen; but in the course of half an hour she came quietly into the parlor and sat down to the piano. A white ribbon which bound her hair seemed to make her face white, too.

"Are you sick, mamma?" asked Arthur.

"I am very chilly. I think we were too long on the water," she answered, and began playing quietly, though she did not sing that night.

When Gayhart had gone to his chamber he could not sleep. The weight of that slight form seemed still upon his heart.

"She is rarely sweet and wise. I love her. Why should I not tell her all, and ask her to marry me? Could not her lovely friendliness for me deepen into something warmer?"

The sweet, daring thought prevented his closing his eyes until nearly morning. But the next day Mrs. Lorne was not visible. Only a little lace handkerchief, marked "Genevieve," substituted her graceful presence in the silent parlor. She was confined to her room by an indisposition.

When Gayhart had parted from Arthur that evening he shut himself up in his room, and again gave way to his thoughts. As he sat by the window, he became conscious of distant sounds exceedingly strange—mingled shouting and yelling. He recollected that he had often heard it as he sat there listening; but he had never given the matter any attention. Now his attention was held by the impression that the sounds were within the house, and, as they were unpleasant and intimidating in character, he leaned from the window and located them at the west wing of the house, where he had lately seen the moving lights. It was an entirely unknown part of the house to him; but he knew that it was not occupied by the family, and was not the servants' quarters.

"Some one must be mad or drunk there," he said, to himself, in considerable wonder, which increased until he decided that the male servants must be engaged in orgies unknown to their mistress. Indignant that her kindness should be imposed upon, he decided to investigate the matter on his own responsibility in the morning. But the following day no opportunity occurred, and to his surprise he again, on listening at the window in the evening, heard the hideous sounds which had now grown familiar and were more quickly detected.

But on this evening they were soon discontinued. The moonlight faded; all was soon dark and silent.

During the night a chilly Fall storm set in which continued for several days. But to a man of Gayhart's quiet tastes the confinement was not irksome. Arthur's lessons were given during the early part of the day. During the afternoon and evening Mrs. Lorne, in the most gracious and charming mood, gave him her company. As they sat together around the light blaze behind the network of the brass fenders, Gayhart chatting of his travels, or lunched impromptu, or closed an evening by singing in company, no wonder the sweetness and peace of these home comforts determined Gayhart to make an effort to secure them forever.

One evening Arthur having a headache had gone up-stairs with his nurse. Gayhart was alone in the parlor, looking absently from the window out upon the hardy lilies which had survived the storm. Mrs. Lorne entered, more than usually gentle and sweet.

"I am afraid you are getting homesick, Mr. Gayhart. What can I do to make the evening pass pleasantly to you?"

He turned and led her to a seat.

"Listen to me," he said.

Then he told her all. That he was in no sense a poor or dependent man, and that he loved her.

"Love me—love me!" she repeated, half-starting up, a flush staining her face, then leaving her very pale. "What can you mean? Do you not know——"

He stood looking at her in wonder, unable to account for her extreme agitation. She rose and stood before him.

"How you have misunderstood me!" she cried. "I have tried to please you, to win your esteem and regard; but—but do you not know that I have a husband under this roof a raving maniac?"

"Good heavens!"

The words broke in a low, involuntary cry from Gayhart, who in turn stood trembling before her.

"You did not know?" she asked. "I thought you must have learned long before this from the servants."

"I never gossip with servants," Gayhart said, scarcely knowing that he spoke.

She sank into her seat with such a look of trouble and despair that he was recalled from his tumult of emotion. She, in turn, looking up, saw his extreme pain and pallor.

"Surely I have not been to blame, Mr. Gayhart. Believe me, I never once thought it possible that you could think of this," she said. "I live only for Arthur. I never think of myself. And I have long been a wife. How could I dream——"

He started to see that she was bitterly crying.

"Oh, do not," he pleaded. "Genevieve—let me call you so once—I would not give you a moment's pain."

"Let me weep," she answered. "It is so seldom that I can shed tears." But her streaming eyes wrung his heart.

"Forgive me. I will go away and never trouble you again," he said.

"Yes; you must go away," she answered. "But let me tell you first my story. At sixteen I was a timid, yielding girl, entirely controlled by my mother. She made my marriage for me with Mordaunt Lorne, a fierce, high-tempered, tyrannical man, twice my years, and very wealthy. He simply married me; I never had any rights as his wife. When he was good-natured he called me Pussy, and I had no more influence or authority in his household than if I had been the kitten upon the rug. I never loved him, and he soon made me unhappy by his unkindness. Soon he would leave me for months and months together—I having no knowledge of where he was. I had a vague notion that he gambled, drank, wasted money, even then. My mother died and my child was born while he was absent. When Arthur was two months old he saw him for the first time, and seemed pleased, was a little kinder to me for a brief time. He remained at home a few months, but acted strangely, ordered unnecessary outbuildings erected, removed valuable trees and hedges. The family physician warned me that there was insanity in the Lorne family, and he considered his mind affected. Finally he went away, was absent a few days, and came back a raving maniac—struck at me, abused the servants, would have killed the child. The male servants restrained him, generally considering him under the influence of liquor. But the physician, declaring that the malady of his race had been brought upon him by the excesses in which he had indulged, ordered him closely and permanently confined. The doctor was right. My husband has never in the slightest degree recovered his mind. He is either sullen and silent, apparently uncomprehending, or, on moonlight nights, raving crazy. His shouts and maledictions so frequently fill the midnight air that I never invite visitors to The Lilies; though as much as possible he is restrained by his attendants, Jake and Dave, and the room in which he is confined is situated in the remote west wing of the house. Sometimes he makes a great deal of mischief, destroying clothing and furniture. On the night we came from boating last, Jake came to tell me that he had broken down a door which communicated with the hall, and that he would be obliged to keep him confined to his bed until the necessary repairs could be made. But for the physical strength and faithfulness of those men, this house would be destroyed and every inmate driven off. Nor would man, woman or child, encountering him, be safe. He is a being utterly destructive and brutal, and—he is my husband."

She rose then, and walked back and forth across the room.

If for a moment he were tempted to remain near her, to watch over her, to bless himself with the daily sight of her, the desolation of his look, as she stood in her robe of glistening silk upon the velvet carpet, forbade the possibility of his bringing upon her any further woe. But he came close to her side, with a look of love there was no mistaking, and gently raised her hands to his lips.

"Genevieve, you are not sorry that I love you?"

"I am sorry to give you pain, because you must see how utterly hopeless your loving me is," she answered, leaning wearily against a chair for support.

"Genevieve, I am going away. To-morrow we shall be parted probably for ever. Tell me this, if you had been free would you have married me?"

"Yes," she said, simply.

He looked once into her pure eyes, turned and left the room.

* * * * * *

Out of a dream of pain, Henry Gayhart started, battling with a strange oppression which made him strive for breath. The chamber was full of smoke. The room, the house was on fire!

Springing up, he opened the door upon a sheet of flame. Closing it, he hurriedly dressed, secured his valuables, and let himself lightly to the ground by the trellis which covered the window. Seeking an entrance again to the house, some of the servants rushed against him.

"The master has set the house on fire! It's all going! Nothing can save it!" they shouted.

Then he met Genevieve Lorne and Arthur coming out. Dave grasped her shoulder.

"The good Lord save us, Mrs. Lorne! We can't get him out!"

Slowly her eyes dilated with horror as she looked up at the man. Gayhart understood.

"Come back with me. Which way?" he said.

Dave plunged again into the smoke, and led the way to the west wing. Insane laughter and shouts greeted them. A horrible creature, with bloodshot eyes, turned threateningly as they stepped into the room. Before the madman could be made aware of his purpose, Gayhart, with the single, low word of "Quick" to the attendant, had thrown himself upon the prisoner, and threw him, face downwards, upon the ground. The men tried to secure his hands at the back, but the rope slipping, the chance was lost. Writhing from beneath Gayhart, Lorne raised a hand to the windowsill near which he lay, and, dragging himself up, suddenly forced himself from Gayhart's hold and went headlong out.

"Lord!" breathed Jake. "It's twenty feet to the ground!"

With a sickening feeling, Gayhart turned from the room. When he reached the lawn below the window of the west wing, the servants were lifting up a motionless body.

"Quite dead!" they said.

Gayhart went down the avenue and found Genevieve and Arthur sitting upon one of the rustic benches.

"Is he out?" she asked, anxiously.

He nodded.

Sitting beside her, he watched the beautiful mansion of The Lilies, the scene of her sorrow, burn to the ground. As the last wall fell she burst into tears.

"Where shall I go now?" she sobbed.

"With me—to joy and happiness. For, oh, Genevieve, you are free! He is dead!" Gayhart said.

She trembled, and fell fainting.

Wrapped from the chill night-air, he bore her, in a close carriage, citywards. Arthur and his nurse accompanied them. And for weeks Genevieve Lorne lay very ill, but luxuriously cared for, at a hotel.

The fire had been set by the madman himself, cunningly contrived with odds and ends, which he had secreted from his attendants, highly inflammable. As soon as ignited the case was almost hopeless, for the west wing was not supplied with water, and the open doors fanned the flames very soon to a furious height. No sufficient alarm could be given to the town, which was four miles distant, and so the mansion of The Lilies was lost.

When Gayhart erected another and even more beautiful home for his wife, he desired to know if she wished it in that beauteous garden of lilies. But she silently shook her head. Every tree and shrub, every turn of the grounds and glimmer of water, was associated with the sorrows of her wronged and blighted youth. So Gayhart bore his bride away to a home by the sea, where the bright waves, with their myriad voices, called sweet promises of peace and happiness which time fulfilled.

POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

General Winfield Scott Hancock.

THERE are very many Democrats who believe that their party could not nominate a stronger candidate for President than General Winfield Scott Hancock, the ranking Major-General of the Army. He possesses the advantages of undoubted ability, of a conspicuously distinguished record, and almost unbounded popularity wherever he is known. He is prudent, sincere, conservative and inflexible in his loyalty to principles approved by his judgment. In any position to which he might be called he would do his whole duty.

General Hancock is a native of Pennsylvania, having been born in Montgomery County, in that State, on the 14th of February, 1824. He graduated at West Point in 1844, and served mainly on frontier duty until 1846, and afterwards in the war with Mexico, being brevetted as first lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco. From 1848 to 1855 he was again employed in frontier duty, and from 1855 to 1861 was quartermaster of the southern district of California. In August of the latter year he was recalled to Washington, and when the Army of the Potomac was transferred to the Peninsula in 1862, he was already a brigadier-general, with the appropriate command, in the Fourth Corps. His first opportunity to make a mark occurred at Williamsburg, and he made a brilliant one. He next distinguished himself in the Battle of Fraser's Farm, and subsequently took an active part in the campaign in Maryland, at the battles of South Mountain and Antietam. Being made a major-general, he commanded a division at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. At Gettysburg he did magnificent work. On the first day of the battle, July 1st, 1863, he was sent by General Meade to decide whether a decisive battle should be given, or whether the army should fall back. He reported that Gettysburg was the place to fight, and took immediate command until the arrival of Meade. In the decisive action of July 3d he commanded on the left centre, sustaining the terrific onset of Longstreet's Confederates, and being severely wounded. The thanks of Congress were formally tendered him for his conduct in these engagements. Being disabled by his wounds, he was on sick leave until March, 1864, being meanwhile engaged in recruiting the Second Army Corps, which was placed under his command. At the opening of the campaign of that year under General Grant, he took the active command of this corps, and bore a prominent part in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court House and North Anna, the second battle of Cold Harbor, and the operations around Petersburg, until June 19th, when, his wound breaking out afresh, he was for a short time on sick leave. He afterwards resumed command, and participated in several actions, until November 26th, when he was called to Washington to organize the first corps of veterans.

The name of every great battle in the East is inscribed on Hancock's flags. After the close of the war he was placed successively in command of the Middle Department, the Department of Missouri, of Louisiana and Texas, of Dakota, and of the Department of the East. He has his headquarters on Governor's Island. In the Democratic National Convention of 1868 he received 144½ votes for the Presidential nomination. In 1876, in the National Convention of the same party, he received 75 votes for the same nomination. He is now supported by the Democrats of Pennsylvania, Texas and some Eastern States, and will be strongly urged in the Cincinnati Convention next month.

General Hancock has uniformly maintained the doctrine that the military power should in time of peace be subordinated to the civil law. This was particularly shown in his address to the court of inquiry constituted to try General Babcock, in 1875, in which he urged that that officer having been formally indicted at St. Louis, it was right and proper that the military inquiry should be adjourned in order that the ordinary civil processes might take their course—which suggestion was duly adopted. In 1868, while in command of the Fifth Military District, General Hancock, in a letter to Governor Pease, said: "On them (the laws of Texas and Louisiana), as on a foundation of rock, reposes almost the entire structure of social order in these two States. Annul this code of laws, and there would be no longer any rights, either of persons or property, here. I say, unhesitatingly, if it were possible that Congress should pass an act abolishing the local codes for Louisiana and Texas, which I do not believe, and it should fall to my lot to supply their places with something of my own, I do not see how I could do better than follow the laws in force here prior to the rebellion, excepting wherein they shall relate to slavery. Power may destroy the forms, but not the principles, of justice; these will live in spite even of the sword."

General Hancock is a man of handsome presence and most agreeable manners. He is perfectly straight; a blonde, with a rich skin and blue eyes, and light hair, now turning gray; and his address is both courtly and simple.

General Hancock, while a citizen of Pennsylvania, is in almost all respects of fellowship and association a New Yorker. He is on excellent terms with the leading volunteer officers of the New York Militia, and co-operates with them in their parades, shooting-matches, etc. He is a favored guest at the houses of some of the best people in New York, but makes no pretension to wealth or style. The regard of his men for him is boundless. While he would, perhaps, draw as many votes in New York as any Democrat, he would poll an immense vote in Pennsylvania, for he is not repugnant to the good sense and feeling of the Republican soldiery, having never stepped out of the course of conviction to recommend himself to one party or the other. As to the imputation that he hanged Mrs. Surratt, it will be of no effect except among the most ignorant and unreasoning. When the Commander-in-chief of the Military and Naval Forces had been assassinated by persons living within the military lines of the United States, it would scarcely have been a gallant example for General Hancock to have pulled off his sword in deference to such objects, instead of carrying out the orders of the Tribunal, imposed on him by his oath and by President Johnson.

Our picture of General Hancock is from a photograph by F. Gutekunst, of Philadelphia.

A MAY-DAY RIOT IN PATERSON.

THE annual greeting to the rising sun by the German singing societies at Paterson, N. J., on the first Sunday of May, was this year accompanied by a riotous demonstration of the gravest character. About five o'clock in the morning the societies formed in procession and marched, accompanied by a large crowd, to Garret Rock, where for many years they have assembled to celebrate this festival. The societies present were the Germania, Arion, Double Quartet, Schillerbund Quartet Club, Gruetli Maennerchor, Lasalle Maennerchor and Wohlrab's orchestral band. Garret Rock is a large plateau on the summit of Garret Mountain, and is situated south of the business part of the city and within its limits. It slopes up sharply from the city streets, but the other side is as steep as the front of the Palisades. Forming a line along the edge of this precipice, the singers, many of whom wore garlands of flowers, sang their opening chorus to the rising sun. There were then nearly two thousand persons present.

While the people of Paterson were on their way to the rock one party of about a dozen persons endeavored to take a short course to the park by crossing a pasture which was leased this year by William Dalzell, a butcher and grocer in Paterson, who occupies a little farm of which this field is a part. He had been heard to swear that nobody should cross this field at the time of the May-day Festival, and he went out in the morning armed with a shotgun, with the avowed intention of resisting any trespass upon his land. While the singers were occupied with their choruses the little party just referred to approached this field for the purpose of crossing it. This was about eight o'clock. One of the party, a young man named Joseph Van Houten, nineteen years of age, and a stepson of ex-Alderman Swift, came up to the fence and lifted a little girl over it. Then he stepped over himself, and the rest were following, when a son of Dalzell's ran up and ordered them to go back. The result was a struggle between the two young men, and both fell to the ground together. Dalzell the elder then appeared on the scene, and he shot Van Houten in the abdomen as he rose from the ground. In a few seconds he was dead.

The two Dalzells, seeing a crowd of people hurrying down the mountain, retreated to a barn where a constable arrested the murderer; but before he could get him from the building the mob, for such the crowd had then become, began storming the building and crying for the murderer to lynch him. Dalzell fired deliberately into the crowd, wounding a little boy and a girl. At this the crowd set fire to the barn, and the murderer and his son rushed from the building to the dwelling, and took refuge in the attic. Officers arrested both father and son, but the mob set fire to this building also, and, driven out by the flames and smoke, the officers, with their prisoners, sought safety in a house some two hundred yards away. This building was quickly surrounded, and the storming with stones resumed.

Various officers of the city government attempted to quell the riot, but without success. At length Father McNulty was induced to address the crowd, and, while he did so from the seat of a coach, the murderer, with a guard, was thrust into the vehicle, and, with the priest sitting beside the driver, the horses were whipped into a gallop, while the mob followed, pelting the coach with stones. Driving towards the jail, the officers had the coach turn a corner suddenly, where a second vehicle was in waiting, and, thrusting the prisoner into this, he was driven to Newark, while the first driver went direct to the jail. It was by this strategy that Dalzell escaped with his life. He remained in one of the station-houses at Newark until the following day, when he was driven in a roundabout way to Paterson and locked up.

Rumors that a riot was in progress in Paterson beyond the control of the authorities reached Jersey City and Newark, and Governor McClellan ordered General Plume to get troops in readiness to go to the city if desired. A special train was made up in Jersey City, where one regiment was under arms all day, but later dispatches showed there was no need of their extreme services.

At the funeral of young Van Houten all the singing societies which had greeted the rising sun turned out in a procession and sang at his grave.

British Decorations.

THERE are now in existence seven British Orders available for the sterner sex, both civil and military—namely, the Garter, the Bath, the Thistle, the St. Patrick, the Michael and George, the Star of India and the Indian Empire; and to these we may add the Guelphic Hanoverian Order. For the softer sex there are the English Maids of Honor, the Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India and the St. Katharine for nurses—the last named, by-the-way, being jet black, a color which we should have thought more suggestive than appropriate in a hospital. Of purely military decorations awarded for various campaigns or wars there are fifteen—namely, the military war medals for services between 1793 and 1814, the gold medal and the gold cross for certain battles in the Peninsular war, and the following medals—The Waterloo, the South Africa (three wars, exclusive of the Zulu war), the China (three wars), the Afghan, Scinde and Gwalior; the Sutlej, the New Zealand (three wars), the Punjab, the Indian or Frontier medal (which includes one Persian, three Burmese and endless little wars, such as the Umbeyla, Hazara, Looshai, Jowaki and Perak campaigns), the Crimean, the Mutiny, the Abyssinian and the Ashantee medals.

In addition to the above there are various military decorations for exceptional or gallant services, such as the Order of British India for native officers, the Indian Order of Merit for native soldiers, the Long Service and Good Conduct medal, the Distinguished Service medal, the Victoria Cross, the Empress of India Commemoration medals and the Best Shot of the Army medal. There are also eight different decorations awarded at various times by foreign potentates, such as the Legion of Honor and the Turkish and Sardinian medals. Of purely naval decorations there are eight—namely, the Naval War medal, 1793 to 1840; the Naval Gold Medal, 1794 to 1815, for superior officers; the Arctic Discoveries, the Good Conduct, the Baltic, the Conspicuous Gallantry, the Arctic medal, 1818-55, and the Victoria Cross, which in the navy is suspended by a blue ribbon, whereas red is worn by the army. Wherever the land and sea forces co-operated, as in the Crimea, China, etc., the navy received a medal similar to that awarded to the army. Lastly, there are sundry medals open to all classes, such as the Royal Humane Society, the Royal Lifeboat Institution, the Shipwrecked Mariners, the Tayleur medal for saving life at sea, the Albert medal for saving life by land and by sea (two classes), and the St. John Ambulance Order.

Semi-centenarian Officeholders.

THE eldest officer in the Government service is a venerable gentleman of Tompkins County, New York—Roswell Beardsley—who was appointed postmaster at North Lansing in that State on June 28th, 1828, during the Administration of John Quincy Adams, and John McLean, of Ohio, was Postmaster-General. This ancient official has been in active service ever since, and the returns of his postal accounts to-day indicate vigorous health and a close attention to business.

William Hunter of Rhode Island, second assistant secretary of state, was appointed a clerk in that department, May 22d, 1829, by Martin Van Buren, then Secretary of State, and has passed through all those intermediate positions and administrations since that period.

On December 14th, 1830, Edward Stabler was appointed postmaster at Sandy Springs, Montgomery County, Md., by Postmaster-General W. T. Barry, of Kentucky. In a recent letter, Mr. Stabler says that he is still enjoying vigorous health, and during the past Winter was able to indulge in his favorite sport of deer-hunting.

The oldest official in the legislative branch of the Government is Captain Isaac Bassett, of Massachusetts, who was appointed a page in the Senate by Daniel Webster in 1831, Mr. Webster then being a Senator from that State. Captain Bassett is now the doorkeeper of the Senate, and occupies confidential relations with that body, both among Democrats and Republicans, and possesses a vast fund of interesting reminiscences of the great Senators of the past half-century, and of the exciting scenes and debates in that body. Captain Bassett is preparing a book covering the recollections of his connection with the Senate for fifty years.

In the Post Office Department, James H. Marr entered the service, June 1st, 1831, by appointment from Postmaster-General Barry, and from clerk in charge of the letter-book, at a salary of $600 per annum, has risen to the position of chief clerk to the first assistant postmaster-general.

Next to these veterans in official longevity is Daniel B. Grim, postmaster at Grimville, Berks County, Pennsylvania, who was appointed in 1834 by Amos Kendall; and John Woodbridge, postmaster of North Edgecomb, Me., who was appointed by Mr. Kendall in 1839.

The French Transport, the "Tonquin."

This new addition to the French navy has been specially constructed for the conveyance of troops, invalids and material of war between France and the French colony at Cochin China. She was launched on the 14th of October, 1879. The Tonquin is in reality a very large packet boat, and is designed to perform her long journeys with exceptional speed. She is fitted with twin screw propellers, which are driven by engines of 2,600 nominal horse power. This steam power is supplemented by her canvas, as she is fully rigged as a frigate, and can be worked either as a sailing vessel, a steamer, or sail and steam together. The internal arrangements of the Tonquin allow for the conveyance of from 1,500 to 2,000 men. The large dimensions of the Tonquin in her breadth of beam and depth have enabled her constructors to fit up large and comfortable cabins for the officers, and extensive dormitories or barracks destined for the soldiers and sailors, and, above all, ample accommodation for the hospital.

Compressed Air Employed in Surgical Operations, St. Louis Hospital, Paris.

Paul Bert, whose researches as to the tension and pressure of gas obtained the great prize some years since, has made a discovery which is likely to prove of great value. Laughing gas has its dangers, producing not only insensibility but asphyxia. A mixture of oxygen deprives it of both powers. Mr. Bert has discovered that by subjecting the mixture to atmospheric pressure it regains its anæsthetic power, free from all danger of asphyxia. Successful experiments on animals in the physiological laboratory of the Sorbonne establish the value of his discovery. Dr. Peau and other surgeons have since tested it fully and find that this new anæsthetic is harmless, brief in its effects, and does not disorder the stomach. A large pneumatic bell that will hold fifty or twenty persons is used; an indiarubber bag containing the mixture is placed under the operating bed. The pressure is produced by pumps and the force regulated by a key. Our illustration shows experiments in the court of St. Louis Hospital.

The Relief Squadron off the West Coast of Ireland.

The officers and crews of the vessels composing the Relief Squadron had already been diligently engaged in distributing seed potatoes, and in visiting the numerous islands which stud the coasts of Mayo and Galway, when Rear-Admiral His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, who was making his official tour round the coast inspecting coastguards, offered his services, which were gladly accepted. The Duke of Edinburgh did a great deal of the visiting himself. One sketch shows him sitting down in one of the cottages interrogating the inmates and distributing tickets which, upon presentation on board the Lively, were exchanged for blankets or articles of clothing. The other sketch shows His Royal Highness, who here appears in uniform, distributing the gifts.

H. M. S. "Atalanta."

The Atalanta was built at Pembroke in 1844, and, after service as a man-of-war, was used as a water-police hulk in Portsmouth Harbor till 1877, when the police went into barracks. After the foundering of the Eurydice she was converted at Pembroke into a training-ship, and to increase her stability her masts and some of her spars were shortened. On the 7th of November last the Atalanta, with 300 young seamen on board, sailed from Portsmouth for the West Indies on her third cruise of instruction, with orders to return home about April 4th. In consequence of two cases of yellow fever occurring on board, Captain Stirling determined at once to proceed to Bermuda, where he arrived on January 29th, and left on the 31st for England. The crew were then in good health. No tidings of the Atalanta have been received since that date; consequently, uneasiness has gradually changed to alarm, and alarm, it may be almost said, to despair, especially as fierce gales prevailed in the Atlantic at that time.

The Railroad up Mount Vesuvius.

To climb Vesuvius travelers had to start from Resina west of the volcano and not far from the Portici station on the Salerno Railroad, or from Pompeii and Torre dell' Annunziata on the southeast. But now the former will alone be taken, as a railroad is just completed up the great cone of the mountain. Tourists will now take the carriage-road from Resina to the Hermitage of San Salvatore and the Observatory, but instead of getting out of the vehicles as formerly, continue, by a new road, to the foot of the cone. Then the inclined railroad is taken, and the cars are drawn up in eight minutes by ropes to the summit of Vesuvius, a great improvement over the old system of being carried in litters. At the railroad station are a convenient café and restaurant, a cistern to supply the stationary engine with water, and a house for the railroad people. The road is about 900 yards in length, and ascends at an angle of fifty degrees. The rails are laid on a heavy plank bed, and, for greater safety, two cables are used. The plan is that of Engineer Olivieri.

The King of Spain Washing the Feet of Poor Men on Maundy Thursday.

The injunction of Christ to His disciples to follow the example He gave them after the Last Supper is followed out in the ritual of the Catholic Church on Maundy Thursday, and was at one time followed by all the kings and princes of Europe. The custom is still maintained in Austria, Belgium, Bavaria, Spain and Portugal, the only countries in Europe now where prince and people alike adhere to the old faith. Our picture will give an idea of the ceremony as performed in the royal palace at Madrid.

—THE Sunday-school system was organized in England in 1780, by Robert Raikes, of Gloucester, and the Foreign Sunday-school Association of New York held a meeting in Madison Square Presbyterian Church on May 5th to celebrate the past century of Sunday-school work, and to take measures for its wider extension.

—FROM the statement of the New York City debt issued by the Comptroller May 1st, it appears that the total amount is $136,693,350.66 less $33,489,957.74 in the sinking fund, leaving the net debt $103,143,592.92. Bonds to the amount of $7,929,950 have been issued since the beginning of the year.

—IN Great Britain last year $3,000,000 was contributed by private donors for church education. Three hundred and seventy-eight new church schools were opened and there was an addition of 53,472 to the number of children in average attendance. —THE Persians are actively competing with the Indian Government for the opium supply to China. Seven thousand chests have been embarked from the Gulf ports during the last season. The manufacture in Shiraz, Yezd and Ispahan has been steadily increasing, and great care is being exercised to maintain a high quality. It is expected that the season from May to April 1880 will supply 10,000 chests.

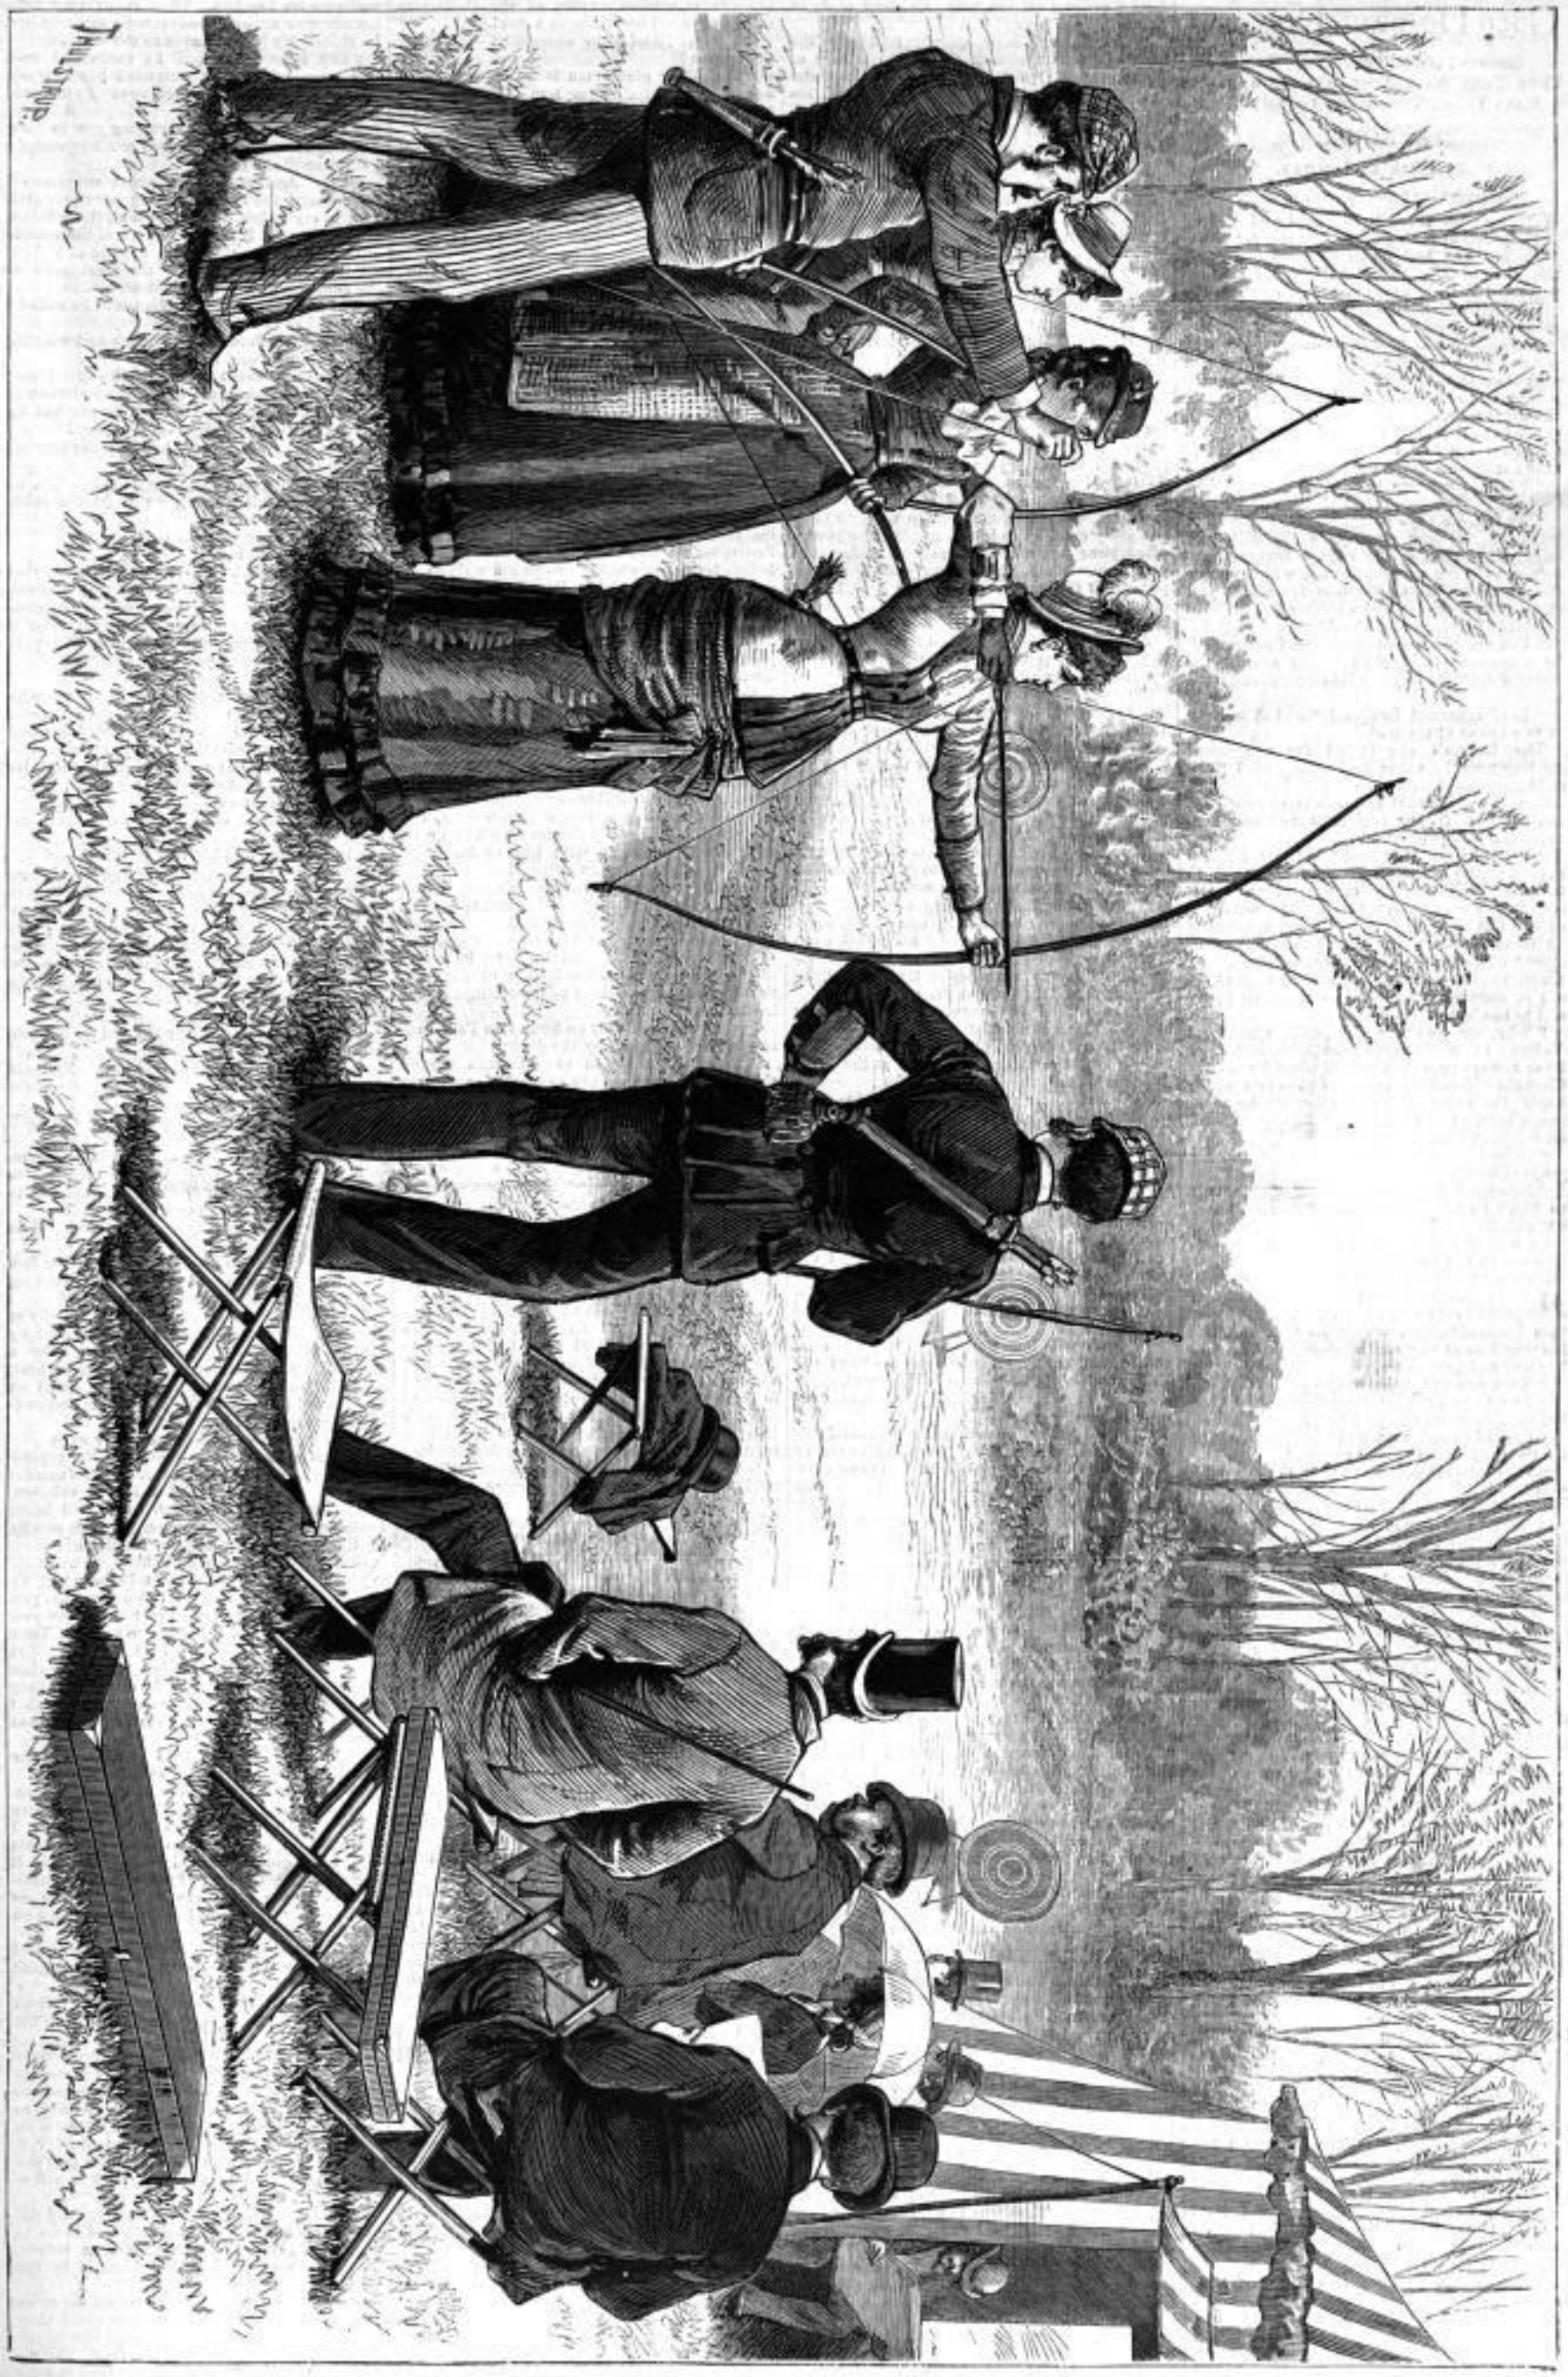
—GERMANY continues to fortify herself on her eastern frontier. Not content with strategic railways and intrenched camps, she is building forts around the largest fortresses. For instance, in the present year around Königsberg, in Prussia Proper, ten forts will be completed; and an eleventh at Neuendorf will be begun. Three are already in working order, and thus the whole system of defense against an attack from Russia will be strengthened.

—THE Standard, of London, in an editorial article admits the truth of the rumors for some time current that a glaring discrepancy exists between the financial results actually realized in India and those promised in the budget statements published in February. The difference is variously estimated at from £3,000,000 to £5,000,000, originating in the fact that the financial member of the Viceroy's council grossly under-estimated the expenses of the Afghan war.

—LORD MAYOR GRAY, in presenting the freedom of the City of Dublin to Captain Potter, of the United States ship Constellation on May 4th, said it was an honor of which the corporation was jealous, and that only three names had preceded that of Captain Potter upon the Burgesses' Roll, the first being that of the late Dr. Isaac Butt, the next Mr. Gladstone, and the third ex-President Grant. The certificate of freedom was inclosed in a casket of bog-wood and oak elaborately carved and adorned with Irish emblems.

—THE Pine Tree State is prosperous, for the Maine Valuation Commission reports that the present valuation of the State is about $228,433,592, against $224,811,400, in 1870, when a dollar represented no more than 85 cents does now. An unlooked for increase of population is claimed on the strength of an increase of the poll list in every county. The railroad companies of the State are assessed $55,250 on property valued at $5,525,000, and the telegraph companies are asked to pay a tax of $3,875 on a valuation of $235,000.



—A STONE from the tomb of Napoleon the First at St. Helena, intended for the Washington Monument, was presented to the Washington Monument Society with the appropriate documents at its regular meeting at the Federal capital on May 7th. It was only recently found after it had been lost sight of for nineteen years. When our naval vessels were ordered home from foreign waters at the opening of the civil war in 1861, the man-of-war Mystic, in sailing from the East Indies, stopped at St. Helena, and some one proposed bringing home a stone for the Washington Monument from Napoleon's tomb, which was done. The stone was landed at the Brooklyn Navy Yard and then forgotten. Recently Admiral Powell began making inquiries, and it was found stowed away at the Washington Navy Yard, and is reported by Commodore Fabiger to be in good condition.

GOLD DUST AND DIAMONDS.

SHOWING HOW THEY WERE FOUND, HOW THEY WERE LOST, AND HOW, AFTER MANY YEARS, THEY WERE FOUND AGAIN.

A NOVEL.

BY CHARLES DIMITRY.

CHAPTER XVIII.—THE PISTOL SHOT.

FOR a few seconds Reginald and Vellani gazed at each other in silence, for if the one had had no expectation of finding the other in the old church, the other had entertained as little expectation of meeting the apparition which now stared at him gloomily from the doorway.

The silence was broken by Reginald.

"So," he said, slowly, laying the valise and pick at his feet, "you are here, Signor Vellani?"

"As you see," said the Italian, replying in the same tone.

"What brings you here?"

Vellani laughed slightly, but with a saturnine expression of countenance.

"What brings you here, Signor Grey?" he said.

"My mission here is legitimate. Yours is an intrusion. If you come to seek, with any hopes of obtaining, the buried treasure referred to in the old manuscript, which you or the Marchesa di Lupo stole from me, you come as an intruder and a robber."

Vellani shrugged his shoulders.

"You are beforehand with me, I perceive," he remarked, leaning carelessly against the cedar-wood doorway. "Have you found the box?"

"Yes," returned Reginald, "and it is here in this valise at my feet."

The Italian's eye rested for a moment longingly on the valise, and as he gazed, Reginald inspected him more closely. In the glance Reginald noticed that Vellani's right arm hung limp and apparently useless at his side. Perceiving this, Reginald said:

"You are scarcely in a condition, sir, if I may judge by the appearance of your arm, to make an issue on this matter. I need not assure you, when you recall the circumstances of our last meeting, and when you remember by what fraud and insolence you became possessed of the secret that was mine alone, that I can regard your presence here only as an act of dishonesty which I am prepared to resist to the last extremity."

"Why, sir, you surprise me!" ejaculated Vellani, in well-feigned astonishment. "I have always regarded myself, since I read the Chevalier Deville's manuscript—you see I know the name of the writer—as being as much entitled to the treasure, if any existed, as any man living."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Reginald. "And for what reason?"

"Because it belongs to no one living, except to him who may have obtained knowledge of its existence. In that view, I have always been willing to admit that you, as one of the sharers in the secret, possessed equal rights with myself to the possession of the treasure."

"You flatter yourself, then, with the idea of a division?" said Reginald, endeavoring to retain his self-control which, he felt, was fast leaving him at the cool audacity of Vellani's bearing and proposition.

"Since you put it that way—yes."

"And do you think me capable of considering for a moment so absurd a proposition?"

"Absurd or not, that is the proposition that I have the honor to make to you."

"That I divide the contents of the box with you?"

"Precisely. To make the matter clearer to you, when I first read the manuscript which, by chance the Marchesa di Lupo had carried away with her—" Reginald smiled incredulously—"I understood very well that one man had as much right as another to the treasure of which it makes mention. Therefore, supposing that you might take steps to begin a search for it, I resolved to endeavor to discover the missing clews and to act on them if I could obtain them."

"Well," said Reginald, as Vellani paused for a moment.

"After you and your friend, Mr. Waring, left Milan, I went, as soon as the wound in my arm permitted, to Madrid, with a copy of the manuscript that I had made. Assisted by friends in that city, I searched the old archives of the former American colonies of Spain, and before two days had elapsed, I was in possession of all the facts and rumors in the case of the career and arrest in Mexico of the French Chevalier St. Evremond Deville."

"Your industry is to be commended, Signor Vellani!" exclaimed Reginald, with a sarcastic smile, which seemed to be lost on the Italian.

"Among the names of those connected with the massacres of 1680—a full account of which I found in the archives—was that of Fra Pablo, the Franciscan, who perished while endeavoring to escape from his church of the pueblo of Pecos—this very church, Mr. Grey—in company with the Chevalier Deville. The mention of the fort of San Juan del Ulua, at Vera Cruz, as the place of M. Deville's imprisonment satisfied me that I was on the right track."

"Your story, sir, is very interesting. What did you do next?"

"You are easily pleased—what did I do next? I familiarized myself, by reading from the best authorities, with the past and present condition of the pueblos of the Rio Grande Valley, the region chiefly exposed to the fury of the Indians in 1680, and I gained all the necessary knowledge that enabled me to come here to this spot, direct from Madrid. I arrived in New York ten days ago—almost on your heels—and this forenoon I reached San José from Pueblo—I heard of you on the way, sir—and now, as you see, I am here!"

"To return, I hope, quietly, and with the satisfaction of knowing that the treasure of St. Evremond Deville is discovered at last, and is in the hands of him to whom it of right belongs!"

"To demand of you, since you are here before me, my share of the spoils, Mr. Grey."

"The spoils, eh! And when I tell you that for more than one reason I absolutely refuse to entertain any proposition from you, what then?"

"Then, sir, you will only enjoy this treasure when you shall have earned it at the sacrifice of my life!

"Are you so desperate as that?"

"I am. Will you consent to divide with me?"

"No."

"Will you give me a third of the contents of the box?"

"No; not a third."

"One-fourth?"

"You have already had my answer. You make a mistake in threatening me, Signor Vellani! Had you come, even on this quest, prepared to ask my pardon and that of Mr. Melchior Waring, for your ungentlemanly and cowardly conduct to both of us, or, rather, your ungentlemanly conduct to me and your cowardly conduct to him, I might have recognized your penitence and regrets and repaid you somewhat for your long journeys in the pursuit of this treasure. But, as it is, I must end this interview, for I propose to take my departure."

As he spoke Vellani moved from the side of the doorway swiftly, and planted himself squarely in the middle of the entrance. Then Reginald perceived for the first time that Vellani's right hand, which Reginald had deemed, a moment before, helpless, held a pistol.

With one foot on his valise, Reginald thrust his hand in his belt and drew thence his revolver. He was in good time, for as he cocked the weapon, even while drawing it, Vellani, with a frantic desperation that admitted of no delay, leveled his pistol and fired.

It needed only this to exasperate Reginald to a pitch of anger which, up to this moment, he had not been able to feel against the miserable man before him; but, being conscious that Vellani's purpose was simply one of assassination, he turned the muzzle of his pistol, even while the revolver was still at his side, towards his enemy, standing in the full light of the portal, and discharged the weapon.

As he pulled the trigger, another report sounded in his ear, and the puff of smoke that arose from where Vellani stood, made him aware that the Italian had fired at the same moment.

For a second or two Reginald held his weapon irresolutely in his hand, doubting whether to fire again; but as the smoke from the other's pistol floated away into the peaceful atmosphere without, he saw, with a start that he could not repress, his wretched antagonist clutching feebly at the side of the doorway, as, with head bent, he gradually sank to the earth. The passion by which Reginald had been controlled when he had discharged the pistol passed away at this spectacle, and, forgetful of the evil conduct of the Italian, he hastened towards him to learn the extent of his injury.

Vellani's pale face was turned towards him, and from a wound in the side of his head the blood was slowly dripping to the ground.

His eyes were closed, but he was conscious.

Reginald bound his handkerchief around Vellani's forehead, and then, drawing him out of the sun into the building, placed him in an easy position, and went to where his valise was lying and took thence a canteen of water.

With this he returned to Vellani, who, after he had drunk from it, opened his eyes and fixed them on him.

"You alone are responsible for this," said Reginald. "I would have avoided it."

Vellani muttered a few unintelligible words in Italian and nodded his head once or twice.

Reginald surmised, from the fact that his mind seemed to be clear enough to comprehend what was said to him, that the bullet had not penetrated the skull into the brain.

Hoping that this might prove to be the case—for his was not a nature to desire the death of even so malicious an enemy as Vellani had shown himself to be—he said, as he bent over him:

"Can you see clearly, and do you understand what I say to you?"

Again the Italian nodded, as if in answer to the question; and Reginald continued:

"Be patient for a little while. I will summon assistance and endeavor to obtain a doctor's services. I shall show more regard for your reputation than you did for my life, and I will tell the people that you were wounded in a duel with me. Do you prefer that, or shall I let them know the truth?"

"Let them believe that we have fought a duel," returned Vellani, feebly closing his eyes as if wearied with the effort to keep them open.

Placing the canteen of water at his side, and taking with him his valise, Reginald hastened from the church, mounted his horse, and rode rapidly towards a house which stood a few hundred yards on the other side of the road and about a quarter of a mile from the ruin.

As he reached the road he met a man, evidently a Mexican and a native of the country, riding towards him from the direction of the house. He was dressed gayly in the fashion of the country.

The stranger lifted his hat gracefully as he joined Reginald, whose agitated features probably afforded him a clew to what had happened.

"Pardon, señor," he said, "but I heard pistol shots a few minutes ago. The sounds seemed to proceed from the church."

"You are right," replied Reginald, returning the salutation. "One of the shots was fired by me. I have fought a duel."

"A duel! And your antagonist—the other gentleman?"

"The other gentleman is wounded. Can I ask your hospitality for him—I suppose that is your house yonder? Whatever trouble you may be put to shall be amply recompensed."

"My house is at your command," replied the stranger. "As to recompense, do not mention it again."

"You are very kind. Whom have I the pleasure of addressing?"

"My name is Pedro Guzman, at your service."

"And my name is Reginald Grey. And now, señor, where can I obtain a surgeon?"

"Leave that to me," replied the Mexican. "Let us first take the wounded gentleman to the house."

Together they repaired to the ruin. Vellani had so far recovered his strength as to be able to raise himself from the recumbent position in which Reginald had left him, and, when they entered the inclosure, they found him seated, with his elbows leaning on his knees and holding his head between his hands.

Reginald's first act was to saturate his handkerchief with water and wash the blood from his face. Then, having helped him to his feet, he supported him, aided by Don Pedro, to the Mexican's horse, where he was assisted into the saddle. Reginald walked on one side of him, and Don Pedro on the other, and, in this order, the party moved slowly towards the Mexican's dwelling.

Here Vellani was made as comfortable as possible, while Don Pedro went in search of a doctor who lived in the vicinity.

Reginald, during the absence of the owner of the house, contented himself with sitting on the veranda and awaiting the doctor's arrival. His mind having been relieved on the subject of his late antagonist's condition—for he was satisfied from the Italian's restored strength and general favorable symptoms that the bullet had inflicted merely a flesh wound and that his life was not in danger—he had no inclination to converse with him or hold any further communication with him. Vellani grievously, perhaps fatally wounded, and Vellani only slightly injured, were two very different individuals; for while in the former case he would have felt his sympathy aroused in behalf of his enemy, in the latter he entertained for him the same feeling of aversion that he had felt previous to the attempt on his life in the ruin.

In the course of half an hour Don Pedro returned, accompanied by the doctor.

A brief examination of Vellani's wound showed that, with proper care, no danger was to be apprehended from it. The bullet had glanced from the skull and had plowed its way through the scalp, issuing at the back of the head. This was the report made to Reginald by the doctor when the latter joined him on the veranda.

Reginald expressed his gratification, and offered to defray any expense entailed by the doctor's attendance.

"It is not necessary for you to trouble yourself on that score," replied the doctor. "I have already settled that matter with the gentleman himself. He is an Italian, I perceive."

"Yes, señor," said Reginald, briefly, in a tone which the medical man understood to debar further questioning on the subject of Vellani's identity; and as the doctor appeared to have nothing further to say, he bowed to Reginald, chatted for a minute or two with Don Pedro, and mounted his horse, which trotted off at an easy-going professional gait.

In a conversation that ensued between Reginald and Don Pedro, the former told the latter that he proposed to return to Santa Fé, whence he had come that morning. As to Vellani, he merely explained that, meeting accidentally in the church, they had settled an old quarrel by a recourse to their weapons.

"It is a subject on which I should prefer not to converse, señor," he concluded, "and I am sure that you will permit me to dispense with details."

Don Pedro politely declared that he respected his wishes too much to desire to hear any further on the subject of the rencontre. "But," he added, "since you cannot reach Santa Fé before midnight, if you should set out on your journey this evening, do me the pleasure to remain here until the stage passes to-morrow. In that way you will have company on your return."

Reginald very gladly accepted the invitation as, under the circumstances, it would be more agreeable to have an escort to Santa Fé than to travel thither alone.

Before the coming on of night he left the house and went to the church. He wished to obliterate all evidences of the discovery of the box, so that no curious visitor, seeing the traces of the removed adobe, should be led to make inquiries. Having accomplished this to his satisfaction, he returned to the rancho, on the veranda of which he found Don Pedro awaiting him with the information that Vellani was sleeping soundly and apparently free from pain.

CHAPTER XIX.—MARRIAGE BELLS.

THE next morning, accompanied by his host, Reginald rode down to await the coming of the stage from San José. He had refrained, sedulously, from approaching Vellani's bedside, although had his enemy expressed any wish to see him he would have responded promptly. But as no message came to him, he contented himself with the knowledge—derived from the doctor, who had called during the night—that the patient was progressing favorably.

As the stage drew up he glanced through the open window into the vehicle, and his gaze rested on the face of Manuela. There was no other passenger, and for a moment they looked at each other in silence—she with a smile of welcome on her lips. Then, recovering from his surprise at thus unexpectedly meeting her, he moved his horse nearer to the window.

"You here, Manuela!" he exclaimed, in a low tone, taking her extended hand in his. "What an unexpected pleasure! I am back, you see, from Europe."

"You found my note awaiting you in New York, and you are on your way to Albuquerque, I suppose?" she said.

"Yes. And now for a great surprise. I have found the box of the manuscript. It is here in my valise. Look through the window at that ruin. It is the old church of the pueblo of Pecos. It was there that I found it."

"It seems like a dream," she murmured, as she contemplated the ancient structure.

"Would not you like to visit it?" he asked.

"Yes," she replied.

Leading his horse by the bridle and walking by her side, he said:

"I have a great deal to tell you. I met Melchior in Paris and a duel with Vellani was fought, but it was fought not by me but by Melchior, who, happily, was uninjured."

In a few words he told her of what had occurred in Milan.

"Thank heaven!" she exclaimed, when he had finished his recital, "that this trouble with Vellani is over!"

"It is not over yet," he said.

"What do you mean?"

"It will astonish you, Manuela, to know that he obtained the clew to the place of concealment of the treasure, and as I was leaving the church with the box, after having removed it from the wall, I met him at the doorway, prepared to dispute my passage."

"And then?"

"He demanded that I should share with him, and, when I refused, he drew his pistol suddenly and fired at me. I returned the shot and fortunately disabled him—not, however, until he had fired at me the second time. He evidently was bent on taking my life."

"Where is he now?"

"In that house over there among the cedars."

"How did he find his way to the church?"

"That is a long story. Of course he saw the manuscript in the hands of the Marchesa di Lupo. He went to Madrid after the duel with Melchior, and there learned from the archives the whole history of the writer of the manuscript and of Fra Pablo, which included the identification of this church, which had been under the Franciscan's charge."

"Is his wound serious?"

"Not necessarily. The wound is a flesh-wound."

While Reginald was speaking Manuela seemed to have become abstracted. Her gaze was fixed on the church.

"We cannot remain long here," she said. "Let us hasten to the church."

They walked in silence towards the ruin, and when they had entered it he led her to the rear of the structure and pointed out to her the excavation in the wall.

"Where is the inscription?" she said. "I do not see it."

"It has disappeared. I discovered the box by mere accident. Any one else looking closely might have detected it."

For a little while she stood gazing silently at the spot where the treasure had lain so long in the adobe. Then, as if actuated by a sudden impulse—an impulse which, at first, Reginald failed to comprehend—she knelt on the ground in the attitude of prayer, and covered her face with her hands.

When she arose a mist was in her eyes.

"I was praying," she said, "for the repose of the soul of the poor prisoner of San Juan del Ulua. I am a Catholic, and in our religion, you know, we are taught that God will listen even to the unworthy who may pray earnestly for the repose of the souls of the dead."

Reginald took her hand in his.

"Manuela," he said, "you told me when we parted, before my journey to Europe, that you preferred to await the test of time before you should give a decided answer to my suit. Time has only strengthened my love for you. Let me lay at your feet the riches that a strange chance has put into my hands, and, in making you my wife, let me feel the consciousness that I gain in you a greater treasure than any that fortune could bestow."

"Are you very sure that you know your own mind, Reginald?" she asked.

"My mind was made up long ago," he replied, earnestly. "Now that the treasure which I so largely owe to Melchior—how, I will tell you presently—is mine, I could not be satisfied unless you and he should share it with me. The thought of you and your participation in the pleasures it would bring us both has been the great impulse that led me on in my search for it."

Her hand still lay in his, and, as he ceased speaking, she put her disengaged arm around his neck and kissed him.

"Let that be my answer," she said. "Does it not suffice? Come now, let us return to the stage."

He fain would have lingered a little longer in the old church, so that he might consecrate a few more blissful minutes to solitude and his new-born happiness; but, finally yielding to her solicitations, he led her out of the ruin on their way back to the stage—not, however, without obtaining from her a promise that she would return with him to New York in a few days as his bride.

It need scarcely be said that Reginald did not ride his horse, as he had intended to do, to Santa Fé, but he tied the animal, as before, behind the stage, and seated himself by the side of Manuela.

In their conversation he rehearsed the story of all that had happened to him since they parted, including Melchior's completion of the manuscript; and when, at last, from the top of the hills overlooking Santa Fé, they saw the houses of the town ranged beneath them, there was nothing more to tell Manuela concerning his trip to Europe and his journey to New Mexico, which had so auspiciously ended.

During the ride the valise, with its precious contents, lay in the stage at their feet.

The box was undisturbed, for, by mutual consent, they had agreed to defer the examination of it until they should reach Albuquerque and the home of Manuela.

"Ah!" said Reginald, "if Melchior could only be present when we open the box for the first time!"

In Santa Fé, after seeing Manuela suitably lodged at the hotel, he repaired to the residence of Don Manuel, where he had the pleasure of greeting his hospitable acquaintance of the stage-ride from Pueblo, the good padre, Don Tomas, who had arrived safely the day before, and whom, without having been aware of the fact, he had passed on the way to San José.

Great was the astonishment of the worthy priest when he imparted to him the information that he was to be married in a very few days, and greater still was his surprise when he learned that Manuela Waring was the prospective bride. Colonel Waring had been an old friend of his, and, like every one in that part of New Mexico, he felt a lively interest in the cavalry officer's daughter, of whom he had often heard.

When the padre knew that Manuela was at that moment at the hotel, he insisted that, if agreeable to her, she should come to his house and be Pepita's guest for the night. A deputation consisting of Don Tomas himself, Pepita and Reginald, therefore went immediately to the hotel and laid the matter before Manuela, who accepted the invitation.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE THACKARA-SHERMAN WEDDING.

THE third daughter of General Wm. T. Sherman, Miss Eleanor Mary, was married on Wednesday evening, May 5th, at her father's residence in Washington, to Alexander M. Thackara, a lieutenant in the United States Navy. The ceremony was witnessed by the relatives, intimate friends, and the President, the Secretaries of War and the Navy, but the reception which followed was attended by a large number of the most distinguished ladies and gentlemen of the country. The bride is a rosy-cheeked, brown-haired lady, twenty years of age, a little below medium height, with charming freshness and vivacity. She was educated at the Georgetown Convent. The bride was dressed in white satin and brocade, trimmed with seed pearls on lace. Her ornaments were simple pearls. None of the daughters of the General wore on this occasion the costly diamonds presented by the Khédive, though both Mrs. Fitch and Miss Sherman wore less elaborate ornaments of the same kind. The bouquet carried by the bride was of orange blossoms and lilies-of-the-valley.

The bridegroom is thirty-one years of age, was graduated at the Annapolis Academy in the Class of 1869, and is the son of the senior member of the firm of Thackara, Buck & Co., of Philadelphia.

The bridesmaids, five in number, wore white crêpe de chine, with sleeves of Spanish lace, and broad sashes of brocaded ribbon. They were: Miss May Ewing, a cousin of the bride and daughter of Representative Thomas Ewing; Miss Rachel Sherman, the General's youngest daughter; Miss Marion Whipple, daughter of one of his staff officers, stationed at Chicago; Miss Mary Lochland, of St. Louis, and Miss Addie Slack, of Washington. Each carried bouquets of some favorite flower. The groomsmen were Lieutenants Berry, Bradbury and Coffin, of the Navy, and Lieutenants Augur and Cherry of the Army.

Mrs. Sherman wore a handsome dress of pearl-colored silk and satin. Mrs. Fitch, of St. Louis, formerly Miss Minnie Sherman, wore a toilet of old gold satin. Miss Lizzie Sherman wore pink crêpe de chine, with puffed front of pink satin. Among the very elegantly attired ladies present were the wives of two of the General's aides, Mrs. Audenreid and Mrs. Bacon, and Mrs. Levi P. Morton and Madame Outrey, both of whom were escorted by Mr. Morton in the absence from the city of M. Outrey, the French Minister.

The bridal party was preceded by little Miss Florence Audenreid, escorted by Master Tecumseh Sherman. The General wore full uniform, as did also the bridegroom, the attendants and the many military guests present. Representative Anson G. McCook was accompanied by Miss Hettie McCook, of Chillicothe, Ohio. Many of the leading officers of the Government, the Army and the Navy were present, noticeable among whom was Master Lucien Young, the hero of the Huron disaster.

General Grant sent a letter of greeting and congratulation, and General Sheridan a tête-à-tête set of silver. The presents were of great number and value, but were not ostentatiously displayed. Senator Blaine sent a Berry set of silver and gold, with a card bearing an inscription expressive of the same regard for the daughter which he had always cherished for the mother, his cousin. Representative McCook's gift was of elegant silverware in Olympian design. Touching mementoes were sent by the Sisters in the Georgetown Convent.

ARCHERY IN CENTRAL PARK.

ARCHERY is rapidly growing in popularity in this city, as elsewhere. The club formed in October last already numbers nearly fifty members, many of whom have developed a good deal of skill in the use of the string and bow. With a view of encouraging the sport, the Park Commissioners have set apart the lawn formerly known as the lower ball ground, in Central Park, about a furlong away from the Eighth Avenue entrance, for the use of the club on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays during the season. At the first meet, May 1st, pretty tents and a dozen targets, with the ladies' toilets and the green foliage, supplied a most attractive scene, the paths surrounding the grounds and the rocks at the lower end being covered with a concourse of interested spectators. The brightly-painted targets, on iron easels, were arranged in two lines facing each other, at a distance of sixty yards. On a line with the targets of the New York Club, but nearer to the north border of the meadow, were the targets of the Manhattan Bowmen, six indefatigable archers. Between the two camps, in the centre of the field, a tall, bright-red flag-pole, with a very large flag at its top, contributed to the general picturesqueness.

Pennants flying from short staves driven into the sward marked off the ground for the archers. First, a line of all the members who chose toeshoot stood just in front of the southwest row of targets. Each then fired three arrows sixty yards with the wind to the targets opposite. Each target was forty-eight inches in diameter. Then walking across the field, they withdrew their arrows from the targets or picked them up from the grass. They then fired back the same distance in the face of the wind. This was repeated until each had shot thirty arrows. Next, thirty arrows were shot by each in the same manner at a distance of fifty yards, and, to close the round, the same number of arrows were fired at a distance of forty yards. An arrow that transfixed the gilt bull's-eye counted nine. The surrounding circles were, in order, red, drab, black and white, and counted respectively seven, five, three and one. The bows, six feet long, are of lancewood, hickory and yew. The steel-tipped arrows are marked with two numbers, as "4-6." An arrow so marked would weigh as much as four English shillings and six English pence.

Several ladies participated in the sport, and, it is said, drove their arrows with more accurate aim than some of the gentlemen archers. The games will continue throughout the Summer months on three days of each week. The officers of the club are: Dr. A. B. DeLuna, President; James W. Auten, Jr., Secretary; George D. Pond, treasurer; and John W. Sutton, Field Captain. Prominent in the contests were Mrs. James W. Auten, Miss E. T. Morton, Miss Fannie Wren, Miss Belle Howell, Miss A. M. Ashman, the Misses Mauger, George H. Sheldon, S. S. Roper and Dr. J. E. Whitehead.

POLICE-INSPECTOR BYRNES.

THE new inspector appointed by the Police Commissioners to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Inspector McDermott, Thomas Byrnes, is the well-known Chief of the Detective Bureau, who, during the past two years, has made a most enviable record by his marvelous detective service. He has already seen seventeen years' service on the police force of New York, having been appointed a patrolman in 1863. He attained his captaincy in 1870, and, after brief terms in several precincts, he was given command of the Fifteenth. During the Orange riot of July 12th, 1871, he held the Orange Lodge against the assaults of the mob from daylight until the procession began to move, when, being in command of the right of the column, he forced the passage down Eighth Avenue. When the attack was made on the military, he kept the head of the column clear, and afterwards led the way to Cooper Institute, where the procession was dismissed. While his record embraces the saving of lives at fires, the capture of "The Bastile," a notorious negro gambling house in Bleeker Street, the running down of numerous thieves of distinction, and the breaking up of strongholds of crime, Inspector Byrnes's greatest achievement consists in his patient pursuit and capture of the Manhattan Savings Bank robbers from the faintest of clews. Three are now in service in the State Prison, and two more, captured but a few days ago in Philadelphia, to the intense dismay of the local police, are now awaiting trial and sentence.

Inspector Byrnes's record is singularly clear from blemish of any kind. He is active, sagacious, indefatigable, honest, and, because he is so, he has the friendship and backing of the most substantial and reputable gentlemen of the city.

CINCINNATI EXCURSIONISTS IN GEORGIA.

THE excursion of several hundred Southern citizens to Cincinnati in connection with the opening of the Cincinnati Southern Railway was followed last month by a "return visit," which has attracted a good deal of attention. This latter excursion consisted of a party of 160 of the leading business men of Cincinnati, besides about forty ladies. The party was in charge of Governor Blackburn, of Kentucky, and visited the principal cities in Georgia, South Carolina, and other States. Returning, the excursionists left Savannah on April 21st, via Atlanta and Chattanooga. While at Savannah the excursionists were entertained by a trip in the steamer Florida down the river to Tybee Bar, during which they inspected the city wharves, the works of the Central Railroad Company, and other points of interest. Our illustration shows the steamer passing down the river, her decks crowded with excursionists. The visitors were also complimented by a grand ball and banquet in Savannah, which was attended by the élite of the city. The influence of these interchanges of hospitality between the representative business men of the North and the South is in every way salutary, and they cannot be too often repeated at this particular time, when partisan and sectional passions and resentments are being appealed to by politicians intent only on personal or party aggrandizement.

A French Crystal Palace.

AMONG the many grand schemes that have of late years haunted the minds of French speculators, the idea of constructing a national pendant to the Crystal Palace at Sydenham has had prominent place. This ambitious project may soon be realized. A certain M. Nicolle has applied to the Government for permission to construct what he calls "Le Palais de Crystal Français" in the private park of St. Cloud. In that charming resort of Parisian holiday-makers he intends—always presupposing that he obtains the necessary permission and capital—to erect an immense building of glass, iron and stone, about the same size as the Sydenham structure, but organized on a more serious and scientific principle. Skating rinks are, at least for the present, to be excluded from its list of attractions on which the French Sydenham will depend for its success, and in their place there will be supplied the soberer pleasures of an anthropological museum, industrial exhibitions and model farms. The Sydenham enterprise was started with the same virtuous intentions, and we know what indifferent success has, financially speaking, attended it.

Churches in New York.

IT is said that there are at present 427 churches, chapels, and missions of all denominations in the metropolis—a gain of 26 in the last ten years. Of these churches and the like, 402 are set down as Protestant, with accommodations for 285,000 persons. The Episcopalians have the most of all the Protestant churches—88, with 52,896 sittings. The Presbyterians have 69 churches, with 42,341 sittings. The Methodists have 61 churches, with 30,786 sittings. The Baptists have 48 churches, with 26,912 sittings. The Reformed Dutch have 28 churches, with 14,986 sittings; the Lutherans 23, with 8,891 sittings. The Roman Catholics have 57 churches, with 71,784 sittings, the largest number of any sect in the city. As it is estimated that the present population of New York proper is from 1,250,000 to 1,300,000, more than three-quarters of the inhabitants could not get into church if they wanted to. But they do not want to, obviously. If they did, plenty of accommodation would be pretty sure to be furnished. It is asserted that not much over half the seating capacity of the city churches is generally needed. Many of the churches are never half filled except on special occasions. Only the Roman Catholic edifices are likely to be thronged at any time.

Our Mineral Wealth.

IN the opinion of some experts, the production of precious metals in the United States is but just beginning. In the last ten years we have advanced from $17,220,000 in silver and $33,750,000 in gold to $45,846,100 in silver and $44,880,225 in gold, but it is said that the next census (ten years) will more than quadruple this production. During the first seven years from 1850 to 1877 the production of gold exceeded that of silver in our country, but since then the production of silver has exceeded that of gold $5,561,925. This was caused in part by the discovery of the great silver mines at Leadville, Colorado, and in part by the decrease of the gold production of the Comstock lode in Nevada. It is a fact not generally known that in the production of the Comstock lode 41 20-100 is gold. The decrease of yield in Comstock was $13,464,481 in silver and gold during 1878-1879, while the increase of silver production in Colorado was $8,000,000. The production of gold and silver during the last census, as near as it can be ascertained, was as follows:

Year.	Silver.	Gold.
1870	$17,220,000	$33,750,000
1871	19,290,000	34,200,000
1872	19,954,429	38,177,395
1873	27,483,302	39,206,658
1874	29,699,123	38,466,488
1875	31,638,239	39,968,194
1876	39,289,934	42,926,935

In this country $6,000,000 is annually consumed in making jewelry and for the arts. Last year about $14,700,000 in gold was imported to America, and this added to the home production gives an increase of $108,170,262. If we add still further the $37,032,857 in silver produced, we have $143,202,119 of a monetary increase to our national wealth. Large as this increase may appear, it is as nothing when compared with our future possibilities. The sudden influx of Eastern capital to the trans-Missouri country will meet a want long felt and cause the great mineral wealth of the West to be rapidly developed. The rich deposits of gold and silver there hidden in the earth will now be brought forth, converted into money and made to administer to the wants and conveniences of mankind. America will astonish the world in the next ten years, and perhaps shake the value of precious metals by her enormous production of them. General Ericsbin, of the United States Army, says: "I have lived ten years in the West, and I sincerely believe 1880 will not pass without giving us an unusual production of $400,000,000 of gold and silver in these United States."

What Causes Gray Hair.

THE turning gray of the hair is due to the destruction of the top of the papillæ, or life and color-giving bulb at the root of the hair. The sudden blanching of a head of hair is frequently caused by great nervous shocks, and many historical and traditional cases are handed down, in which sudden fear or overwhelming news has chilled even the roots of the hair and turned it white in a few hours. The case of Marie Antoinette is one of the most tender and touching on record, for in a single night her rich, dark hair was changed to silvery-gray. Some hair, however, manages to withstand the blandishments of age, as notably the case of Mrs. Sally Davis, of Kentucky, now over seventy years of age, whose hair is a soft, silky brown, falling in luxuriant profusion to her waist, and with no suspicion of silver among the glistening threads. Gray hair has been known to become dark without the chemist's aid. Nazarella, a man 105 years old, was in 1774 at Vienna presented by nature with a new set of teeth and a restoration of the black hair of his youth. John Weeks died aged 114, and was blessed with a regeneration of the color of his hair a short time before his death, and Sir John Sinclair, a Scotchman, dying at 110, rejoiced in a youthful head of hair during the latter years of his life. Dr. Richards reports the case of a man who had three changes of his hair, from black to white, during his life, the first taking place when he was about thirty-five years of age.

"Variegated hair," which is alternately banded black-and-white, is noted among the hirsute curiosities of nature, and green and blue hair have been described by some authorities; but these colors owe their production to the influence of surroundings in which their subjects live, the green hair belonging to those who work in copper mines, and blue to those whose occupation is cobalt mining. Workers in indigo also have blue hair. In Tripoli and Turkey the ladies paint the hair of their children a vermilion color.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

On April 1st the Geological Society of France celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation.

The City Guilds of London have subscribed a sum of £450 as a donation to the building fund of the Technical Institute, and have promised an annual sum of £300 for three years, to provide suitable practical instruction at the Horological Institute for apprentices and improvers.

Two Secretaries of the Royal Society have passed away within a few weeks. Mr. T. Bell, who died March 13th, was Junior Secretary of the Society from 1848 to 1853, Mr. Christie being then the Senior. Dr. Sharpey, whose death occurred in April, succeeded Mr. Bell in 1853, became Senior in the following year, and held the post until his resignation in 1872.

M. J. Palmaerts has published at Brussels a pamphlet entitled "Projet d'Exploration au Pole Nord," in which, after a preliminary disquisition of a general nature, he expounds his plan for the construction of a submarine apparatus to attain the object in view. The Times' Naples correspondent states that the Cristoforo Colombo is now in course of preparation for an exploring voyage in the North Seas.

An Attempt is about to made by Queen's College, London, to overcome the difficulties incident to systematic lectures to ladies upon geological science, by organizing week by week excursions to the chief geological localities which are easy of access, where the strata and their fossils may be practically studied. Excellent results have attended the visits of these ladies to the museums of London during the past term, and it is anticipated that an aptitude may thus be acquired for geological field work, which will open up to them a new branch of scientific education.

According to the Kansas City Review, remains of a gigantic race of men, considerably advanced in civilization, have been discovered in a cave on the old Smith farm in Tiffin Township, Adams County, Ohio. The cavern had at one time been a burial-place, and contained many tombs adorned with bas-reliefs of a very high artistic character. One of the tombs, when broken open, was found to contain the mummy of a man nine feet one inch in length. Several tools and weapons of copper were found in the tomb, hardened to such a degree that a file will barely scratch the lance. It is to be hoped that further examinations will be undertaken by fully qualified persons. Perhaps at last a light will be thrown on the early history of the western hemisphere.

A Russian Paper, the Kievlianin, reports that in the latter part of 1879, in the province of Poltava, the cattle plague carried away from seventy-five to eighty per cent. of all the cattle affected by it. A Russian who saw no escape for his cattle resorted to the dangerous experiment of inoculating his healthy beasts with the virus taken from the diseased ones. All the cattle experimented upon were taken ill upon the tenth day after the operation, and about eighteen per cent. of them perished, leaving eighty-two per cent. safe from the epidemic. The inoculated animals lived with impunity even through the repeated epidemics that afterwards ravaged the same region. The result of this experiment has proved so satisfactory that inoculation for the plague is to be tried on an extensive scale in a number of Russian provinces.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

RIGHT HON. GEO. J. GOSCHEN has been appointed as British Ambassador to Russia.

THE condition of the Empress of Russia remains about the same as it was last week.

MISS SUSIE LOUD, of Sherman, TEXAS, is making quite a reputation in her State as a historical painter.

QUEEN VICTORIA intends to decorate Frances Anne, Duchess of Marlborough, upon her return to England, with the royal order of Victoria and Albert.

BENJAMIN P. CHENEY, of Boston, a member of the United States and Canada Express Company, has paid into the treasury of the Dartmouth College $50,000 by his check.

THE French Academy of Sciences has awarded to Dr. C. H. F. Peters, of Hamilton College, the Lalande prize for the discovery of forty-three asteroids, eight of them in 1879.

MR. GEORGE B. ROBERTS has been elected President of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in the place of Colonel Thomas A. Scott, whose resignation takes effect June 1st.

MLLE. BARTET had a great success in Sarah Bernhardt's part in "Ruy Blas." Victor Hugo, the author of the play, who was behind the scenes, fervently congratulated her.

THE Duchess of Marlborough has so won upon the Irish heart that she leaves the country with the title of "the Lady Lieutenant," given to her for affection's sake by the people she has done so much to help.

GENERAL BEN. LE FEVRE, Representative in Congress from the Fifth Ohio District, and whose portrait lately appeared in this paper, has been renominated by an overwhelming majority, and is practically certain of re-election.

THE Mormon Church has excommunicated six daughters of Brigham Young. They were plaintiffs in the recent suit against the Church, and the executors of Brigham's estate, which put Delegate Cannon and others in jail for contempt.

LUTHER WHITING MASON, of Boston, has entered upon his duties as a professor of music in the Tokio normal schools, and is assisted in the Japanese literary branch of the work by one of his most successful pupils, Mr. Isawa.

SIR GARNET WOLSELEY embarked for England on the 4th inst. Before leaving Natal he had an interview with John Dunn, who reported that throughout Zululand the feeling regarding the settlement of the affairs there is satisfactory.

MISS EMILY FAITHFULL, whose coming visit to this country has been already announced, is the daughter of a clergyman, and is forty-five years of age. She at one time enjoyed the pleasures of fashionable life, but soon became devoted to improving the condition of working-women. She is a favorite of the Queen Victoria.

PROFESSOR GEORGE L. VOSE, of Bowdoin College, Maine, who is regarded as an authority upon such subjects, says that over 200 railroad bridges have fallen within the past ten years. He attributes these "accidents" either to the selection of bad materials, faulty construction and imperfect supervision, or all of these causes combined.

THE son of the Burmese King, Theeban, for whom, last year, a cradle of gold was made, incrusted with diamonds, rubies, sapphires and emeralds of incredible value, has just died of smallpox. Vast sums were spent upon the little fellow, and all the people living round the palace stockade had to buy new cooking-kettles, lest the smell of rancid oil from the old ones might offend his tender little nose.

MADEMOISELLE NEVADA, who is becoming so famous abroad as a singer, is Miss Wixom, the daughter of a California hotel-keeper. She early showed great taste and capacity for music. While yet a mere child her parents moved to Nevada, where her mother died. The father sent her to Mill's Seminary, Nevada City. Her age is twenty-three, and she has been studying vocal music for some time abroad.

ALMOST the whole of the vast estate of the Duke of Portland, in which was included more than $7,000,000 of personal property, passes under the will to the fortunate youth who is now Duke of Portland, although he was only second cousin to the testator, who had numbers of nearer relatives. A vast Scotch property, which came to the late Duke through his maternal grandfather, who was in nowise related to the present Duke, is nevertheless bequeathed to him.

THE silver service presented to Mr. Maurice Delfosse by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in recognition of his work as president of of the fishery commission, is kept locked up in the State Department at Washington. Mr. Delfosse preferred to have the service in lieu of the money which it is customary to present to an umpire in an international arbitration. It is a full dinner-service, made by Tiffany, of massive silver. There are sixty pieces, including eighteen soup plates.

WILLIAM P. DAINGERFIELD, presiding Justice of the California Superior Court, dropped dead on the bench at San Francisco, May 5th. He was engaged in hearing a case when he suddenly threw up his hands, gasped once or twice, and expired instantly. He had been in infirm health for some months past. His death is attributed to heart disease. Justice Daingerfield was a native of Virginia, and was fifty-six years of age. He was Judge of the Twelfth District Court previous to the reorganization of the Judiciary under the new Constitution.

THE ball given by the Lord Mayor of Dublin on Tuesday night, May 4th, seems to have been a gay affair. The Mansion House was lighted and decorated without regard to expense; the dancing places were marked off with silken cords; flowers bloomed everywhere; two bands discoursed music; Commander Foster, U.S.N., had the honor of opening the ball with the Lady Mayoress, whose husband later on presented him the freedom of the city in a box of costly workmanship; the other officers of the Constellation were treated civilly by the lords and ladies present, and the supper left nothing to be desired.

ONE of the most interesting features of the Methodist Episcopal General Conference, at Cincinnati, was the presence of a native East Indian. This gentleman, Babu Ram Chunder Bose, represents the native Methodists of India, and is the first Hindoo delegate ever sent to a General Conference. He is a resident of Lucknow, where he is head master of two schools. He is a pure-blooded Hindoo, but speaks the English language with an accuracy of pronunciation and grammatical construction that would put to shame many native-born Americans. His present work is to preach to the educated English-speaking natives, whom he visits in their homes, and to whom, when opportunity offers, he lectures or talks in English or the vernacular. He also writes pamphlets in English for the benefit of educated Hindoos, and several of them have been published in book-form by the Methodist press at Lucknow.

INTERIOR OF THE SENATE CHAMBER.

AUSTIN, THE CAPITAL OF TEXAS.

ONE of the brightest and whitest of cities is Austin, the capital of the State of Texas. It is situated upon the Colorado River, about 160 miles from its mouth, and 200 miles northwest of Galveston. The river up to Austin is navigable in Winter only for small steamboats. The city is built upon an amphitheatre of hills, and overlooks the lovely valley of the Colorado and the rich rolling prairies beyond. The public buildings are of a white stone called marble, which is too soft to admit of polish. As I approached Austin—I struck the capital by way of Houston—the glare from these buildings almost blinded me, and it was some hours ere my eyes became toned down to their radiant whiteness. The number of church spires, too, recalled the grave old towns of New England. The main street is singularly picturesque in its wideness, its steepness, the variety of its bordering architecture, from the shanty, almost Mexican in its rude simplicity, to the lordly State House that crowns the hill. There is a soupçon of Mexico about Austin, from the sombreros and mustangs to the ragged and jagged cacti. A portion of the city, close to the railway depot, is known as Little Mexico, and inhabited solely by natives of the country of the Montezumas. My first visit was to the State House, which is approached by several flights of marble steps. In the vestibule stands the monument of Bonham, Crockett, Bowie and Travis, which is built from the ruins of the Alamo. Upon the side of Crockett is the following inscription: "To the God of the fearless and the free is dedicated this altar made from the ruins of the Alamo." Upon the side of Travis: "Be they enrolled with Leonidas, the host of the mighty dead." Upon the side of Bowie: "Thermopylæ had her messengers of defeat, but the Alamo had none." Santa Anna captured the entire place, and these heroes died at their guns.

The museum attached to the State House contains some Mexican curiosities in the shape of weapons, Indian gongs and a tunic attributed to Hernando Cortez. The Legislature was in session on the occasion of my visit, and the representatives of both houses were at it "hammer and tongs." In the House of Representatives are two well-executed oil paintings, and, as I was informed, admirable likenesses, of Houston and Armstrong. They hang at either side of the chair. There is also a spirited picture of the Battle of the Wilderness. There were five colored representatives present, each of whom seemed up to his very eyes in business. I crossed the corridor to the Senate Chamber. This is a well-proportioned apartment, and decorated after a sober, but nevertheless tasteful, fashion. The door-keeper is colored, and they tell that when he was ordered to turn over his wagon at Richmond, he declared that the order was "a darned foolish one." Portraits of Washington and Houston adorn the walls, also that of General Tom Greene. Senator Burton, colored, is highly respected both for his eloquence and his nobility of nature, and his influence with both the white and colored population is the mere outcome of his merits as a man.

Bonmell, which is situated about five miles from the city, and to Mount Bonmell repair picnickers, and lovers, and those to whom the beauty of nature are a joy forever. The saloons are very numerous in Austin, and very well appointed. Gambling is not unknown to the city, and the hall of a noted individual who never yet was known to miss his man stands on the main street. I stood at street-corners in waiting to see some ranchero, or farmer, emerge from a saloon and vault clean into the saddle of his patient mustang. This feat is thoroughly Texan, and should be seen to be appreciated. The drama is relegated to a very handsome concert-hall, and is extensively patronized. During my visit the Emma Abbott troupe was drawing immense houses, "honest, little Emma" being very popular all over the length and breadth of the Lone Star State. Austin boasts some first-class stores, and the banks and insurance offices are very charming specimens of architecture. The Odd Fellow's Hall cost $100,000, the schools $150,000. Austin is about to treat herself to a new Capitol, and, in order to raise funds for its erection, has voted three million five hundred thousand acres of land, for which she will receive $1,000,000. A few years ago Austin consisted of a couple of log cabins. Now she has a population of 16,000; in 1870 her population was but 4,428; in 1860, 3,494. An artesian well has been sunk north of the Capitol to the depth of 1,300 feet, from which a small stream constantly issues. One of the many picturesque sights to be seen in Austin is the arrival and departure of the diligences for San Antonio and other places, drawn by gayly attired and be belled mules. Austin has a good career before her the capital of a State which is larger than the Empire of Germany, and which every hour is increasing in material wealth and prosperity. Like a queen she sits on her throne by the Colorado, the richest land in the wide world surrounding her—land that loudly calls for every immigrant arriving at Castle Garden.

THE KALLOCH-DE YOUNG FEUD.

THE murder of Charles De Young, senior proprietor of the Chronicle, by the Rev. I. M. Kalloch, son of the Mayor of San Francisco, continues to be the grand sensation of California. The prisoner refuses to make any statement, acting on the advice of his counsel. Public attention is about evenly divided between the father and the son, for, while the people were considering the horrors of the son's crime, the Board of Supervisors were considering the recent utterances and addresses of his father, the Mayor. The Judiciary Committee, instructed to inquire how far the actions of Mayor Kalloch had tended to create a feverish excitement, and to report the proper action to be taken by the Board in the premises, filed a long report on May 3d, reviewing the history of the labor agitation and the part taken in it by Kalloch, finding that he has encouraged the lawless and discontented workmen, advised them to parade the streets, and endeavored to keep them in such a disposition and temperament as to commit an outbreak whenever it should suit his purposes; that he has impeached the honesty of the whole community, accused various branches of the City Government of corruption and dereliction of duty, and, under pretense of counseling the mob against violence, insidiously advised it to be in readiness for bloodshed and the overthrow of the authorities. The committee expressed the opinion that Kalloch was unscrupulous, unprincipled, and devoid of integrity and of fidelity to the public interests, and that the time had arrived for the people to express their condemnation of his acts. It recommended that prompt action be taken to vindicate the fair fame of the municipality by a judicial inquiry into Kalloch's case.

The motion to adopt the report was put by Mayor Kalloch, who announced that by the casting vote it was carried. The roll was then called, resulting in a unanimous vote for its adoption. A resolution was then adopted authorizing the Finance Committee to cause judicial proceedings to be instituted against the Mayor for his removal from office, and empowering it to employ counsel and prosecute the matter to a speedy termination. Throughout the reading of the report and resolution, Kalloch appeared cool and unmoved.

The vendetta between the De Young and the Kalloch families, which so far has been emphasized by the shooting of the Mayor by Charles De Young, and the wanton murder of the latter by the Mayor's son, is likely to be followed by a civil prosecution of the present executive and his removal from office. Should the impending impeachment prove successful it will hardly balance the surprise felt all over the country that the conservative people of California allowed themselves to be controlled so effectively by the Kearney fanatics. That Kalloch desired to be Mayor is not to be wondered at, but that the people should elect him has proved more than a nine days' wonder.

A Remarkable Race.

IT is said that Major Biddulph, stationed on the Cashmere boundary, has prepared a report upon the customs, the languages and the folklore of the singular community among whom he has been residing for a long time. From Major Biddulph's peculiar advantages and opportunities may be expected says the Calcutta Pioneer, a complete account of people who are a survival of the old Aryans from whom all civilized mankind of the present day is probably descended. Surgeon Major Bellew, meanwhile, has been examining a few men from the cantons on the southwest of Dardistan, peopled by a similar race, who in one respect are still more interesting, for their country has never yet been visited by a civilized traveler. But in appearance and language they closely resemble the Bards, and, unlike them, have not embraced the creed of their Mohammedan neighbors. The tongues spoken in all these hills are, for the most part, Aryan, not descended from Sanskrit, and, indeed, of earlier origin than that classical language. On the northern slopes of the mountains Parsee words prevail; in the southern cantons some of the words resemble Greek, some Latin, some those of modern Europe. They make (and freely consume) grape wine, something like a crude Burgundy. Those who are not Mussulmans believe in one God, but employ the intercession of minor powers, represented by images. They also occasionally canonize great men whom they have lost by death. They are usually monogamous opposed to divorce and strict defenders of the chastity of their unmarried girls. These latter have blue, gray or hazel eyes; black hair is the exception among them, and, when young, they are of such remarkable comeliness as to be in great demand in the slave markets of adjacent countries. Authentic information concerning these interesting races cannot but be anxiously awaited by all who realize the nature of the questions involved.

A NEW HAMPSHIRE woman has a husband who is addicted to joining secret societies. One of her exasperated outbursts is thus reported by the Manchester Mirror: "Jine! He'd jine anything. There can't nothing come along that's dark and sly and hidden but he'll jine it. If anybody should get up a society to burn his house down he'd jine it just as soon as he could get in, and if he had to pay to get in he'd quall the suddener."

A SCOTCHMAN in Brechin, after having spent a year or two in the married state, had the misfortune to lose his wife. No sooner was he bereft of the partner of his cares than he consoled himself with a review of his worldly circumstances. "I had," said he, "but a shilling in my pocket when I was married, and now that my wife is dead I have ninepence, so that I have only lost threepence."

DEACON B., of Ohio, a very pious man, was noted for his long prayers, especially in his family. One Monday morning the deacon and his wife were alone, and as was his usual custom after breakfast, a prayer was offered. There being an unusual amount of work that day, the deacon's prayer was short. He seized his hat and milk-pail and started for the barn. His wife being very deaf did not notice his absence, but supposed him to be still engaged in prayer. On his return from milking he was surprised to find her still kneeling. He stepped up to her and shouted "Amen," when she immediately arose and went about her work as if nothing had happened.

THERE has just been enacted near Salonica a drama, the hero of which is a colonel who was captured by brigands and held until an enormous ransom was paid for his release. This recalls the case of a Greek officer who was taken captive under precisely similar circumstances. While in the hands of the bandits he wrote to his wife, saying: "My ransom is 1,000 drachmas. If it is not paid by the 15th my captors will cut off my nose; the 16th, my ears; the 17th, my upper lip; the 18th, my lower lip; the 19th, death awaits me." The weeping wife set about raising the money; by the 15th she had raised only 300 drachmas, the 16th, 400; the 17th, 600. She had only secured the 1,000 on the 18th. The agonized woman, reflecting, said to her neighbor: "My husband must be a frightful sight by this time. I shall save my 1,000 drachmas for a second marriage with a whole man."

FAIRBANKS' SCALES IN AUSTRALIA.

THE latest Australian mail received contains the following from the Sydney Evening News of March 17th:

The firm of Messrs. Fairbanks & Co., of New York and London, have taken all before them with their collective exhibits of scales. The judges state that, in view of the many practical advantages which these scales possess over any and all exhibited, and as collective exhibits showing the perfection now arrived at by the inventive genius of one family, they recommend a distinctive diploma or medal to that firm in addition to what would be simply a first-class award.

At this Exposition, Fairbanks & Co. met in competition scale manufacturers from the United States, Great Britain and France, and the testimonial received by them is an honor conferred on no other scale manufacturer.

NEPTUNITE.

THE International Chemical Company, of which ex-Secretary McCulloch is President, has now on exhibition at its rooms, 28 West Fourteenth Street, New York, a large quantity of goods, which, by the new process controlled by the company, have been made absolutely impervious to water, and absolutely proof against moth and mildew. Mr. D. M. Lamb, inventor of the preparation, which is a transparent liquid having the odor of benzine, says that its principal ingredient is India-rubber. The compound penetrates the fabrics, leaving a deposit of gum around each fibre, which successfully resists water, the attacks of moths and all ordinary acids. After the application of the preparation the fabrics are subjected to a temperature of from 160 to 180 degrees. After the gummy substance has thus been set, not even boiling removes it. At a recent public exhibition in this city, the tests consisted in hanging various kinds of goods in turn on a rack and deluging each with water from a hose. To the lower end of each piece of cloth which had been treated with the preparation was pinned a piece of the same kind of cloth not treated. Ladies present said there was no difference in appearance or touch between the pieces so pinned together.

BUSINESS men have always favored the ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, New York, with good reason. Its convenient location is often money in one's pocket if he has no time to spare in riding up or down town. It should be borne in mind by all visitors to New York that while the great hotels up town are so crowded that the best rooms can only be obtained by telegraphing in advance, the ST. NICHOLAS reserves all its "best rooms" for transient guests, so that persons there for the day only are as delightfully situated as though their stay was to be more prolonged. Four hundred people have been the average daily come and go at this favorite hotel the past Winter in consequence of this admirable arrangement.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE.—A genuine relish exactly suited to all tastes and all conditions of people.

ONE hundred thousand gallons of California wine, the first shipment of the kind ever made, is now on its way from San Francisco to Germany. No better evidence could be desired of the merit of the pure California wines, offered in this market by Messrs. A. WERNER & CO., 308 Broadway, than this exportation to Germany. To the best classes of American consumers they have become thoroughly familiar, and they will doubtless attain equal popularity in Europe. The fame of Werner & Co.'s "THE AMERICA" Extra Dry Champagne will ere long become world-wide.

GENTLEMEN—In 1876 we built a warehouse, 30x100, which we covered with your Asbestos Roofing. We have coated it with your roof-coating once since it was first applied, and to all appearances it is as good to-day as when first put on. We were so much pleased with this warehouse roof that when we built a new mill in 1877 we covered it with your Asbestos Roofing. This mill roof has been much admired by all who have seen it and taken the trouble to examine it. It has stood the test of the extremes of weather—two Summers' heat and two Winters' cold—and resisted all the storms to which it has been exposed. To-day it is in prime condition, and with ordinary care we see no reason why it should not continue to be a good roof for twenty years.

Yours very truly, J. C. RICHARDSON, Pres.

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines, the Louis and the Baden Baden, covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

THE POLITICAL TUMULT.

THE master of the political clans in the several States for the appointment of delegates to the National Convention of the Republican Party, which is to take place at Chicago on the 2d of June, has been attended with "faction fights" and with acrimonious charges of "fraud" which are, we believe, almost without precedent in the ranks of any of the great historical parties which have hitherto divided the country. And the acrimony of this contest within the bosom of the same political organization is emphasized by the fact that it is not inspired by any grave or overmastering public interest supposed to be represented by one wing or section of the party in a higher degree than another, but revolves almost entirely in the sphere of "personal" politics.

It ought to have been foreseen by the managers of the "third term idea" that the intrusion of such a novelty in the politics of the country would produce an effervescence at once deep and widespread. And that the agitation should take the form of personal controversy was inevitable from the consideration that the candidature of General Grant could not be championed on other than grounds personal to him, either by way of exalting him above his rivals for the Republican nomination, or by way of disparaging the claims and pretensions of his rivals in comparison with those of the ex-President. It was in flagrant provocation of this invidious spirit that ex-Senator Howe struck the keynote of the pending preliminary campaign when, in his zeal for General Grant, he warned the Republicans against "putting lighted candles into their caps, after the manner of miners, and going down into subterranean depths to quarry out a President, while the foremost man of his age stands upon the mountain-top, upon whom the eager world has set the seal of primacy."

There is an invincible repugnance in the breast of all free and democratic communities to the claim of "primacy" when arrogated, on personal grounds, in behalf of any single individual however illustrious. It was in this sentiment that the political institute of "ostracism" planted its roots among the Athenians, and it is because of the legitimate place which this sentiment has in the working of popular institutions that Grote has not scrupled, in his "History of Greece," to defend the Athenian custom as "a salutary and protective institution." To this effect he writes:

"When two party leaders, in the early stages of the Athenian democracy, each powerful in adherents and influence, had become passionately embarked in a bitter and prolonged opposition to each other, such opposition was likely to conduct one or other to violent measures. Over and above the hopes of party triumph, each might well fear that if he continued within the bounds of legality, he might fall a victim to aggressive proceedings on the part of his antagonists. To ward off this formidable danger a public vote was called for to determine which of the two should go into temporary banishment."

Republics no longer impose the penalties of a penal ostracism. But when in a republic like ours the candidature of an eminent citizen is advocated in defiance of political traditions which date from the administration of Washington; when it is advocated in the name of "a strong government" as distinct from the government defined by the Constitution and the laws, and, finally, when it is advocated on the ground of a personal "primacy" to which the world has "set the seal," it is but natural that the political jealousy which expressed itself by the institutes of democratic Athens should find expression in our country according to the institutes of democratic America.

Not by ostracism but by open debate and by confederated opposition do the people of America resist the pretensions of any citizen who is commended to them as a natural-born ruler. It would have been a sad day for the Republican Party if it had accepted with patience and resignation the humiliating position assigned to it by the champions of the ex-President's "primacy." There was something almost cynical in the assertion that the party had nothing better to offer the country than four more years of such civil administration as well-nigh ruined the party during the eight years' rule with which he has been already intrusted. The assertion was nothing less than an insult to the statesmen whom the Republican Party has reared during the long period of its supremacy, and how the insult has been resented we may read in the exciting records of the Republican State conventions, in the embittered columns of the Republican newspaper press, and in the charges of fraud, of duress and of prevarication which are so freely exchanged among the patrons and abettors of the respective candidates.

Smarting under a sense of the surprise and coercion alleged to have been practiced by the management of Senator Cameron in Pennsylvania and of Senator Conkling in New York, a portion of the delegates from these States have openly revolted against the third term programme, and thus exposed themselves to the counter-charges of "duplicity" and "dishonor." The force of the Republican sentiment, which feels itself aggrieved by the finesse and tactics of the third term managers, may be measured by the fact that men are found willing to brave the resentment of powerful partisan leaders and to incur the odium of broken pledges rather than lend themselves to the consummation of what they regard as a fatal policy for their party. And that it was unfair to suppress the proportional representation of Mr. Blaine in the delegations from Pennsylvania and New York by the adoption of "the unit rule" is made clear by the outcry of the Grant managers in Illinois, where the "Blaine and Washburn combination" has essayed to do on a small scale what the ex-President's supporters attempted to do on a large scale in the States we have named.

And it is out of such a hurly-burly as this that the Chicago Convention is expected to elicit and express the clear voice and the calm judgment of the Republican Party! A body of men who have exchanged among themselves the most injurious accusations, affecting a portion at least of their constituents, are called to speak with all the authority of a canonical and ecumenical council in matters pertaining to the welfare of the country! And when we remember that the Democratic Party—what with its Kelly and Tilden feuds in New York, its hard-money wing in the East and its soft-money wing in the West; its debt-payers and its open repudiators in States like Virginia and Tennessee—is not in a much better case, who can wonder that "Scratchers" and "Independents" should thrive on a spectacle like this, or that sedate men in both parties should be looking around for the "dark horse," on whose back they may hope to escape from the machinations of the men who are seeking to jockey the Presidential race?

THE DRIFT OF TRADE.

IT is not wise to ignore the fact that the foreign commerce of the country is in a much less satisfactory condition than it was one year ago. It is not long since that the precious metals were pouring into our coffers to the extent of millions every month. But matters are changing. The trade report of the Bureau of Statistics for March, recently made public, shows that the imports of coin and bullion only exceeded the exports in the sum of $7,599. From this it would appear that flood tide has been passed and that the ebb has actually commenced.

The report of the Bureau is both interesting and instructive, and deserves more than a passing notice. Touching the precious metals, it shows that the imports for March amounted to $1,181,782, and the exports $1,874,183. This is a better showing than that for March, 1879, at which time the excess of exports over imports was about $1,876,090. But at that time the tide which poured nearly $80,000,000 into our treasuries had not commenced running. Turning to the strictly commercial portion of the statement, we discover that the imports of merchandise amounted to $70,992,969. For the same month in 1879 the importations amounted to $41,856,611. On the other hand, the exports for the month were $77,350,331, as against $66,154,745 for March, 1879. Comparing March, 1880, with the same month of last year, it will be seen that while imports have increased $29,136,351, the increase in exports has only amounted to $11,289,087. This difference in growth reaches the very large sum of $17,847,264. In March, 1879, the exports exceeded imports by $24,208,134. For the same month of the present year there was an excess of exports over imports of only $6,357,362. The exhibit is not a flattering one, but then it might be even worse.

It was apprehended in some quarters that the March return would show an unfavorable balance against this country in its foreign trade account. This apprehension, however, appears to have been based upon the fact that the imports at the port of New York exceeded the exports by nearly $16,000,000. But the heavy exports of cotton from Southern cities more than counterbalanced this excess of imports, and left a balance in our favor, as stated, of $6,357,362. Should this ratio of excess be kept up for the twelve months ending February 28th, 1881, the balance on the home side of the ledger will amount to more than $76,000,000. But we can have no assurance that such will be the case.

In considering this trade statement it should not be forgotten that the heavy imports in March were due in a large degree to the high price of iron. The heavy advance in the price of that article enable British iron-masters to ship their surplus stock to this country. During the first quarter of the present year the foreign iron landed in our ports amounted to 467,000 tons. This activity in the iron trade led to a general quickening of business, the result of which was to create a sudden increased demand for European goods. But it is to be hoped that this call for foreign manufactures will be but temporary, and that the balance of trade, as well as of profit, at the close of the year, will be in our favor. If this hope is not to be realized, and the importations attain to a volume greater than our exports, and beyond the surplus yield of our precious metals, then the country may expect a panic and another long season of business depression. If determined to live beyond our means we must pay the bankrupt's penalty.

The total trade with foreign countries during March amounted to $148,343,300. The same ratio for a year would show a grand aggregate of nearly $1,800,000,000. There is no good reason why the profits of such a trade should not inure to the benefit of our own people. With the exception of raw material and such productions as are not grown or manufactured in the country, the United States requires but little from abroad. On the other hand, foreign nations actually need the products of our soil and workshops. It is our business, then, to sell all that we can find a market for, and to purchase as little as possible. It is only in this way that we can establish permanent prosperity and build up the wealth of the country.

It is time that the nonsense concerning foreign manufactures were done away with. American cotton, woolen and worsted goods are not inferior to those of British manufacture—our cotton goods are admittedly superior—and yet, as shown by the Bureau of Statistics, our importation of such articles from Great Britain for the month of March, 1880, and the corresponding month of last year, compared as follows:

Articles.	Quantities, 1880.	1879.
Cotton goods, yards	26,525,400	18,165,600
Woolen cloths, yards	1,593,300	872,000
Worsted stuffs, yards	11,583,300	7,917,200

The United States is the great cotton-growing district of the world. American manufacturers are admittedly superior to those of England, or any other country. Notwithstanding all this, a certain class of our people prefer to use an imported article, and, as the above figures show, purchased 8,359,800 yards more of cotton goods in March, 1880, than in the corresponding month of last year.

So, too, with reference to other matters. Our fields of coal and iron ore are almost inexhaustible, but the importations of pig-iron increased from 9,792 tons in March, 1879, to 232,523 tons in March of the present year; bar, angle, rod and bolt iron increased from 715 to 23,827 tons; railroad iron from 1,184 to 43,367 tons; and unwrought steel from 1,432 tons to 11,125 tons. This is not the part of wisdom. Let an increase of this character be continued for a series of years, and it will require no prophet to foretell the end.

JUDICIAL JUDGMENT ON CRIME.

IN his address to the Grand Jury in this city, recently, Recorder Smyth made these remarks:

"At the outset of your labors, gentlemen, it is a gratification for me to be able to say to you, upon the authority of my own observation and that of other officers of this court, that there has been a steady decrease in the amount of crime committed in this city and county within the past six months. I believe, and officials of larger experience in the administration of the criminal law share my belief, that men are not naturally wicked, and that the larger part of the alarming increase of wrong-doing in this city and county during several years, ending with last Fall, was mainly due to the depression in the mercantile community and the great difficulty, often the impossibility, of securing honest employment. Want, in my opinion, rather than a natural disposition to do evil, is responsible for most of the crimes that darken the records of our criminal courts. During the last six or eight months there has been, as all of us know, a revival in every industry, and honest men are no longer tempted, in an hour of necessity, to steal. This marked decrease in the amount of crime, of late, is certainly a matter of rejoicing to right-thinking men who have not only charity for their fellow creatures, but the fair fame of the community, at heart; and I repeat that it gratifies me to be able to congratulate you, as important representatives of your fellow-citizens, thereon."

To the student of Social Science there will be two suggestions in the above remarks, and, indeed, nearly the whole philosophy of reform is comprehended in their discussion. A mercantile depression begets want and suffering, and want and suffering beget crime. It is the wretchedness of the community then that, in the opinion of the Recorder and of others, who, like him, are placed at the best points for observation, builds and tenants our prisons, and brings to the gallows a large percentage of its victims. It is beggary, starvation and crime which are too frequently offered to men as their only alternatives; and if they accept the last it is only because they have too much strength of character to practice the first, or submit to the second. The Recorder is quite right. Ignorance, want of savoir faire, and a morbid tendency to crime may be important auxiliaries of want, and a few men possess criminal propensities as their inheritance; but we should have little trouble with that handful of evildoers could we reform all those whom poverty has made, either directly or indirectly, criminals.

But if commercial depressions are the cause of such frightful consequences, why do we submit to their occurrence? And if there is a class in the community to whom honesty seems to be a necessity, why do not those who are especially liable to suffer look to some more practical methods for ameliorating their condition than any yet attempted? We are very certain that commercial panics are among the most stupid and criminal follies in the history of trade, and we are about equally sure that there is a simple means of removing the main disadvantages of poverty, and bringing intelligence, contentment and virtue where there are now only ignorance, wretchedness and crime.

But we shall be asked to locate this divine Arcadia, and to indicate the road by which it may be reached. The task will not be difficult. The location is not far from our present social order, and it will be found in the simple, talismanic word—organization. The road that will carry us more directly to our objective point is only the road which is already being so happily trod by that large number of men who have learned that masses can easily accomplish results that individuals are unable to reach. Every corporation is a prophecy of the good time coming. All associations of men who, in the pursuit of some industrial or financial object and with certain chartered rights, have made themselves an aggregation of new units in the community, are teaching the principle on which the whole fabric of society must eventually rest. The "scalping process" among men must be abandoned, and give way to co-operation. We must learn that we do not enhance the value of our own estates by keeping that of our neighbor a field of sedge grass and poisonous exhalations.

There will be no occasion for panics when business men learn to support each other by the application of an easily perfected system of co-operation, and there will be no room for almshouses if the working-classes and others can be brought to discover that the best way to tax the community for charitable objects is in the first case of production. In a strictly economical point of view, it will be better to pay a little higher for the necessaries and luxuries of life when the increased cost will enable us to reduce the taxes for the support of a police force by one-half or two-thirds, and abolish our institutions of charity altogether. It is very extravagant to pay out so much money as we are annually called upon to disburse for the support of paupers, the sick, the lame and the afflicted in all ways, when the only result of our sacrifice is the perpetuation of a system which fosters crime. It is worse than extravagant, too, to permit the constantly recurring checks to our material progress when, at the end of every few years, we see the almost total prostration of our industrial interests in a general panic ruin.

The world is not far from a social system as nearly perfect as the present condition of the race will permit. Let us only build upon the foundations already laid, and we shall see an edifice strong enough to defy adversity, and capacious enough to embrace within its shelter nearly all those who are now outcast and proscribed from the rolls of honorable citizenship.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE new Liberal Ministry has already succeeded in getting into trouble through the imprudence of Mr. Gladstone. In one of his electioneering speeches it will be remembered that he made some remarks about the Austrian Government which excited considerable indignation at Vienna. After the Conservatives were defeated and Gladstone had accepted the Premiership, Count Karolyi, the Austrian Ambassador in London, thought proper to remonstrate with Lord Granville, the new Secretary for Foreign Affairs, over those utterances of Mr. Gladstone. Lord Granville thereupon assured the Count that England was most cordially disposed towards Austria, and Mr. Gladstone, not satisfied with this, sat down and wrote an apologetic letter to Count Karolyi, withdrawing or modifying all his former statements. Of course it was quite right that Mr. Gladstone should correct rash statements made in the heat of an election, and before he had any Government appointment; but England has become accustomed to a different sort of foreign policy under the Conservatives, and the Liberal Government has already suffered in the popular estimation from this retraction.

One of the first signs of this rising discontent, and an excellent example of how easily public opinion changes in England, is to be found in the defeat of Sir William Vernon Harcourt at Oxford. Vernon Harcourt, who is a prominent lawyer, and was Attorney-General under Mr. Gladstone's last administration, is well known here as the author of the famous letter signed "Historicus," and published in the London Times. He was elected for Oxford at the late general election, and was appointed Home Secretary by Mr. Gladstone. Acceptance of office in England necessitates a further appeal to one's constituents, and when Sir William ran again for Oxford he was defeated by fifty-four votes by a Mr. Hall, a Conservative, who at the general election was defeated by one hundred and twelve votes. The loss of Harcourt's debating powers in the House of Commons is a matter of little moment, for the Liberals are very strong in this respect; but the blow to the "great Liberal victory" is a severe one. He will probably stand before long for some other constituency where his election will be certain.

The affairs of the Land Leaguers and Home Rulers in Ireland are becoming more and more troublesome, and the factions into which the Irish politicians have split threaten to cause infinite annoyance in Parliament. Mr. Parnell has struck out a new programme for himself and his five-and-twenty irreconcilables. He will oppose all Governments until the entire land of Ireland is taken away from those to whom it belongs and handed over to those who wish to take it from them. He is no believer in the Tenant Right that the ordinary Home Rulers desire. There must be no need for Tenant Right, for there must be no tenants, no landlords. Strange to say, the very strength of Mr. Parnell is due to the absurdity of his proposals, for the other Irish party which has been beaten by the Parnellites was afraid to formulate this programme in its absurd enormity. Mr. Shaw, the leader of the Home Rulers, lately made a speech at Cork, in which he said that if the Liberals would make certain concessions to the Irish party, he would support all the Government measures. Until the rise of Parnell and his party, the Roman Catholic clergy gave their support to the so-called National party, but since the new crusade has been preached they have denounced Parnell and his motley crew of Communists and Fenians.

The Spanish Government is busily engaged with the affairs of Cuba. A number of persons who were formerly engaged in other rebellions have taken up arms and landed in Cuba, near Santiago, under the leadership of Calixto Garcia. Rumors of armed ships starting from the United States add to the embarrassment of the Government at Madrid, and a long, tedious and bloody struggle will most likely convulse the "Pearl of the Antilles." It was feared that the promulgation of the law giving the slaves their freedom might cause some disturbance among the negroes, but it seems to have passed off quietly. The large plantation owners do not care, as they have for a long time paid their slaves more than the law requires them to do; but persons with small incomes in the towns will suffer considerably, as they were accustomed to let out their slave service.

The outlook in Russia is daily becoming darker and less promising. The Czar, since the late attempt to blow up the Winter Palace, is in a constant state of nervous excitement, and the health of the Empress, always bad, is now so poor that her death may occur at any moment. Negotiations have been entered into with the Pope, and his Nuncio and the Russian representative are at present engaged at Vienna in discussing some arrangement. Even the army has become an object of suspicion, and Count Loris Melikoff has ordered a Cossack regiment from Moscow to St. Petersburg to do guard duty in the Palace, as the regiment which had been on service there could no longer be trusted. Meanwhile the Nihilists are unceasing in their efforts to gain their ends. The platform, which has just been published by the Narodnaja Wola states that, among other things, the object of the Nihilists is to wrench power from the existing Government and to give it to an Assembly elected by the freely expressed voice of the people; to obtain a radical reform of the land tenure in favor of the peasantry; to acquire universal suffrage and entire freedom of conscience, of speech, of publication, of meeting, and of electorial agitation. By themselves these objects are in no respect wrong, but so much cannot be said for the means by which it is proposed to attain them. Among the latter are to be found active propaganda and agitation; active destruction and terror; the organization of secret societies; the organization and development of rebellion. With energetic adversaries to carry out this programme, it is scarcely possible that the Czar will spend the remainder of his life in ease.

A curious performance was lately given in London when Emil Augier's drama, "l'Aventurière," was played in French by an English company. The principal female part was taken by an American, Miss Genevieve Ward. The attempt to give plays in French with an English company is ridiculous. In the first place there is no audience even in London to support a real French company, and in the next place there are no English artists who speak French without a certain accent and awkwardness of expression. It is to be hoped that this new idea will not spread to us.

A good story is told about the Prince of Wales during his last visit to Paris. The Prince had just taken a Turkish bath, and was waiting for some of the employés to rub him down. Seeing a tall, dark man standing by, and thinking that it was one of the servants, he tapped him on the shoulder, saying, "If you are the shampooer, I am your man!" The other naked man turned angrily round, and the Prince found himself face-to-face with Don Carlos.

The revolt of the Albanians against the Turkish authority is becoming a serious matter. Albania has a population of from a million and a half to two million souls, the males being fierce and warlike, and all entertaining a deadly hatred of the Turks. They now threaten to invade Montenegro, having flatly refused to surrender to the latter the strip of territory ceded by the Berlin Congress, and the indications are that a collision cannot be avoided. If the Turkish power over the province shall be finally and utterly broken, the result will be only a just punishment of the treachery of that worst of modern Governments.

A CITY paper, which strongly favors the nomination of General Grant for President, objects to Secretary Sherman on the ground that he has a discreditable brother-in-law. One would suppose that, judged by that standard, Grant is about the most objectionable candidate who could possibly be named.

THE unit-rule delegations to the Chicago Convention are compared, not inaptly, to a choice lot of live eels, so hopelessly tangled that nobody can determine which is the head and which the tail of the same eel. And it may be added that all are so slippery, it would be impossible to hold any one of them even if the head and tail question could be satisfactorily settled.

THE French Government adheres to its purpose to expel all unauthorized religious confraternities. Instructions which it is now privately imparting to provincial prefects contemplate a strict compliance with the law, but no unnecessary harshness will be permitted in their enforcement. The confraternities are preparing to test the validity of the Act, and in this course they have the approval of the Catholic bishops.

THE indications are that the coming season will be one of general and marked prosperity at all our prominent Summer resorts. At Long Branch, the demand for cottage and hotel accommodations is without precedent in recent years, while at other New Jersey coast resorts the promise of an increased number of visitors is especially encouraging. From Newport, Saratoga and elsewhere similarly cheering reports are made, and it is quite apparent that, with returning business prosperity, our people are disposed to enjoy themselves freely in leisurely Summer recreation.

ACCORDING to a statement recently communicated to Congress, the number of Army officers on the retired list is 397, of whom 5 are major-generals, 18 brigadier-generals, 59 colonels, 49 majors, and 132 captains. The aggregate amount paid to officers on the retired list, in service on the 31st of December last, is $5,910,378, and the amount paid officers formerly on the retired list, but not in service, on the same date, is $1,639,323, making the aggregate paid retired officers since the creation of the retired list $7,549,701. Of this amount $241,572 is paid to major-generals.

THE United States District Attorney for this District has made complaint, at the instance of Collector Merritt, against fifteen steamships for carrying passengers in excess of the number allowed by law. The overcrowding of vessels carrying immigrants has been especially notable during the present season, the excess in some cases amounting to nearly 300 persons, in a total of from 1,200 to 1,500 passengers. Where it shall appear that the law has been deliberately and recklessly violated, the penalty, which is a fine of fifty dollars for each passenger, and imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months, should be promptly enforced.

THE failure of Congress to provide for the maintenance of the United States Courts is already producing serious embarrassment. In this city Judge Benedict, last week, discharged the United States Court jurors, saying there was no money to pay them for further services. The District Attorney had fifty-five cases on the calendar, none of which, of course, could be called. The fund for the support of Government prisoners is exhausted, and the keepers of jails must, therefore, board them at their own present expense or turn them loose upon the community. As to the Federal marshals, they have had no pay for eleven months. The failure of Congress to act in the matter is the more inexcusable from the fact that it was officially informed two months ago of the practical exhaustion of the funds.

THE returns to the British Board of Trade show that during last year 1,032 lives were lost through railroad accidents in Great Britain. The most prolific cause of accidents was that of collisions between passenger and freight trains, of which 95 were reported. In 71 cases accidents were caused by trains leaving the track. The loss of life from causes other than accidents to trains was surprisingly large. Under this head we find that 504 people were killed, 85 of whom were passengers. This leaves a balance of 419 railway servants who were killed whilst they were pursuing their ordinary duties. Certainly these statistics cannot be said to show that English railway management is in anywise safer or more prudent and efficient than our own, with which it is so often favorably contrasted.

THE third-term managers in Chicago were badly beaten in the election of delegates to the Republican State Convention, and thereupon withdrew from the Cook County Convention and set up on their own account. They still pretend that Grant will secure the State delegation, but should he do so, his opponents will carry the question into the National Convention, and disintegration and discord in the party canvass will be inevitable. It is a notable incident of the struggle that Grant was defeated in his own Congressional district, which will send Blaine delegates to the National Convention, and Senator Logan, the chief of the third-term faction, was defeated in his own ward in Chicago. The vote of the latter at the primaries was 314 for a third term and 468 against it. The effect of the Grant bolt in Illinois is already felt in other States, where defections from his ranks are reported daily. His nomination now would mean positive defeat, and possibly the loss of his own State to the Republicans.

AMERICAN manufacturers have many reasons to be gratified with the results of the recent International Exhibition in Sydney, Australia. In a number of classes the highest awards were taken by the American exhibitors, and in one instance, that of Fairbanks & Co., scale manufacturers, a special distinction, in addition to the first prize, was recommended—a triumph which will be better appreciated when it is known that nearly all the other scale manufacturers of the world were competitors. Among the other American exhibitors who won first prizes at Sydney are William Sellers & Co., of Philadelphia, for railway turn-tables; H. Disston & Sons, Philadelphia, saws; R. Hoe & Co., of New York, printing presses; Russell & Erwin, of this city, bronze goods, and the Wamsutta Cotton Mills, of New Bedford. The H. W. Johns manufacturing company, of this city, were also awarded a prize for their asbestos felting and boiler-covering.

THE belief that there is an alarming and progressive increase in the consumption of intoxicating liquors in England, is not sustained by recent statistics. These statistics, supplied by an advocate of teetotalism, show that while in 1878 £142,188,900 were spent in drink, in 1879 the sum debited to the national tippling account was only £128,143,864. Thus in one year there has been a falling-off in the consumption of beer, wine, and spirits represented by £14,045,036, or, to put it in another way, the nation drank in 1879 9·8 per cent. less than it did in 1878. And this diminution does not appear to have been caused by bad trade and the reduced means of the people. The returns show that in spite of bad trade there is no decline in the consumption of other articles which are just as much "luxuries" as beer or whisky. In fact, an increase in the consumption of non-intoxicating luxuries has been going on side by side with the decrease in the use of intoxicants.

THE work which is being done for the reformation of the sea-going classes by the American Seamen's Friend Society is strikingly exhibited in the last annual report of that organization. The special effort of the society is to reach and influence seamen, not only in port, but abroad upon the seas, wherever wind and wave may carry them. To this end, they are liberally supplied with reading matter of a useful and entertaining character. Last year, 866 libraries were sent out on vessels carrying 12,171 men, making the total number of new libraries sent out since the work was begun, twenty-two years ago, 6,799, containing 376,472 volumes, and accessible through frequent reshipments to 266,466 men. The libraries shipped in the United States Navy have reached the number of 913, and these have been accessible on different vessels to 104,058 men. The sailor, exposed to peculiar hazards and temptations, has special need of the sympathy and help which this Society seems to afford, and the statement of the results of its labors should command for it a larger interest than has been heretofore manifested in commercial quarters.

THE progress already made by the Metropolitan Museum of Art may fairly be accepted as prophetic of greater achievements still to come. In the brief period of ten years the Museum has acquired a size and character which many older institutions were five times as long in attaining; it has a building thoroughly furnished and equipped, and is so rapidly growing that, liberal as is the space at its command, thousands of interesting objects are necessarily stored away out of sight for want of room properly to display them. Its possessions include the second Cesnola collection, the Avery collection of Oriental porcelain, and a choice collection of old Venetian glass presented by Mr. Henry G. Marquand. The latter is the first collection of the kind ever made in America, and it is hoped that it will form the nucleus for an exceedingly valuable exhibit. The same gentleman has also presented the Museum with a collection of ancient American pottery vases from the homes of the mound-builders. There are now two art-schools in connection with the Museum—one of general drawing and one in metal-work. A building to be used as an art-school will be erected on First Avenue by Mr. Richard T. Auchmutz, who will also for three years defray the expenses of a technical school, all under the direction of the trustees of the Museum. The running expenses of the Museum last year were $20,503.

H. R. H. PRINCE LEOPOLD.

LEOPOLD GEORGE DUNCAN ALBERT, K. G., K. T., Duke of Saxony, Prince of Coburg and Gotha, the youngest son of Queen Victoria, who is now on his way for a visit to Canada and the United States, was born April 7th, 1853. Owing to feeble health, Prince Leopold has been unable to win popularity by frequent appearances in public, but nature, as if to compensate him for bodily weakness, endowed him, more than any of his brothers, with his father's thoughtful and scholarly habits of mind, and the modified form of university life which he passed at Oxford seemed exactly suited to his genius and temperament. His slight form was constantly seen in the lecture-hall, at the debating club, and at the musical gathering, in the last of which, whether as an instrumentalist or vocalist, he was, like his late father, qualified to render no mean assistance. Should his life be spared, and should improved health accompany the full attainment of manhood, it seems highly probable that the peculiar excellences of Prince Albert's career will be reproduced in that of his youngest son.

The young Prince will be accompanied on his travels by his constant friend and confidant, Hon. Alec Yorke, and his private medical attendant, Mr. Rhyl. The party will first go to Canada, staying for a short time with the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne. Prince Leopold has often promised the Princess to pay her a visit at her Canadian home, but he has not hitherto been able to carry out his wishes. Since the accident to the Princess, Prince Leopold has become anxious about his favorite sister's health, and is more than ever desirous of seeing her. From Ottawa the Prince and his suite, as at present arranged, will come to the United States; go West, touching at St. Louis, Chicago; and then to Cincinnati, returning by way of Washington to New York, which city His Royal Highness is particularly eager to see. The Prince will reach Newport in the season. It has been resolved to abandon the original intention of visiting California. It was the first intention of Prince Leopold to be away on this tour some twelve months, but he has limited the duration of his absence to about four months. Much will depend upon the condition of his health, which the tour will, it is hoped, materially strengthen. Prince Leopold, in undertaking this tour, is actuated by no other desire than that of seeing the New World and gathering fresh experiences by the way.

CHAPTER I.—A CHILD OF FATE.

OUR scene is that most fashionable of English watering places — Brighton Beach. The tranquil waters of the Channel stretch afar off and meet the distance; along the beach stroll a few stolid Britons—it is an unfashionable hour; overhead glimmers the sunny radiance of a Summer day, though in the west are gathering dark clouds that will soon vanquish the treacherous sun. But madly indifferent to these tokens of approaching storm, a man stands motionless upon the sands—a man with a slim, courtly figure. His face is peculiarly striking, strong, dark, powerful, with a chill, haughty beauty that has been detrimental to the heart of more than one court belle; features straight and dusk, eyes black as sloes, and mouth with deep, firm lines—a mouth that can grow cold and pitiless in a desperate resolve, a brutal lust, or smile with the sunny, sensuous sweetness of a woman. It is a face filled with ice and hauteur, yet one that bespeaks fierce, swift passions beneath the frigid exterior—the face of a man whose mistress is Power, who disdains love as the plaything of fools; who looks upon all men as clay to be fashioned to his purpose—strong, dominant, unyielding.

He stands now motionless as a bronze statue, his gaze fixed upon a French bonne and her charge, who, a short distance off, are engaged in a fierce altercation. It has been waging for an hour, and for that same length of time has he stood and watched. He sees that the child is the incarnation of human stubbornness. She stands firmly in the sands like a small rock, a cool, resolute, disdainful light in her small face, while her French enemy threatens, expostulates and beseeches. Somehow his sympathies have gone over to the woman; the child's attitude is aggressive and rouses in him a corresponding spirit of determination. There is something in his nature to which triumph and power are essential, and he is keenly alive to an insane desire to subdue the steady will, the tempestuous spirit of the small foe. The rain, now commencing to fall—the clouds having by this time obscured the sun—gives him a pretense for interfering. With tightly-closed lips he joins his belligerent companions. The Frenchwoman, almost reduced to tears, breaks into a long harangue, assisted by a vigorous pantomime which is intended to petition his assistance. The child stands mute and defiant, a dogged pride, a spirit of fierce rebellion in her countenance, while the bonne continues to traduce her.

The truth of the matter is, they are both to blame—perhaps the woman is a trifle more in fault. Yet, despite the keen, subtle intellect of the statesman, the man is firmly persuaded that the bonne is the one who, by right of the injured party, should demand his sympathy.

"Will you give me your version of the story?" he says, at last turning to the child. But the thin, beautifully-shaped lips are mute as stone, thereby ratifying the bond of silent enmity that has come between them.

Into the stormy nature of the small culprit with its hidden intricacies has entered a sudden fierce hatred of this man, who confronts her in his superior calm; her tiny hands clinch and her breast heaves. This may be caused by that swift, keen instinct—possessed to a remarkable degree in one so young—which apprizes her of his unfriendly judgment. For himself, he is remarkably influenced by so trifling a circumstance. He tells himself that for him, with his worldly distinction and in the full crown of a free and haughty manhood, there should be nothing attractive in the dispute of a tyrannical nursemaid and an ungovernable child. Yet in some strange, unaccountable way he is attracted, and in his breast are sown the bitter seeds of a weary, life-long feud. And as she stands before him now in her brief years, so may there come a time in the distant future when she shall again confront him, awaiting his judgment. And as he renders it now unjustly, trifling as is the circumstance, so may he also, in that greater matter which shall govern their lives, again condemn her in injustice.

There are times in every life when the higher, finer portion of its nature asserts itself through a vague consciousness of things to come, as if the impenetrable curtain of the future were rolled briefly aside; but such glimpses, such convictions, are invariably attended with indefinable forebodings. Something of this peculiar sensation has fastened upon the man as he studies the child. She is, he should judge, between eight and ten years old. Her head is beautifully shaped; her hair wondrous long, silken, and of a peculiar dead-gold hue; her features straight and perfect like chiseled stone, her limbs lithe and replete with a stag-like grace. But it is her eyes that startle him, holding him almost powerless in his wondering admiration. They are dark, deep and lustrous, with the liquid beauty of a beast, irradiated with the proud, grand, fearless soul of a martyr. Large and mysterious, they yet hold a spirit which, at the completion of its strength, could go through flames to attain its goal. In that small, fierce, upturned face misfortune is written plainly; he sees it even while that spirit of strife and a half-brutal thirst for power—not over the child, but that spirit that shines forth through her eyes—fasten upon him never to be appeased.

The rain increases. In the face of the bonne is a terror of anxiety for her smart attire. She looks beseechingly at her adversary.

"Come, mademoiselle," she says, relaxing into a tone of treacherous sweetness, "come, ma chère, bon enfant, we shall go now, chère; it do rain so!"

"That's very well done—very well," sneers the relentless enemy; "but a moment ago, before he came," jerking her head towards the motionless man, "I was a beast, a little devil!" It is the first time that she has spoken. Her voice is clear, sharp, defiant, yet even now through it vibrates a flute-like Grecian sweetness that, as her years increase, may develop into a melody more alluring than the siren on her Caprian shore.

"It is raining, and the shower has but begun," he says, in that chill, powerful voice that few have ever had the courage to resist, "You must either permit me to call a carriage or seek shelter for you around here."

She deigns no reply; but with one swift, defiant flash from her half closed, treacherously-indifferent eyes, she deliberately sinks down upon the sands, and in a thousand little ways signifies her intention of making a prolonged stay.

The thunder and lightning are intense—the heavens threatening a deluge. The Frenchwoman bursts into tears—only partly genuine—and the man looks undecided. But it is a situation that demands speedy action. A short distance off is an ornamental beach-house; to this edifice he turns his hopes of refuge. Glancing towards it, he says to the maid: "Run!" and she does run, with a swiftness that for a moment holds him amazed. Then he turns to that mite of rebellion in the sands. Without one word, and to her everlasting mortification, he gathers her up as if she were a wet rag, and with almost as great a display of undignified haste as the woman, speeds to the shelter. When he gains the refuge he places his burden upon a bench with an amused smile, which, it is needless to say, in her present white heat she fails to return.

Time passes. A supreme silence inwraps them. The maid stands in one corner, in a thoroughly damp and degenerate condition, for, although shielded from the full force of the rain, a stiff breeze blows from the sea, bearing with it an unpleasant and detrimental moisture to those prizing outward adornment. The child sits mute and motionless as stone, never by any chance permitting her gaze to rest upon the man whom she considers her mortal enemy. Regarding her closely, he observes that a bluish tinge is creeping around her lips, and that a shiver occasionally convulses her small form.

If her straight and perfect features had allowed any doubt as to her extraction, he would have confirmation strong as to her nationality in this marked susceptibility to the slight chill in the atmosphere brought with the rain. Her Greek blood speaks out in this as in her perfect loveliness. This delicate organization is incomprehensible to him, with his knowledge of Russian Winters and icy climates, yet he takes off his coat and folds it around her. She submits, but never deigns to notice him.

And now the strength of the shower is spent. The rain begins to show some indecision: the clouds hurry across the heavens, as though to get out of sight, and the sun condescends to show itself. So, after all this row, the elements subside and nature adjusts herself, and the second deluge is still in the future. But the amount of mischief it has done the poor, drenched Frenchwoman is appalling, and she gazes in despair at her washed-out condition.

The man regards his charges in some perplexity. Just then, coming adown the beach-track which leads by their retreat, he sees a carriage. The horses step daintily on the wet sand, the harness gleaming proudly in the friendly sun. The coachman sits erect in an aggravating state of dryness, so does and is the footman. The top of the carriage is thrown far back, and upon the soft cushions reclines a lady in the daintiest of dry attire, holding above her head a costly trifle of a parasol.

Coming as it does after this severe wetting, it is a sight calculated to inspire envy in the soul of a saint—provided that saint stood in very moist garments, with streams of water that claimed their source from the dripping crown of his degenerate hat, terminating in ornamental pools at his heels. And in gloomy discontent—for once united in one common cause—the trio regard this peculiarly exasperating spectacle as it advances with stately precision. As it reaches them his companions suddenly become galvanized, and, rushing out, intercepts the carriage. Then follows a shrill war of words from the maid, while the lady leans forward in her carriage attentive and contemplative, anon giving vent to feminine exclamations of horror at the moist condition of her companion. Again the Frenchwoman is evidently successful, for that lovely apparition in silk and lace grows more and more shocked, and a perfect shower of reproachful glances are directed to the child.

"What is to become of you?" she gasps, raising her jeweled vinaigrette. "You are a very, very naughty girl not to obey Celeste;" and, conscious that she has discharged her duty, she sinks back in the carriage, motioning the pedestrians to enter.

"Celeste is a nasty, vile thing," cries the child, in a sudden, stormy burst of passion. "She tells lies—you know she does, Gypsy—yet you believe her against me."

Without the slightest attention to the child, the maid resumes her narrative in an undertone, at the termination of which the soft, blue eyes of "Gypsy" are raised to contemplate the slightly embarrassed and wholly uncomfortable stranger.

"So kind of you," says the sweetest voice in the world. "This naughty girl gets us into so much trouble. Celeste has explained, and I never can thank you. Won't you let me pick you up and drive you home? It would be such a pleasure. And are you not very uncomfortable?"

This last remark, made with an innocent expansion of the blue eyes, does not tend to soothe the ruffled temper of the coatless stranger. To the contrary, he is instantly seized with the conviction that he is looking infinitely worse than is the actual case. Battling with a fierce desire to wipe away a huge drop of water which, with offensive familiarity, persists in adorning his nose, he manages to lift his wet and limp hat—does it, too, with such a courtly grace, despite the depressing influence of his surroundings, as to complete his captivation of the lovely woman.

He thanks her in a few words, declining her kindness, and the observant woman speedily notes that his speech is broken with a charming accent; then, as they drive off, gets into his discarded coat with something like a curse, and starts down the beach towards his hotel.

CHAPTER II.—"A WOMAN WITHOUT VICES."

"WHO is that lady?" The somewhat eager question comes from the Russian Ambassador as he and his friend, a young English lord, stand viewing the brilliant spectacle presented by the ballroom of the most fashionable hotel of Brighton. The interest in the usually cold, inflexible tones causes the Englishman to crane his neck and gaze in the direction indicated. Then he says, with a start:

"That? Why—well, upon my soul! Have you been in England two weeks and don't know her yet? Why, man, that's Jack Ashhurst's wife."

"Still, after this very lucid explanation," says the Russian, "I am bound to say that I have no more knowledge of Jack Ashhurst and his wife than I have of the man in the moon."

"And been in Brighton four days," ejaculates the astounded Briton. "By gad! I thought I introduced you long ago. Lady Ashhurst is the greatest belle of the season. She took the world by storm five years ago, when Jack brought her home his wife, and has never relinquished her throne. Never knew much about her antecedents, but a beauty like hers is a more powerful backer than fifty grandfathers. Jack used to travel a good deal, and he picked her up abroad somewhere. She is the loveliest creature alive. Not a man in the set but has been dead gone on her, and is even now her slave," the faintest shadow crosses the fine frank visage of the speaker, showing that he is one of the slain of Jack Ashhurst's wife. "She's fashionable but not heartless, good-natured but not a fool; her greatest enemy could never call her a prude, yet in the five years that she has queened it over society, against her a word of scandal has never been whispered. She's a wonderful woman."

"Truly, most wonderful," remarks he who has listened to this category of virtues, and his voice holds a suspicion of chill sarcasm. "But she would be much more interesting—more on a level with us, you know—if of her you had a few vices to relate."

"Sorry I can't oblige you," says Chetewood, nonchalantly, all traces of that deeper feeling which still clungs to him amid his worldliness vanished. "She's not a woman with vices—is Jack Ashhurst's wife."

"Then she deserves extinction," observes the foreigner. "A woman with an exemplary (outward) life, with an unimpeachable character, is fit to be translated. Another thing, my dear fellow, you will generally find such people hypocrites and terribly disagreeable!"

In a moment Lord Chetewood is a lively purple, and his eyes flash with genuine indignation.

"Disagreeable—Lady Ashhurst!" he cries, wrathfully. Then overcome with the idea he throws back his handsome blonde head and bursts into a laugh. "What rank heresy!" he says, when he can speak; "but you will be punished for it. I give you one week to be madly, desperately in love with Lady Ashhurst. It is the fate of every man who goes near her:" unconsciously Chetewood's tones grow gloomy. "Disagreeable! She is ravishing, entrancing, that is all!"

The thin lips of the "heretic" curl in just the slightest sneer, while his eyes grow chill and contemptuous. Strong, indeed, must be that emotion kindled by a woman that can thaw the icy barriers that this man has set up in his soul between himself and all semblance of weakness.

"And what of Jack Ashhurst?" he says, refraining, through some unaccountable cause, to mention his meeting with Lady Ashhurst upon the beach in the morning, when he endeavored to save her child and her maid from a wetting.

"Jack is a peer; but, Lord! nobody ever thinks of giving him his titles, though they are the proudest in the land. He's no end of a good fellow. If it were anybody else, the husband of Lady Ashhurst would have been killed long ago; but, gad! one couldn't hate Jack. To save his soul he couldn't scare up an enemy. He's got lots of money—one of the biggest fortunes in England; but he don't go in much for society, though the freedom he allows his wife is simply marvelous. She has her house in London; he his shooting boxes all over the country, and everybody's welcome. His wine-cellar—there isn't its equal in England; and his horses are known pretty much all over the continent. He is a handsome, jolly, hail-fellow-well met sort of a dog, with a heart as big as his purse. But——"

"Well," says the foreigner, questioningly.

"To his intimate friends," continues Chetewood, slowly, "it is pretty well known that Jack is growing too fond of his cups. Pity! He's the most enviable man I know; lives on the best terms with his wife, whom he is a deal fonder of than his best horse, which is saying a good deal. And she's as fond of him as he is of her, though he's old enough to be her father. She isn't a day over twenty."

Again that chill cynicism flashes into the deep eyes of the foreigner, but he is silent, looking steadily at the object of their discussion. The dance has ceased, and she stands but a short distance removed from him. In stature she is slender and exceedingly graceful. She is beautiful, radiant! Her hair is soft brown, rich; complexion dazzlingly white, with a rare, deep color in her cheeks that her bitterest enemy could never call artificial; eyes long, almond-shaped, but unlike eyes of that characteristic, a wondrous azure, like the blue skies above; mouth full, beautiful, with a suggestion of sensuality in the ripe, red lips, around which are also lines that, to this man, with his almost unnatural swiftness in reading human nature, indicate weakness of some kind in the hidden and unknown soul of this woman.

Yes, she is beautiful—dangerously so; with a soft, slumbering, sensuous grace that he well knows must be maddening to the unhappy rivals of Jack Ashhurst. Yet it is not a beauty that could imprison his soul in its thraldom. Despite the eulogies lavished upon her by her admirers, the lady does not impress him favorably. She may be fascinating and irreproachable; she may be perfection, as was so recently ardently affirmed, still, there is that line of weakness in her face, now partially concealed by the matchless witcheries of youth, which he would not have in the face of any woman he would make his wife. He looks at the soft shining of her azure eyes, at the full, rich lips, at the sweeping, sensuous contour of her rounded throat. Yes, she is ravishingly beautiful; but as she is now set apart from other women by right of her matchless loveliness, so may there come a time when she will be distinguished from others by a deeper, deadlier brand than the mere title of her transcendent beauty. Then, too, he does not, as a rule, like women without origin.

As he gazes at her, standing in her shining robes and youthful witchery, slowly but surely deepens upon him the conviction that, though she is beautiful as an angel, she is totally lacking in moral grandeur; that there is in her nature no standard of high principle, no upreaching of the spirit, no wonderful capabilities of soul-power; but, to the contrary, a moral cowardice—as yet, perhaps, undeveloped—united to that terrible weakness—the hidden phase of her character of which he has that great and nameless horror.

Then, in sudden contrast to her own, flashes across his memory the vision of a pair of eyes, deep with the glory of martyrdom, the spirit of abnegation, the strength of a wondrous power, though still slumbering. Suddenly he turns to his companion.

"Is there not a child connected with them?" he says, carelessly.

"Yes. Lady Ashhurst, or Gypsy, as her intimate friends are permitted to call her, adopted one soon after her marriage, I believe. She is very fond of her and couldn't treat her differently if she were her own by blood instead of law."

After this they both wander off, and it is noticeable that the foreigner makes no request for an introduction to Clair, Lady of Ashhurst.

CHAPTER III.—HE IS INTRODUCED TO JACK ASHHURST'S WIFE.

"LORD CHETEWOOD, who is that gentleman whom I saw you talking to a little while ago?" says Jack Ashhurst's wife to the young peer, whom she has made superlatively happy by consenting to dance with him twice in succession.

"That," says Chetewood, airily, "oh—he's the great Russian lion, Toboskie."

Gypsy gives a start and her eyes sparkle.

"What! that Count Toboskie, the Russian Ambassador?" she says, with the most lively accents.

"The same."

"Oh, Dredmond!" It is an unwonted condescension to have Jack Ashhurst's wife call a man by his Christian name, and under this rare favor Dredmond Chetewood pales perceptibly, so hopelessly passionate is this young lord. "Oh, Dredmond, couldn't you get me an introduction? He is an elegant-looking man. Look, Dred, don't you think there is something positively regal in the way he carries his head?"

This, of course, is exceedingly cheerful for Lord Chetewood. His feelings sink to zero, and he is instantly plunged in one of his choicest tempers. As may be supposed, he is not in a mood to look with favor upon a man praised by the woman he hopelessly loves, notwithstanding that man is his oldest friend. The consequence is, he glares at Toboskie in anything but tender admiration.

"Can't say that I see anything remarkable," he says, and his voice is even more disparaging than his words.

"Then I think you must be blind," says Lady Ashhurst, with what, to Lord Chetewood, is unnecessary warmth. "I think him the handsomest man I ever saw—quite!"

Silence.

"Could you, now, Dredie, get me an introduction?" this with the faintest suspicion of coaxing in the sweet tones.

"I suppose I might," says Lord Chetewood, sulkily; "don't see any earthly reason why I shouldn't, since his father and mine are oldest friends, and Toboskie and I spent five years together at a German university."

"No!" she cries, in delight, totally ignoring his ungraciousness. Then rewards him for his proffered kindness with a little gush of confidence, in which she relates the adventure upon the beach. But Lord Chetewood fails to see anything remarkably funny in the recital, and absolutely refuses to smile, much to his companion's disgust.

When she is through, he cannot forbear a dirty fling.

"Toboskie," he says, with suspicious carelessness, "is not of the sort to be soft on women."

"No?" smoothly.

"We were talking of you when you observed us. I gave him every chance to ask for an introduction, but he wouldn't take it."

"I know I shall like that man," says Jack Ashhurst's wife, with offensive cheerfulness. "I always adore those kind of men! There is something so undignified, so little, in a man trotting all over a ballroom begging for introductions to every woman he sees." Lady Ashhurst now speaks severely, and is flagrantly unjust in her insinuation. Unhappy Lord Chetewood grows black with rage.

"Am I to understand——" he begins, wrathfully, when Jack Ashhurst's wife lays her small hand upon his arm.

"There, Dredie," she says, in a whisper. "Now is your chance: beckon him over!"

Thus commanded, Chetewood nods rather curtly, it must be confessed, to Toboskie, who stands a short distance off, and intimates to him that he may join them. Thus besieged, the ambassador has no alternative but to obey.

"Lady Ashhurst, my friend, Count Toboskie."

It is a very brief introduction that Chetewood gets through, but it suffices.

Gypsy smiles adorably at the courtly man towering above her, with just a shy consciousness of the past to complete her fascination. The ambassador bows low over the hand which Chetewood remembers with a pang she gives to very few people, and tells her how happy he is to make her acquaintance.

Savage and disconsolate, Dredmond takes himself off. The two thus left together drift into a gay conversation. Both are witty, brilliant and intelligent. Finally, leaving brighter and heavier topics, they come back to that meeting upon the beach.

"That child is sure to get every one in trouble who goes near her," says Gypsy, with a laugh.

"She is a very lovely child, and very like her mother," says Toboskie, with treacherous carelessness.

Jack Ashhurst's wife gives a convulsive little start and stares at her companion, then breaks into a gay laugh.

"Did you think I was her mother?"

"Are you not?" with disgraceful duplicity.

"No!"

"You amaze me!"

Gypsy laughs. "She is only my adopted child, but, of course, that makes no difference," she says, and settles herself for a long speech. "You must know I was nothing but a child when Jack married me," this is not said with any pretensions to youth. He knows, suspicious as he is of her, that she has spoken truly. Looking steadily downwards into that upturned countenance, with its matchless loveliness, he sees that there is not the slightest trace of age—nothing but a wondrous, lovely youth, more radiant than the blossoms of Spring. "I was nothing but a child, and I shall always suspect that poor, dear Jack was afraid to take me home to England, after defying all the conventional rules of his country by marrying a baby, and a foreign one, too; for, although my parents were English, I was born in Cuba, where Jack found me. So we traveled for a couple of years. And when we were in Greece we stumbled upon this lovely child. She was then about two years old and a born Greek. Jack was seized with a violent fancy for her, so was I. She being friendless and living upon charity, there was nothing to prevent our legally adopting her, which we did. Now you have her history, which I felt bound to give you, because you were so kind to her that day of the rain." She smiles up at him, a wondrous, dazzling smile, and through his veins shoots one swift flame of fire as he looks down in the alluring eyes, and his breath comes sharply.

POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

HON. THOMAS F. BAYARD, OF DELAWARE.

WHILE the State of Delaware is territorially inconsiderable in extent, it has for many years outweighed many of the largest and most populous commonwealths in the councils of the nation. This circumstance, at once so creditable and universal, is due entirely to the personal character, ability and force of the men who have represented the State in the United States Senate, among whom the subject of this sketch is confessedly conspicuous. The present Senator, Thomas F. Bayard, is the grandson of James Ashton Bayard, whose father was John Bayard, distinguished in the Revolutionary period as a patriot of singular purity and disinterestedness. It was with James Ashton Bayard that the senatorial line of his family commenced. He was chosen to Congress in 1796, and served until 1803 as an acknowledged leader of the old Federal party. He was sent to the United States Senate in 1806, and served there until 1813. He declined the mission to France offered to him by Mr. Adams in 1801 and confirmed to him by the Senate, but served as a joint commissioner with Adams, Clay, Gallatin and Russell in negotiating the Treaty of Ghent, which was concluded in December, 1814. He was then appointed Minister to Russia, but declined that office also; and while busy with the details of a commercial treaty with Great Britain was taken sick, and returned home in a national vessel to die in sight of his native shores. The public place held by him was next filled by his son, Richard H. Bayard, who was chosen Senator in 1836 and again in 1841, and who was sent as Minister to Belgium in 1850. The third Senator in the line was James A. Bayard, father of the present Senator. He represented Delaware in the Senate from 1851 to 1864, when he resigned, although he had just been elected to serve for a third term. Nevertheless, in 1867, he was appointed by the Governor of Delaware to fill the unexpired term of Senator Riddle, and, retiring finally in 1869, was succeeded by his son, Thomas Francis Bayard, in whom the courtesy and integrity of the father and the political genius of the grandfather are united with the disinterested chivalry and high courage characteristic of all the race.

Thomas Francis Bayard was born in Wilmington, Del., October 29th, 1828. He was educated mainly at the celebrated Flushing School established by Dr. E. L. Hawks, of New York. He selected commerce as his pursuit in life, and entered a counting-house in this city, where his father was then practicing law. After the family returned to Delaware he removed to Philadelphia, and was engaged in the great West India house of Morris Wain & Co., where he acquired a thorough business training and such an insight into the mysteries of trade as in latter years the Custom House plunderers of New York found it impossible to escape. In 1848 his elder brother died, where upon he abandoned mercantile pursuits and took up the study of law, under the feeling that the Bayards ought always to have a representative of the family in that profession. He studied in his father's office and was admitted to practice in 1851. With his advantages of training and his natural abilities success was a matter of course. In 1853 he was appointed United States District Attorney for Delaware, but resigned the position in the following year. With the exception of two years spent in Philadelphia, he practiced steadily in his native city until his election, in 1869, to the United States Senate. This election was attended by the curious coincidence that at the same time his father was named for the fragment of an unexpired term.

In the Senate, Mr. Bayard's career has been marked from the outset by industry, conscientiousness and the highest order of ability. One of his most conspicuous achievements was the investigation, exposure and correction of the corrupt and dishonest methods which for a time marked the management of the Custom House, and outraged and embarrassed commerce, in New York. The reform which liberated our merchants from spies, blackmailers and an insolent inquisition is due more to Senator Bayard's efforts than to those of any other public man. As to the Southern question, he has been foremost among the leaders of his party in insisting upon the maintenance of the constitutional rights of the States, and opposing the imposition upon them of laws and rulers by means of military power. Some of his public utterances as to questions growing out of the rebellion have been sharply criticised by his political antagonists, but his most advanced avowals were certainly more moderate than those of many other Democratic statesmen now and formerly in public life.

Senator Bayard has served upon the Finance Committee since entering the Senate, being now its Chairman, and has been a consistent advocate of the Democratic doctrines about tariff, currency and taxation. As early as February, 1872, he expressed himself thus strongly on the subject of a return to specie payments:

"In the consideration of our national finances the chief and ruling object in view should be the return to specie payments, not so much as affecting the conscience of the moneyed classes of the country as affecting the morals of the entire country. A return to specie payments should be held a return to honesty in individual dealings, and the sooner an honest currency, a currency of intrinsic value, is restored to the people of this country the better, because until that is done we cannot hope for a discontinuance of those practices of bad faith and illegitimate speculation which are the natural result and outgrowth of paper money. I say, therefore, that a return to honest money is a crying demand of the present hour. A departure from the currency of honest money, from money of value, was a cardinal error, a vast blunder, in my opinion, originally."

In the later legislation upon the financial question, Senator Bayard has steadily adhered to the principles here laid down. His firmness at the last session of Congress in resisting the schemes of the silver maniacs prevented the passage of the Bill providing for the exchange of trade-dollars for legal tender silver dollars at par, and his inflexible hostility to the greenback delusion in all its forms has contributed largely, during the whole period of contention over that subject, to the preservation of the sound national policy which has made resumption possible.

Mr. Bayard's nomination for the Presidency, should that honor be bestowed upon him, would everywhere unite the Democracy, and enlist the heartiest and most enthusiastic support. Identified as he has been with every important question of national legislation during the crucial decade of our history, with a record without spot or blemish, and an independence of cliques and cabals which would assure an upright and cleanly administration, no right-thinking member of his party could refuse to follow his standard in a struggle which, in the opinion of many, is to determine the fate of the Democratic organization for a long time to come.

MR. GEO. B. ROBERTS,

PRESIDENT OF THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

MR. GEORGE B. ROBERTS, recently elected as President of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, graduated at the Engineering and Scientific School at Troy, N. Y., in 1850, and in the following year entered the service of the railroad company, as a roadman in the engineer corps. During the Summer following he became assistant engineer in charge of the division on the summit that included the great tunnel. In the Fall of 1852 he left the Pennsylvania to become assistant engineer of the Philadelphia and Erie, and during the ten years that followed he was actively employed in building railroads. He was an engineer on the North Pennsylvania, which was opened in 1855, and on the Northwestern. On the Allentown, the Mahanoy and Broad Mountain, and the West Jersey he was chief engineer, and filled that office when they were completed. In May, 1862, he was called to the position of assistant to the President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, on account of his engineering skill and ability as an administrative officer. Seven years later, on May 30, 1869, he was made Fourth Vice President, and March 26th, 1874, Second Vice-President. When Colonel Scott was elected President, June 30, 1874, Mr. Roberts succeeded him as First Vice-President, and during Colonel Scott's absence in Europe for a year and a half Mr. Roberts was acting President. He has for many years occupied a prominent position in the boards of roads controlled by the Pennsylvania, and brings to the discharge of the duties devolving upon him, as Colonel Scott's successor, not only a mature experience but thorough familiarity with all the conditions and peculiar relations of the great railway system which he will henceforth manage. In attaining the Presidency of the Pennsylvania Company, he has simply realized the ambition of his early manhood, when he heard to have declared that he would rather be president of that corporation than of the United States. The Philadelphia Press says of his promotion: "The Pennsylvania road has substantially achieved its work of development. It remains now to make the most of its marvelous growth. It passes from the epoch of expansive energies to the era of consolidated strength and conservative force. In this grand progress of recuperative energy and healthy vitality, Mr. Roberts is admirably qualified to guide it. He is prudent, sagacious and practical, a master of details and of organization, thoroughly familiar with the progressive policy of the corporation and combining with it the wisest principles of conservative management. He enters upon his trust with the unbounded confidence of the company and of the public."

How an Arab Lady Perfumes Herself.

IN the floor of the tent or hut, as it may chance to be, a small hole is excavated sufficiently large to contain a common champagne-bottle; a fire of charcoal or of simply glowing embers is made within the hole, into which the woman about to be scented throws a handful of drugs. She then takes off the cloth or "tope" which forms her dress and crouches naked over the fumes, while she arranges her robe to fall as a mantle from her neck to the ground like a tent. She begins to perspire freely in the hot-air bath, and, the pores of the skin being thus opened and moist, the volatile oil from the smoke of the burning perfumes is immediately absorbed. By the time that the fire has expired the scenting process is completed, and both her person and her robe are redolent with incense, with which they are so thoroughly impregnated that I have frequently smelt a party of women strongly at full a hundred yards distance when the wind has been blowing from their direction.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

An Easter Festival at Bautzen, on the Spree.

The egg as a symbol of resurrection, of a life hidden in a marble tomb coming forth again to the light, has been from an early period associated with the joys of Easter Sunday and the Resurrection of Christ. We have our Easter eggs, and French taste and skill have been almost exhausted in investing forms in which the egg will appear in confectionery or glass and gilt-work. The egg for a fashionable lady will be a work of art, a little casket in which a precious rag or pin reposes on its little cushion; the egg for a child will be a frailer structure filled with sweets, itself to be consumed after being emptied. A German Easter egg amusement is seen in our illustration, and must afford no little sport. It requires a smooth, grassy slope, down which eggs are rolled, to be scrambled for by merry youngsters below. Wisdom would dictate that the eggs should be boiled hard, to prevent accidents, before they are thus sent to make their way in the world, and this is doubtless done. The number engaged in sending off the white globes and of the expectant throng who are grasping at them shows that at Bautzen Pass is a day of merry-making.

The United States Ship "Constellation" at Ireland.

The United States frigate Constellation left New York on March 20th, and cast anchor at Queenstown twenty days later. She took 500 tons of provisions and clothing for the relief of Irish distress, the cargo being made up as follows: 1,346 barrels potatoes, 675 barrels flour, 1,144 barrels corn meal, and 150 barrels oatmeal. Besides these she carried 59 cases canned meats and 7 packages of clothing and shoes. As has been before stated, the work of transferring this cargo to British vessels for transportation to convenient Irish ports was superintended by His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. The officers of the Constellation were handsomely feted in Dublin, and the freedom of the city was presented to Captain Potter, the commander.

The Swedish Arctic Exploration.

Professor Nordenskjöld's recent grand achievement of navigating the Arctic Seas north of Asia, and passing eastward through Behring's Strait down into the Pacific Ocean, has been crowned with a triumphal welcome at his arrival home. After receiving, since the entrance of his vessel through the Suez Canal into the Mediterranean, the congratulations of different Governments and nations in Western Europe, he has reached the capital of Sweden, and has been duly honored by the King and the country. The Vega was met outside by about 200 steamers, which escorted her into the harbor. The adjacent coasts were lit up for a distance of many miles, and the city itself was splendidly illuminated. Professor Nordenskjöld and his companions were received on landing by the municipal authorities, and proceeded immediately afterwards to the Royal Castle, where they were welcomed by the King. Professor Nordenskjöld has been created a Baron, and Captain Palander and Mr. Oscar Dickson have received patents of nobility.

Prisoners Chanting Prayers for Otero.

The night before the execution of Otero, who attempted to assassinate the King of Spain, a singular service was held in the prison. Priests visited the place, and while one remained with the condemned in the little chapel, several others led a party of prisoners in chanting the prayers for those about to die that are customary in Roman Catholic communities. The condemned preserved the utmost coolness while on his way to the place of execution, and the day after his death an alleged confession was published which, however, did not show as was expected, that he was the emissary of any socialist organization.

Scenes at a Village Fair near Seville, Spain.

The Spanish people still keep up their ferias and romerias, but whether trade or religion is the pretext, enjoyment is the real object, and all enter into the spirit of the amusements with zest. Spain, and above all Seville, has been, from the days of the old Romans the chosen land of dancing, and not even France can vie with Spain in the number, grace and charm of its native dances. In fact, Seville still retains this favorite national motion in the services of religion and of mourning, and a solemn dance is performed before the altar on Corpus Christi, and the corpse of a child has in many a home a funereal dance around its little flower-covered bier. The feria as represented by our artist needs no detail; it tells its own story of enjoyment.

The Royal Marriage at Windsor.

The marriage of the Princess Frederica, daughter of the late King of Hanover and great granddaughter of King George III, with Baron von Pawel-Rammingen took place in the private chapel of Windsor Castle. Although, officially speaking, the ceremony was of a private nature, a very large number of royal and other guests were present, and amongst them Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, Prince and Princess Christian, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Teck, and the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz. At the station royal carriages were in waiting to convey the guests to the Castle, where they were at once conducted to the chapel, where shortly afterwards the bridegroom, supported by Prince Leopold, took his place by the altar. After all the guests had assembled, the Queen and the Princess Frederica entered. The ceremony was performed by the Bishop of Oxford, assisted by the Dean of Windsor. Her Majesty gave away the bride, while Prince Leopold acted as best man to the bridegroom. After the ceremony the Royal party went to the Green Drawing room, where the register was signed by Her Majesty and numerous other witnesses; and then Her Majesty and the Royal Family lunched in the White Drawing room, the other guests being served in the Waterloo Chamber.

—MR. GREENWOOD, within forty-eight hours after his retirement from the Pall Mall Gazette, received offers exceeding half a million dollars to establish a new journal.

—MINISTER WHITE reports that the German Government is about to increase the circulation of silver coin twenty per cent.—that is, from 10 marks per head to 12 marks.

—WHEN all the new formations, planned and worked out in their minutest details by the German War Ministry, are completed, the total strength of the army will exceed 2,600,000 men.

—A PARIS dispatch says that the commission on the question of restoring the Palace of the Tuileries, after consulting two architects, have decided to restore the palace and convert it into a museum.

—THE Bibles issued by the American Bible Society for sixty-four years amount to 37,408,208 copies. In the last year the managers issued from the Bible House 1,123,078. Of these 45,218 copies were sent to foreign lands.

—THE latest plan for crossing the English Channel is embodied in a model now before the British Admiralty for a monster floating railway station, which is to carry trains holding 2,000 passengers across at the rate of fourteen knots an hour.

—IT has been announced in the Spanish Congress that the Government proposes soon to introduce a reform system of education in Cuba, and to establish agricultural schools there, but that it is impossible, for the present, to create periodical and ecclesiastical reforms.

—THE exports of domestic produce from this port for the week ending May 8th amounted to $7,704,922, against $5,208,190 corresponding period last year. The total from the commencement of the year is $131,534,856, against $115,426,303 same period of 1879, and $119,683,613 the year previous.

—THE Minister of Justice has submitted to the Czar for his approval a new law directing that executions shall hereafter take place in the prisons and in the presence of certain officials, instead of in public places and in the presence of the populace. It is reported that the Czar is disposed to acquiesce in this change.

—THE Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels have adopted the principal features contained in the draft of the Bill submitted by the New York ferry companies. The most important clause of the Bill as adopted permits the carrying of distinctive signal lights for the purpose of indicating the particular ferry to which each boat belongs.

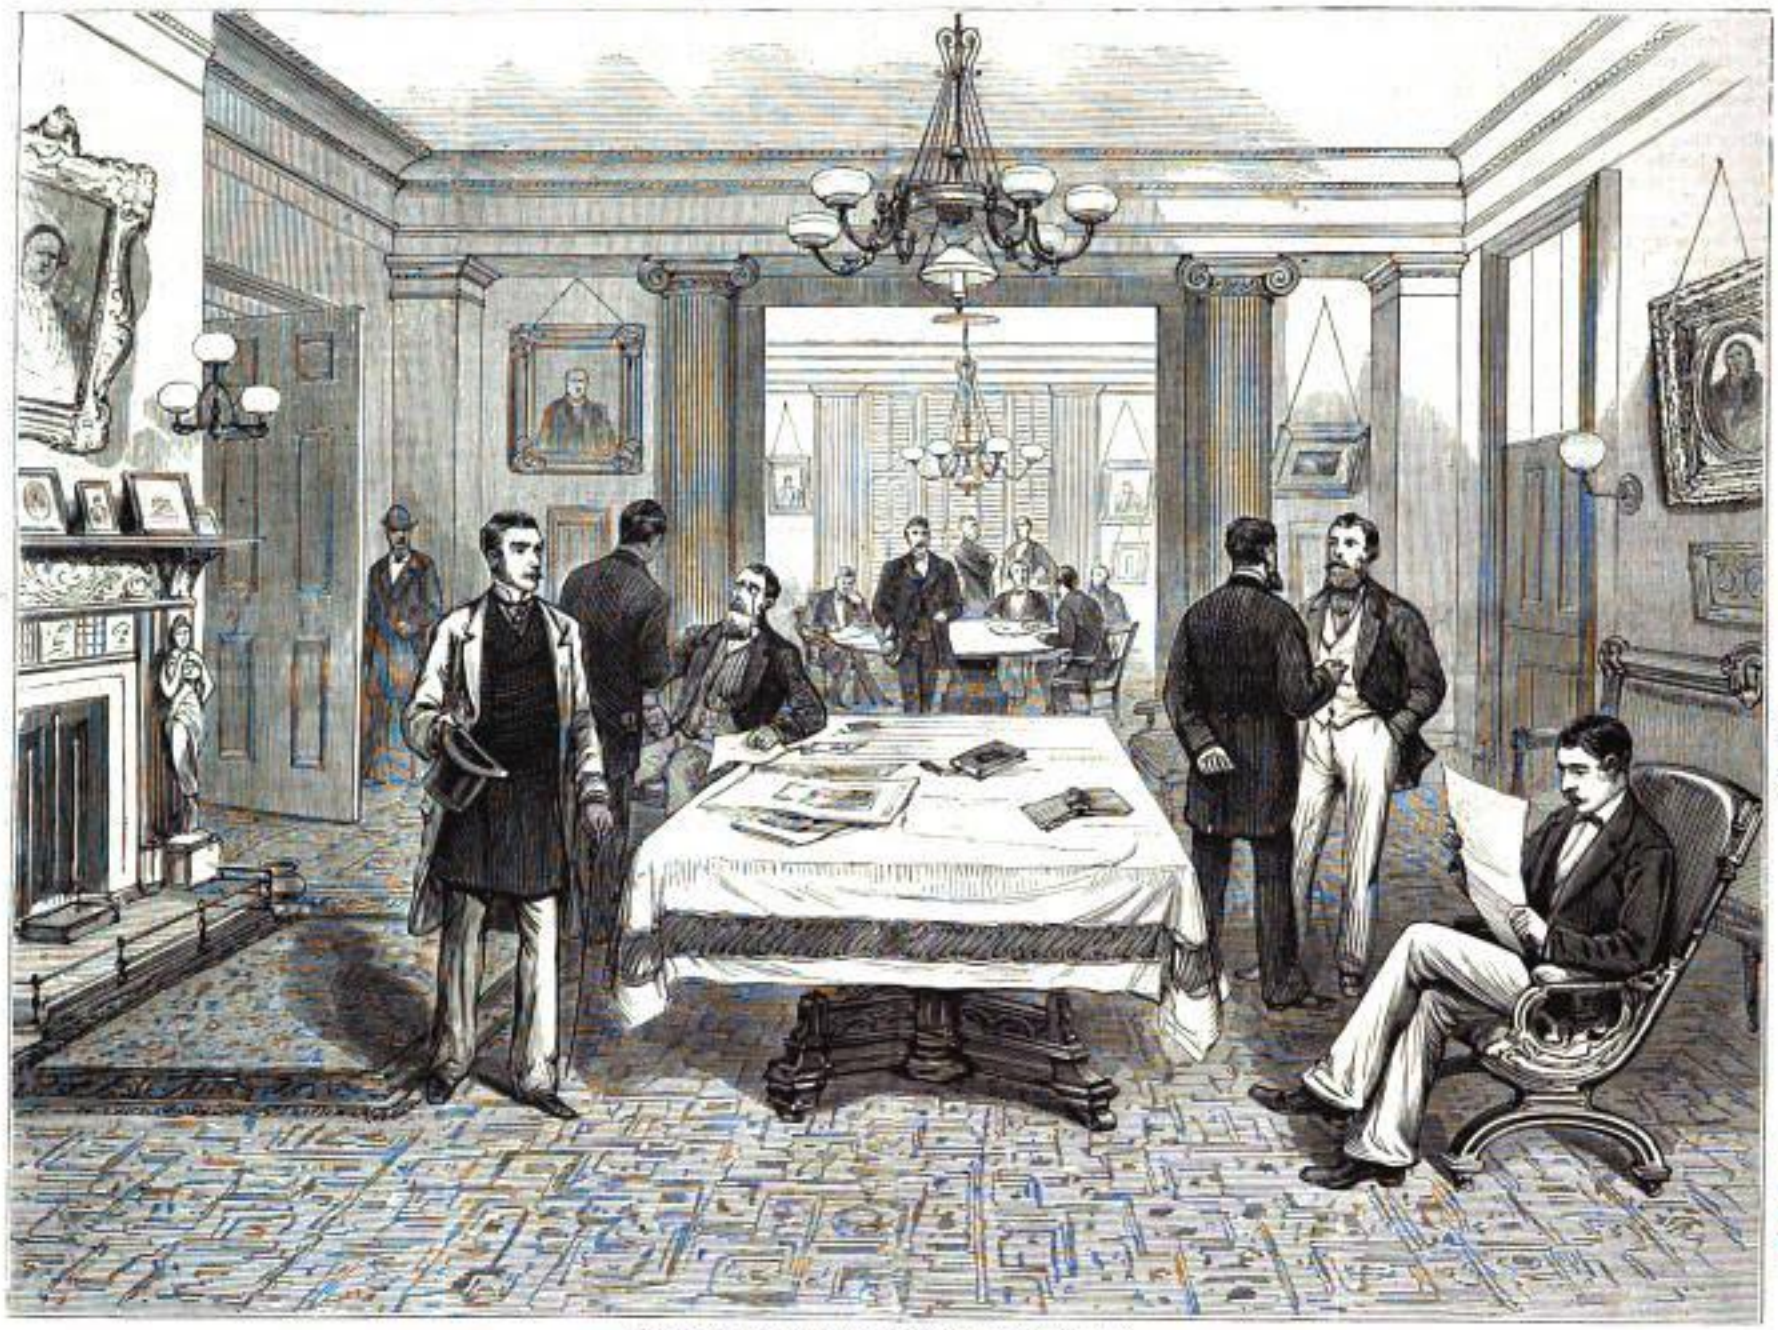
—IT is stated that the Carthusian monks, the manufacturers of the famous Chartreuse liqueur, have determined to follow the example of other congregations and refuse to conform to the religious decrees. They threaten to remove the manufacture to England. They pay the State 1,000,000 francs a year taxes, and divide 5,000,000 francs among the poor.

—MR. AUGUSTUS MORRIS, one of the Commissioners at the Sydney Exhibition, reports that our exhibitors have been very successful in obtaining awards. In all cases our manufacturers have either excelled all others or stood in the first rank. The result will be a large sale of American articles of several kinds that have heretofore been unknown in Australia.

EMILE AUGIER'S play of "L'Aventuriere," in which Sarah Bernhardt makes her appearance in London, was first produced during the revolutionary year of 1848, and was rewritten ten years later for the Théâtre Français. It is well known here by the adaptation made by Mr. Robertson under the title of "Home," and has had more than one long run at Wallack's.

—A CAIRO dispatch says that in consequence of the recent arrival of a slave caravan at Siout, the Governor of the Province and other officers have been dismissed, and will be court martialed. A special European slave commission has been appointed on the recommendation of the British Consul-General, to secure the execution of the Anglo-Egyptian convention for the suppression of the slave trade.

—IT is announced that the President of the Nicaraguan Government has made a very liberal concession to a number of American capitalists to undertake the construction of a canal across any portion of the territory of that country, which may seem most advantageous. This concession is likely to be the basis of an important movement in the interest of a canal under control of American capitalists, and it is understood that an organization will soon be effected in direct antagonism to De Lesseps's scheme.



—THE temperance party in England claims that there are 315 members of the new Parliament favorable to "local option." Of these, 148 voted or paired in favor of Sir Wilfred Lawson's motion; 57, while declining to commit themselves to details, have expressed themselves as favorable to popular control over the issue of licenses. This list includes Mr. Gladstone and the Marquis of Hartington. If this estimate be anything like correct, there will undoubtedly soon be some legislation in the way of restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors.

—THE receipts of grain at this port were unusually heavy on May 10th, particularly by canal, the latter amounting to 1,063,253 bushels. Of these, 765,753 bushels were wheat, 297,900 corn, 81,300 oats and 8,300 rye. In addition to these there arrived another large tow of canal boats in the afternoon too late to have the quantity posted on 'Change. The arrivals of wheat by rail and coastwise footed up to 794,753 bushels. The market for breadstuffs was generally higher and fairly active, with the exception of oats, which broke down two cents a bushel.

—FOR the first time for several years the Russian Opera at St. Petersburg shows a large profit. Upwards of 120 representations were given during the season just ended; 69 being the works of Russian composers and 62 of foreigners. The favorite operas were "Life for the Czar," "Faust," "Rogneda," "Russlan and Ludmila," "Demon" and "Aida," each being performed ten times. The average receipts were $1,200 a night; the singers cost during the season $70,000, and the orchestra 88 performers...$16,000. The total expenditure, vocal and instrumental was $85,000; the entire receipts, $165,000; balance, $80,000, of which one third was net profit.

THE names of racehorses are literally a commentary upon the history of the world. In 1813 the 2,000 guineas were won by Sir Charles Banbury's Smolensko, suggestive of the retreat of Moscow. There has never been a decade since 1800 in which Marengo has not been commemorated by a great racer. Waterloo, Salamanca, Victoria, and Blenheim are all represented in the racing calendar. Wellington, Nelson and Collingwood adorn the patriotism of British racing men. Blucher won the Derby in 1814, and distinguished matrimonial alliances have been celebrated, as in the case of Prince Leopold, who won the Derby in 1816. So with us, we have had General Grant, Commodore Vanderbilt and Edwin Forrest.

EYES.

SERENE blue eyes,
Seraphic, calm and limpid eyes,
Reflection of a Paradise!
I gaze within their sapphire depths and think
How like a bark my love might float or sink,
If they should will it in such wise—
And their chaste beauty seems to me,
Like some great, dreamy, treacherous sea!

Thoughtful gray eyes,
Crepuscular, grave, gloomy eyes,
Pale as the mistless Northern skies!
I gaze within their cloudy depths and see
How all my love might wrecked and shattered be,
If they should will it in such wise—
Cold and transparent as the ice,
They feel no passion, know no vice.

Radiant black eyes,
Wonderful, scintillant black eyes,
Love's magnetizing, burning prize!
I gaze within their flashing depths and find
The dainty, languid temptress of my mind,
If they should will it in such wise—
But their effulgence murmureth
Of strange, mad passions, bringing death!

Winsome brown eyes,
Light, laughing, innocent brown eyes,
Wherein a woodland idyl lies!
I gaze within their lucid depths and mark
The light that from my soul may chase the dark
If they should will it in such wise—
The soul of some Greek dryad fair
Has surely found its Eden there!

Sombre green eyes,
Strange, haunting, mystic, siren eyes,
Teeming with promise and surprise!
I gaze within their misty depths and see
The eyes of Messalina dark on me,
Whene'er they will it in such wise—
Snake-like, intolerant and warm,
They seem to hiss with passion's storm!

Colorful eyes,
Weird, variable, wonder eyes,
Wherein a shadowy rainbow flies!
I gaze within their dazzling depths and love
The sacred mutability thereof,
And they have willed it in such wise—
Ah, emblems of my soul divine,
Only in dreams I see them shine!

GOLD DUST AND DIAMONDS.

SHOWING HOW THEY WERE FOUND, HOW THEY WERE LOST, AND HOW, AFTER MANY YEARS, THEY WERE FOUND AGAIN.

A NOVEL.

BY CHARLES DIMITRY.

CHAPTER XIX.—(CONTINUED).

THE next morning Manuela and Reginald set out in the stage for Albuquerque, having previously exacted a promise from Don Tomas and the other members of his family to attend the wedding, which was fixed for that day week. In consenting to become Reginald's wife, Manuela already felt that sense of familiarity with him which impelled her to dispense with ceremony in her bearing towards him; and hence—partly because of her nature and of the peculiar circumstances in which they found themselves, and partly because of the nearness of their marriage day—she allowed him to accompany her to her destination.

The servants from Manuela's hacienda were awaiting her with a carriage in Albuquerque on the entrance of the stage, their mistress having written to them a few days before of her probable arrival on that day.

The hacienda, which for six generations had been the home of the family of Manuela's mother, was situated about two miles from the town, and as she took her seat in the vehicle she bade Reginald farewell, telling him that she would expect him on the morrow.

After her departure, Reginald proceeded to the hotel, and, having deposited his valise in the office-safe, he went out to supply some deficiencies in his wardrobe, which, however adapted it may have been to the necessities of the long and rough journey to Durango which he had contemplated, was scarcely suitable for the requirements of a gentleman who was about to abandon the rôle of treasure-seeker and traveler for that of bridegroom. He laid the shops of Albuquerque under contribution, and, though his outfit was possibly not as complete or splendid as one that he might have procured in a more pretentious locality, still it answered well enough to enable him to make so presentable an appearance the next day at the hacienda that Manuela expressed herself highly pleased with the change.

On the occasion of this visit he brought the precious box with him. With the doors discreetly closed, and secure from interruption, he and Manuela opened it.

Imbedded as it were in the gold dust that mainly filled it, appeared to their vision, as they spread its contents on the table, a multitude of diamonds, rubies, emeralds and sapphires. The first, however, predominated in number, and as of these more than twenty were of enormous size, they could well understand how the Chevalier Deville had estimated the value of his buried riches at three hundred thousand louis d'ors, or a million and a half of dollars. Most of the diamonds, and many of the less valuable stones, were cut, and, as the light fell on them through the lowered curtain, they flashed and glowed like coals of fire.

For a long time the two contemplated in silence the treasure that lay before them. Each seemed lost in thought. Perhaps they were both thinking that, great in value as was the fortune that had come into their possession, its acquisition had been made not without some sacrifice.

Finally the gold dust and stones were returned to the box, which, after having been carefully wrapped in a cloth, was put in a secure place; and for the twentieth time Reginald exclaimed:

"Would that Melchior were here!"

As he spoke, Manuela put her hand on his shoulder and looked with a tender expression in his face.

"Caro mio," she said, with a smile, "your wish has been gratified unaware to you. Melchior is here!"

He gazed at her fixedly and like one bewildered, for there was that in her voice that recalled the journey to Milan and the memory of the Palazzo Albergati.

"Here!" he repeated. "Where!"

She dropped her face on his breast, and a vivid color swept from her forehead to her neck.

"There is no Melchior," she said, softly. "Oh, my dearest Reginald, the Melchior of your imagination was only Manuela who loves you and who would have died to save your life! Forgive me if this confession makes me seem bold; but if I assumed an unwomanly part, it was in order that you might avoid the danger of an encounter with Vellani."

He held her close to him in a silence that was far more eloquent than any language could have been. His eyes were moist with tears as he remembered how the brave heart that was beating against his breast had been made the target of the Italian's assassinating steel. And all, too, for his sake—for the sake of the love that, like some great light rising gradually out of the darkness, for the first time began to dawn on him in all its luminous completeness.

"Noble, generous, devoted Manuela!" he exclaimed at last. "You have taught me that of which I have been ignorant—that true love means self-sacrifice!"

Her tears were falling silently, although he could not see them.

"It was because I felt this," she replied, "that, when I knew you were determined to proceed to Europe and meet Vellani, I resolved to present myself before you in the character of my brother, who died when a child and is buried out there in the garden, and so conduct your relations with your enemy that he should meet me in a duel instead of you. I was confident of my skill with either sword or pistol and I distrusted yours. It made me so happy to think that you never suspected that under the guise of Melchior it was your own Manuela who met you in Paris and accompanied you to Milan on your mission of danger!"

"The past cannot be recalled," he said, in a self-reproachful tone; but had I only known——"

"What, Reginald?"

"I would not have spared the life of the villain in the old church! I never can forget, now, that it was at your gentle bosom he aimed his sword-thrust in the courtyard of the Palazzo Albergati!"

"Ah, Reginald, let us be charitable even to him. Think no more of the past, dearest. There is no obstacle now between us and happiness. In four days more I will be your wife. I have given you my promise. Let us remember only that!"

The four days of which Manuela had spoken passed away—as if on leaden wings to the lovers. The marriage took place at the hacienda, only a few intimate friends of Manuela's family being present in the ancient dwelling. It was at the hacienda, too, the home of Manuela's childhood, that the honeymoon was to be passed; and when that blissful interval was over, the house and lands were to be left in charge of an agent and they were to take up their journey for their new home in the East.

CHAPTER XX.—THE HEIR OF ST. EVREMOND DEVILLE.

WHEN the ceremony that made the two man and wife was concluded, and the latest lingering guest had departed, Manuela said to Reginald:

"You have asked me, dear, how I knew of St. Evremond Deville, and his treasure. Follow me and you shall know."

She led him into a room along the walls of which were ranged the portraits of several generations of the Davilas, and pointing to one of these, the likeness of a martial-looking man in armor, said:

"Look at that picture. It is the portrait of him whose name has been so often on our lips of late, the Chevalier Deville—the brother of my ancestor, Claude Deville, to whom was addressed the old letter written in the dungeon of the fortress of Vera Cruz, and which so singularly fell into your hands."

Surprise for a moment kept Reginald silent.

"You, the descendant of St. Evremond Deville's brother, Manuela?" he ejaculated, finally.

"Yes. My mother—her family name had gradually undergone the change from Deville to Davila—was her father's only heir, and since my brother Melchior's death I am the sole survivor of the blood of all those whose faces look down upon us from the wall."

"And the only surviving inheritor of St. Evremond's treasure?"

"It is even so, Reginald."

"Why did you keep this a secret from me?"

"Because," she answered, "I preferred to tell you of this as your wife. I did not wish that the question of this treasure or of my inheritance should influence your action towards me. Had you forgotten me—had time proved you false to your professions of love—I still would have kept the secret. I have an ample fortune in my own right, and I loved you too much to wish to deprive you of the riches which in one sense are justly yours."

"How fortunate then for me that my love could know no change!" exclaimed Reginald, as he pressed her to his breast. "For, had I changed, I would have retained the gold and precious stones, it is true, but how infinitely more precious a treasure would I have lost in losing you for a wife, my darling!"

"Fate," she answered, "seems to have destined us for each other. Now let me tell you something of my ancestor Claude Deville and his brother St. Evremond. The Devilles were a family of Brittany, in France. St. Evremond, the elder of the two brothers, after serving as an officer in the armies of Louis XIV., led by a spirit of adventure, left France and went to the newly settled country of Brazil, about the year 1676. He remained there, as he says in the old manuscript, which was in reality a letter written from his prison to my ancestor Claude, until 1678, when the animosity of the Viceroy Oliveira compelled him to leave Brazil.

"Claude Deville, at the time this letter, which never reached his hands, and which first saw the light through your discovery of it, was written, still lived in Brittany. Other letters, however, some written in Brazil and some after the arrival of St. Evremond in this part of Mexico, and his incarceration in San Juan de Ulua, were received by Claude. My ancestor knew, as I shall show you presently, that his brother had acquired great riches in Brazil, and it was partly to endeavor to learn something of the fate of this wealth that, after receiving the intelligence of St. Evremond's death in prison, he departed from France and came to Mexico.

"While pursuing his investigations—which, however, proved fruitless—along the Rio Grande, he met a lady of the country of whom he became enamored and whom he eventually married. This alliance induced him to settle here, and this hacienda, which has been the residence of so many generations of his descendants, was a part of his original purchase. Nothing, of course, was ever known concerning St. Evremond's lost treasure, but the fact that such a treasure had existed remained a tradition in our family.

"You understand, now, how easy a thing it was for me, knowing all these previous circumstances of the family history, to complete the text of the mutilated manuscript. The only point on which I was ignorant was the locality of the church, and that by a strange chance you discovered in Fra Gregorio's chronicle."

"It is all clear to me now, Manuela," said Reginald, "but I cannot help wondering at the extraordinary coincidence whereby you, I and the manuscript were thrown together."

"It was indeed a singular combination of circumstances," she replied, "and it only proves that truth, sometimes at least, is stranger than fiction. Here," she added, as she walked to a secretary that stood in a corner of the room, "is a number of letters from the Chevalier Deville to my ancestor Claude, written at various times after his departure from France. In one, written after his arrival in Vera Cruz from South America, he speaks of his treasure and tells how he had acquired it. Look, the handwriting is the same as that of the manuscript found by you."

He inspected the dingy sheet of paper.

"The same," he said; "there can be no mistaking it. Read it, Manuela."

Like the manuscript, it was written in French, and Manuela read aloud in English, translating from the original as she went on:

"VERA CRUZ, MEXICO, August, 1678.

"I have but lately arrived here, my dear Claude, from Brazil with considerable treasure in my possession which I hope some day to share with thee. This treasure consists chiefly of diamonds, though I have a great store of gold dust and also divers precious stones of value and rarity. I have had several of the diamonds cut here by a skillful lapidary, and they prove to be of the first water. I was compelled to depart from Brazil because of the persecutions of the Portuguese authorities in that country, and I have but time—since the galleon which is to bear this letter leaves for Seville within the hour—to relate to thee briefly how I discovered the localities in Brazil in which the diamonds abound.

"The streams that contain them were pointed out to me by a friendly native, who, of course, was ignorant of their value, although he had brought a few to me as curiosities. I had done this man some service and it was through him also that I became aware of the existence of gold in the rivers. Scarcely had I began to reap the benefits arising from these discoveries, the knowledge of which I kept a profound secret, when intelligence reached me that my liberty of person was threatened by the Viceroy Oliveira—why, I know not. Collecting my gold in two leather bags and secreting the diamonds about my person, and accompanied by my faithful Indian friend as a guide, I traveled southward to the Missions of the Jesuit Fathers in Paraguay. The holy men received me kindly and assisted me on my journey to Buenos Ayres, where I found a brigantine in the roads about to sail for Havana. I embarked on board this vessel. At Havana I again embarked for this place.

"I hear of rich gold and topaz and emerald mines far in the north of Mexico among the mountains that hold the headwaters of the great river of the north. Thither shall I adventure soon, hoping to add to my store of wealth. When I shall have sufficiently seen the world in this quarter I shall return to France. I will write again at the first opportunity. Adieu. Thy brother,

"ST. EVREMOND DEVILLE."

For a long time Reginald and Manuela, after reading this letter, conversed on the future and their plans of life. They both agreed that, inasmuch as Vellani might still linger in the vicinity, it would be unwise, with the vast treasure in their possession, and not knowing what course he might pursue, to defer their departure for the East. Hence was it that, a few days after their marriage, they started from Albuquerque on their journey towards the Atlantic seaboard. Manuela had selected from her household effects those articles which she wished to remove to her new home, and these, with the family portraits and other relics which were endeared to her by association, were stored in Albuquerque, there to remain until they should be sent for.

At Santa Fe they remained a night with Don Tomas and his family. Before leaving these friends (for Reginald had not forgotten the promise he had made to himself that Pepita, to whom so much was due, should be remembered when the treasure should come into his possession), Manuela, taking the priest aside, gave into his hands a small box carefully sealed, in which reposed on soft folds of pink cotton a large and brilliant diamond of many thousand dollars value.

"This," she said, "my good friend, is a present from my husband and myself for Pepita. Let it be considered her wedding gift from us. Do not open the box, I beg you, until three days shall have passed away."

"I promise to do as you wish, señora," said Don Tomas, with a perplexed countenance. "Pepita will feel grateful to you and Mr. Grey for this remembrance of her. In her name, therefore, I thank you for the gift contained in this box."

As the stage approached San José, Manuela expressed a desire to revisit the old church before leaving it behind them on their journey. They entered the melancholy inclosure. A man seated near the entrance, with his head buried in his hands, looked up at the sound of their footsteps. In the pale, haggard face that was turned towards them they recognized Vellani. His head was still bandaged, and his whole bearing was that of one who had lost all courage and all hope.

Reginald's first impulse was to pass him by coldly, but a word from Manuela led him to change his purpose.

"He looks so unhappy," she whispered. "If he will accept our forgiveness, let us grant it. Go and speak to him."

He went up to the Italian.

"Signor Vellani," he said, controlling himself sufficiently to utter words calmly, "we meet probably for the last time. To prove to you that I have no hatred, notwithstanding the events of the past, I now ask you if you feel regret for the course that you have pursued towards me?"

Vellani turned his head away for a moment.

"Say that you regret your conduct," continued Reginald, "and all will be forgotten."

Whatever may have been the Italian's thoughts, he manifested no contrition and no softening of the heart in the expression of his countenance; for, rising from his seat, and without pausing to look at Reginald or Manuela, he walked slowly from the ruin with feeble steps that indicated the weakness of the invalid.

"He is implacable," said Reginald, as he watched his retreating figure.

Manuela cast a long, lingering look around her as if to imprint on her mind the picture of the moldering walls; and then, taking her husband's arm, they went out into the sunlight from the gloom and decay that surrounded them.

From the stage they saw Vellani in the distance as, with head bent and hands crossed behind him, he walked slowly on the veranda of Don Pedro's dwelling. To their eyes, as the distance between them increased, the figure of this man and the outlines of the old church filled in the receding landscape, to the exclusion of all surrounding features, with a strange significance.

When the two objects, animate and inanimate, had passed beyond their vision, Manuela, holding Reginald's hand in her own, leaned back in her seat and gazed dreamily on the distant mountains.

"Of what are you thinking, Manuela?" said Reginald, at last, interrupting her reverie.

"I am thinking, dear, how happy I am to be your wife," she replied.

THE END.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

RICHMOND, THE CAPITAL OF VIRGINIA.

THE City of Richmond, aside from the historical interest which attaches to it as the theatre of most important events in the struggle of the Southern States for independence and a separate nationality, possesses attractions in the natural beauty of its situation and surroundings, in its sanitary and manufacturing advantages, and in the elegance and intelligence of its society, which must always give it pre-eminence among the cities of the Union. It is situated on the north side of the river James, at and around the falls, at the head of tide-water, having an altitude above sea level of 20 to 180 feet. Its site is quite picturesque, built as it is upon a series of hills that afford ample natural drainage. As a class its buildings are good, especially the private residences and the churches. On the principal business streets some of the stores are patterns of elegance, and, taken all in all, Richmond compares favorably with other cities of equal size and population. To a stranger there are many points well worthy of a visit. In its vicinity was fought some of the most sanguinary battles of the war, of which traces still exist. The Federal soldiers have a small but beautiful cemetery east of the town, while Hollywood Cemetery, on the west, is one of the most beautiful burying-places in the country. Here a portion of the grounds were set apart for the reception of the remains of the dead Confederate soldiers, and they have been tenderly gathered from the different battle-fields in the vicinity and buried there under the shadow of an Egyptian pyramid erected by the ladies in commemoration of their devotion to the cause that was lost, and to stand sentinel over their last long sleep.

The Capitol is a huge pile of brick and stone, without peculiar attraction, except its historical association; but in its rotunda stands the best statue of Washington in existence—cut after a model taken from the original during his life, and therefore a perfect likeness. In the upper story of the building is the State Library, in which may be seen some fine paintings of Virginia's Governors and other notables connected with her history, besides many Indian relics, battle-flags, old books and other curiosities. The library contains 30,000 volumes.

The Capitol building stands in the centre of a tenacre park upon the top of one of the highest hills in Richmond, and from its roof may be had a superb view of the city and its surroundings. The park is tastefully laid off in walks that traverse it in every direction, while in the northwest corner stands a magnificent equestrian statue of Washington whose base is decorated with statues, in bronze, of Patrick Henry, and others of revolutionary fame, while midway between that and the south line a dome has been erected, and under it stands a marble statue of Kentucky's great statesman, Henry Clay. In the city may also be seen the famous Libby prison, Castle Thunder and the house occupied by Jefferson Davis.

The Executive Mansion, in the northeast corner of the Capitol grounds, is an unpretending brick building, and is in its appointments marked by republican simplicity. Among other objects of special interest in the city is St. John's Church, in which, on the 20th of March, 1775, the second Patriot Convention of Virginia was held, and where, three years later, the Virginia Convention formally ratified the Federal Constitution. The building, which was erected in 1740 upon land then known as Indian Hill, is of wood, with belfry and spire, and yet contains the quaint, high pulpit, with sounding board overhead, of olden time. It is embosomed in a beautiful grove of varied growth. The yard, which is inclosed with a substantial brick wall, is ridged with the little hillocks and thickly studded with the moss-grown monuments of the dead for more than a century past. Here have been buried a number of distinguished men, among them, it is claimed, Chancellor George Wythe.

The water-power furnished by the James River, at Richmond, is one of the finest in the Union. It is of sufficient capacity to run all the manufactories in the South were they concentrated here. The stream is at this point at least one-fourth of a mile in width, with an average of twelve inches of water at its lowest season, while from the top of the rapids, or falls, to the bottom it is nearly, if not quite, seventy-five feet, giving an opportunity for the water to be used over and over again several times before it is discharged again into the river at the bottom of the falls.

The commerce of Richmond is steadily recovering from the effects of its nearly total suspension from 1861 to 1865. During the year 1878, the harbor-master reported the arrival of 829 sailing vessels and 300 steamers, with a total tonnage of 695,000 tons, being about 2 8-10 per cent. increase over 1877. This aggregate includes 191,333 barrels of flour for Brazil—an increase of 32 per cent. over the shipments of 1877. Regular lines of steamers ply between Richmond and the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Norfolk. There is an extensive trade with the West Indies and South America, the return cargoes being respectively sugar and coffee.

According to a table recently published there were in the city on the 1st of January last, 565 manufactories, employing 14,193 hands, and having tools and machinery valued at $2,342,981. The amount of sales is stated at $23,486,640. Of the factories, 64 are engaged in the preparation of tobacco and 78 in the manufacture of boots, shoes, leather and leather goods.

The population of Richmond is now about 80,000. The value of real and personal property returned ten years ago was $36,559,566. The city is well supplied with educational facilities, and possesses all other advantages incident to the highest forms of civilization.

Among the clubs of the city, the Westmoreland ranks first and foremost. This club was organized February 12th, 1877. General Henry Heth was the first President, being succeeded by Colonel W. H. Palmer, and then by Dr. J. S. D. Cullen, the present incumbent. It first occupied the house on Franklin Street in which General R. E. Lee's family were lodged during the war, but purchased last Summer the house (where now located) on the corner of Sixth and Grace Streets. This house was owned, in succession, by Robert Stanard, William H. Macfarland and James Lyons, who, in their day, dispensed a magnificent hospitality, entertaining every distinguished stranger who visited Richmond, among them the Prince of Wales, Mr. Thackeray and Mr. Dickens. The membership is 160 resident and 60 non-resident, and is composed of the best citizens of the city and elsewhere in the State and outside of it. Among the non-resident members are ex-Governor Theodore F. Randolph, of New Jersey; Charles M. Fry, Francis O. French, William P. Clyde, A. S. Hatch and N. L. McCready, of New York; J. N. Du Barry, Vice-President of the Pennsylvania Railroad; A. S. Biddle and Charles Chauncey, of Philadelphia; Douglas Gordon, of Baltimore; W. W. Corcoran, of Washington, and General W. H. F. Lee and General G. W. C. Lee, of Virginia. To use the language of the charter of the club, it was organized "for the promotion of social intercourse and for the purpose of maintaining a library and reading-room." It subserves a perfect end in the entertainment of strangers in the city who are deserving of attention.

The Virginia Historical Society is located in the Club House, where its whole collection is lodged. The walls of the Club House are adorned mainly with the historical portraits and other pictures belonging to the Virginia Historical Society. From ten till two o'clock on Saturdays the Club House is open to the possession of the ladies of the members of the club. Recently the ladies entertained Mrs. General Bradley Johnson, of Baltimore, and Mr. W. W. Corcoran, of Washington. The affairs of the club are very prosperous, and its appointments are in keeping with the character of its select membership.

THE NEW JERSEY FOREST FIRES.

FOR more than a month fires have raged fiercely in the pine and cedar forests of the lower counties of New Jersey, destroying a vast amount of valuable timber and cranberry bog, seriously threatening railroad communication, and, at times, hovering about small cities with alarming pertinacity. On Monday, May 3d, a large fire broke out on the line of the West Jersey Railroad, between Mount Pleasant Station and Woodbine, and by the time of its discovery it was quite beyond control, and at almost racehorse speed it ran seven miles to the village of Tuckahoe, which was barely saved by the herculean exertions of its inhabitants. From Tuckahoe the fire swept on down to Petersburg and Middletown, destroying five humble dwellings in the forest on its way, and driving the affrighted inhabitants before it in a mad race for life.

Two weeks previous a fire was started in the neighborhood of Manumuskin Station, which did some $100,000 damage to timber lands in that part of the country, destroying among others an exceptionally valuable tract belonging to Charles Colville, near Tuckahoe. The second fire was, however, the closest call that the village had, and, but for the heroic and indefatigable exertions of the people, continued all night long, would have been the last Tuckahoe would have had to fear before being rebuilt.

On Wednesday two small fires were discovered in Atlantic and Burlington Counties, but neither reached such magnitude as to be worthy of especial mention.

Thursday was a memorable day for the frequency and seriousness of these conflagrations. One occurred near Tuckerton, the chief damage done by which was the entire destruction of a natural cranberry bog, of an estimated value of $15,000, and the ruin of a very promising cedar swamp. A second, starting five miles above Egg Harbor City, spread so far as to seriously threaten the villages of Gloucester and Port Republic, but it was, fortunately, confined in its ravages mainly to the uplands, where the timber was of less value.

The greatest fire of the week was the third of Thursday, which, starting a little south of the South Branch switch on the line of the Tuckerton Railroad, and pursuing a general east-southeast direction until it reached the bay, with spurs and laps and spreads on each side, swept over a territory at least seven miles long by one and a half to three miles in width. It came near destroying Waretown, and at one time it was advancing directly towards Barnegat, when a change of the wind veered it off to the direction upon which it finally ran its course. At one point between the Stuyvesant estate and Brown's farm on the Lacy road, a little beyond the intersection of the Cedar Creek road, a check was given in the upland pine woods by "back-firing." But as the fire swept down into the great cedar swamp on Oyster Creek, the brave men who tried a similar experiment there were compelled to fly for their lives, and the device entirely failed.

As the conflagration made its way down into the cedar swamps on Oyster Creek it became more and more terrific. It roared with the noise of many railway trains, and stirred up by its heat a fierce wind that reacted upon and stimulated its force, and hurled masses of flame like luminous clouds towards the zenith.

The railroad bridge across Oyster Creek was on fire three times, but it was saved. All the other bridges in the track of the fire were destroyed together with a number of yachts and other boats. Before the bay, four miles in width, the conflagration stopped, but stopped so close that plants growing in the water had their tops burned off.

Reports of Wednesday, May 12th, showed that the fire was doing much damage in and around Wheatland, Landisville and the neighborhood of Maurice River, and that it had already caused damage to timber land in the Mount Pleasant district of over $200,000; and those of the 13th announced a new outbreak between Farmingdale and Squankum, the partial destruction of Port Republic, and the exhaustion of the fire in the woods along the railroad in telegraphic communication with Manchester. These destructive fires have not been confined to New Jersey alone, as there have been many serious ones in Northern Pennsylvania and on Long Island.

A GREAT PIGEON ROOST.

FOR some weeks past the great pigeon-nesting of Forest County, Pa., has been the scene of extraordinary interest to sportsmen. The nesting covers twenty square miles, and includes myriads upon myriads of pigeons, who are attracted to that locality by the beech-nuts with which the woods abound. This year the birds began to arrive in February, coming in flocks that almost obscured the light of the sun, and filling the forests with a clamor that is described as deafening. At night, according to one account, five square miles of trees were loaded with roosting birds. The fowlers begin netting the pigeons while they are forming a roost. The nets resemble common fish-nets, and are usually sixteen feet wide and thirty feet long. They are spread in an open place over which the birds fly while in search of food. The net is set near a covert made of thick hemlock-boughs. It is strung on a rope tied at either end to green hickory saplings bent parallel to the ground. The ground is sprinkled with buckwheat or other grain, and in some cases stool-pigeons are used. Attracted by the motions of the latter, and then by the grain, the flock settle near the trap, which is quickly sprung. Sometimes hundreds of birds will be caught in one netting.

A party of sportsmen from this city who recently visited the nesting, found in the woods some three hundred others equally intent as themselves in shooting and trapping the birds. A participant in the expedition says: "The wet trees were literally loaded with nests. The hens lay close in their homes, and darted out their heads like snakes, watching our movements with evident curiosity. A steady stream of toms was pouring in, laden with food. Their cries were harsh and unpleasant. At the report of a gun the birds arose in a cloud, and circled over the trees, crying with redoubled energy. They settled on branches so thickly that five or six were killed at a shot. Scores of dead birds were found between moss-grown logs and in thickets where they had fluttered and died after being wounded. They were shot by preceding hunting parties. In one spot thirty feet square seven dead birds were counted. On the second night several bushels of dead birds were heaped in camp. Red-breasted toms and lustrous-necked hens reflected the tints of a glowing camp-fire. The hunters, filled with pork and potatoes and smoking fragrant cigars, sat cross-legged around the cover of a cracker box, immersed in the mysteries of a game of even greater interest than the capture of pigeons. The next day a thousand or more dead birds were shipped by the fowlers." The same writer adds that, "Man is not the only agent in destroying these immense flocks of pigeons. Crows break their eggs and beat out the brains of their young; an army of hawks hangs around the nesting like wolves, and snatches the unwary birds; owls prowl among them at night and destroy untold numbers; twelve years ago a snap of cold weather froze millions of squabs in their nests; vast numbers are drowned in the lakes, and gales and snow-storms break their nests and kill thousands at their roosts. So far as is known, they escape the ravages of pestilence. They are clean and trim birds, and are rarely troubled with vermin. They are strict vegetarians, and never devour a worm nor an insect. They are the sheep of the air. More innocent birds never fluttered a wing; but, like all innocent breathing things, they are a prey to the cruel and the rapacious. Of all their enemies man is the worst; for the hawk, crow and owl raid upon them for sustenance, while man too often kills them in wanton sport."

THE PENNSYLVANIA OIL FIRES.

ON Sunday afternoon, May 2d, the explosion of gas in a stove set fire to the house of Justice Cline, at Rixford, a town eleven miles southeast of Bradford, Pa., and the flames immediately communicated to the adjoining buildings, which being light frame structures, the fire spread rapidly, and before its fury was spent eighty buildings were laid in ashes. The list embraces the principal hotels, stores and business places, including the Kendall and Eldred Railroad Depot. A sudden change of the wind drove the flames to the pump station of the United Pipe Lines, which was soon consumed, and thence to the enormous wooden and iron tanks filled with oil. One 9,000 barrel iron tank of McLeod & Morrison and a 35,000 barrel iron tank of the United Pipe Lines at Rixford were destroyed. During the fire, one tank boiled over and set a second 35,000 barrel iron tank of the United Lines in flames. There were two other tanks of similar dimensions belonging to the Tide Water Pipe Line Company at a place a short distance further down the valley, which were in danger. In and around Rixford were forty derricks, which were also consumed. Several woods fires were reported, which added much to the general alarm, particularly as a high wind prevailed, but a heavy rain on Monday afternoon removed all immediate danger from forest fires. While the heat was too intense to permit a direct attack on the fire, large gangs of men were set at work digging trenches and building dams to divert the course of the running streams of boiling oil.

At about noon on Wednesday, May 12th, fire again started in Timberland, at the head of Foster Brook Valley, eight miles from Bradford. That section is thickly studded with derricks and tanks. The wind was blowing a gale and the fire swept over the ridge, consuming everything like so many reeds. Continuing, the fire swept down Tram Hollow, the prolific portion of the oil field, burning rigs, small tanks and buildings. During the day twelve miles were burned over. The Hollow was thickly lined with rigs and tanks, including several large iron tanks, each with a capacity of 25,000 barrels. The settlements of Oil Centre, Otto City, Morrisburg and Middaughville, located in the valley, were speedily reduced to ashes, the inhabitants fleeing for their lives and leaving their all behind.

Duke Centre, the second largest oil town in the district, was threatened with destruction, several houses in the outskirts being burned. In and around Duke Centre are located twenty-one large tanks, and had the fire got in among them the loss would have been almost incalculable. The Bradford Fire Department was sent for, and staid at Duke Centre all night fighting the flames, returning Thursday morning. The fire cut a swath four miles in width, extending through the valley for nine miles. For several hours Duke Centre was envel oped in darkness. The inhabitants all moved out, abandoning the place. The wind changing, the town was saved. On Wednesday and Thursday fully 250 well and 90,000 barrels of oil were burned. During the seven days ending on the 13th over 350,000 barrels of crude oil had been consumed, including about 700 rigs.

The loss on the oil does not fall on any individual or corporation; but is borne by a general average assessment on all the patrons of the pipe lines.

An Island Prison.

ONE of the first problems forced upon the attention of General Melikoff was the providing of fresh facilities for confining the Czar's disaffected subjects. For several years past the prisons of European Russia have been crowded to overflowing, and the same thing is true of Siberia. It appears that the practical mind of the new ruler has already hit upon a satisfactory solution of this problem. He is going to make the prisoners house themselves and feed themselves. They are to till the soil, to raise cattle, and to become a profit to the State instead of a burden; and they are to do all of this on the Island of Saghalien.

For ten years the Government had been unsuccessfully trying to colonize this island. The great difficulty has been to get the prisoners there and to supply them with food and clothing after they got there. Last Summer the experiment was tried for the first time of transporting them by sea in convict ships, and the authorities were so well pleased with the result that the work of colonization is henceforth to be steadily pushed.

At present there are on this island a little more than two thousand prisoners, all condemned to hard labor for long terms. Six hundred of them are employed in the coal mines at the post of Dua, and the rest are making roads and otherwise preparing for the arrival of the newcomers. Besides the post of Dua, there are three more to be established—one in the Valley of the Alexandrovsk, one in that of the Tymovsk, and the Korsakoff post. This will give three posts in the central part of the island, and one at its southern end. The large farms are to be established at the posts of Alexandrovsk and Tymovsk. It is said that the Government has already appropriated the money necessary for carrying out these plans.

Saghalien is to have an administration of its own. Besides several companies of soldiers, who will perform guard duty, there will be a surveyor, an agriculturist and an architect to direct and supervise the prisoners at their work. Two surgeons are already on the island. This new scheme of colonization is not popular. The Nihilists don't like it; for, once transported to that distant island, they will be practically cut off from the people among whom they desire to propagate their doctrines. The peasants, who have become accustomed to the terrors of Siberia, are awe-struck at the thought of a long voyage in the dreadful floating prison, over unknown seas, to a rocky island that is further than even far-off Siberia, and that lies by the side of heathen Japan. One point troubles the Government. The chances are that escapes will be more frequent than in Siberia. It is known that a large number of those transported to Saghalien last Summer have already got away.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

English Scientists have bought the 500 pound fragment of the meteor which fell in Iowa some months ago, for $6,000.

Remains of Lake Dwellings have been discovered in a peat bog near Milan, and, in a street in Milan, excavations for a house have brought to light what are believed to be vestiges of the old Roman theatre.

A Tessellated Pavement and walls colored with fresco have been discovered in excavating for a cistern at Chieti. A coin of Tiberius which was found indicates that the building dates from that emperor's reign.

The International Congress of Anthropology and Prehistoric Archæology holds its next meeting at Lisbon, from September 20th to 29th, this year. Several important questions concerning the prehistoric archæology of Portugal will be discussed. Excursions will be made to several places of archæological interest.

A Universal Exhibition of prehistoric German anthropology will take place at Berlin in August. All the German States have been invited to join in this exhibition, which will comprise objects chosen from every museum in Germany. Professor Virchow is at the head of the committee appointed to organize the necessary details.

The Introduction into this country of the Australian acacia is deprecated by Professor Dwinelle, of the University of California, who says the handsome foliage and sweet flowers of the acacias will prove to be expensive luxuries. Those planted at San Rafael, California, have been nurseries for the breeding of a large white "mealy bug," or "scale," which has spread to orchards and gardens, and is proving a great plague.

Professor Pro-dochani, of the Erie (France) Museum, who discovered a prehistoric cemetery on the slope of the hills overlooking that town, has unearthed in the same vicinity eighty-two tombs—forty-four of them violated, apparently during the Roman period; the rest untouched, with all their pottery and bronzes. The urns are of three periods; some colored black, with linear ornamentation; others adorned with circles and wavy lines; others with alternate bands of red and black. The bronze ornaments are also very interesting, and a bronze chest bears three designs, comprising in all seventeen warriors and a priest, seven animals (horses, oxen, stags, birds and a dog), several plants, and a kind of chariot with a man seated in it. The professor considers these the finest prehistoric remains in Italy.

A Prize of $100 is offered by the Royal College of Physicians, London, for the most valuable essay on hydrophobia. The questions which are thought by the college specially to require investigation are: The origin and history of outbreaks of rabies; the best mode of prevention of rabies; the characteristics of rabies during life, and the anatomical and chemical changes which are associated with the disease in its successive stages, particularly in its commencement; the origin of hydrophobia in man; the chemical and anatomical morbid changes observed in the subjects of the disease, with special reference to those having their seat in the organs of the nervous system, and in the salivary glands; the symptoms of the disease in well observed cases; the diagnosis of the disease in doubtful cases; the efficacy of the various remedies and modes of prevention.

The Sums placed at the disposal of the French Minister of Agriculture and Commerce for the purpose of encouraging research and experiments as to the best way of dealing with the phylloxera, amounted, in 1879, to 500,000 francs, and this will be increased during the present year by supplementary grants to 969,750 francs. Of this amount 200,000 francs are devoted to the treatment of diseased vines in the districts specified by the superior commission, while 250,000 francs will be given to doubling the grants voted by the various departmental and municipal bodies. Societies and companies formed for the investigation of the disease will also be assisted by bounties to the aggregate amount of 300,000 francs. A further sum of 100,000 francs is set aside towards encouraging the propagation of American vine stocks and the distribution of new plants and cuttings. Rewards to the amount of 100,000 francs will be given for furthering microscopic researches, while 50,000 francs are left for dealing with individual cases.

MR. LAWRENCE OLIPHANT is reported to have applied to the Sultan for a grant of the Valley of the Jordan for purposes of colonization on a new and improved model; but his Majesty did not approve the proposal.

M. JEAN BAPTISTE LÉON SAY, the new French Ambassador to England, is now fifty-five years old. He is married to the daughter of M. Bertin, principal proprietor of the Débats, of which journal M. Say has been an editor.

MISS MARY FLORENCE BARING, said now to be the fiancée of Prince Leopold, of England, is a granddaughter of the first Lord Ashburton by his wife, Miss Bingham, of Philadelphia, who was a daughter of Senator William Bingham.

CLARK MILLS, the sculptor, is seventy years old. Until his fortieth year he was a plasterer, and never had any idea of becoming a sculptor. At the time he undertook his first equestrian statue of Jackson he had never seen the General nor an equestrian statue.

MARIO, once the most charming of tenors, is now a white-haired, white-bearded old man, whose placid expression conveys no suggestion of regret for the lyric triumphs left so far behind. He has fine, dark eyes and fresh complexion, with a little tinge of color on his cheeks, and a quiet and courteous manner.

GOVERNOR HOYT of Pennsylvania has appointed Edgar Paschal, a leading member of the Republican Party in Pike County, Associate Judge, to fill the vacancy caused by the death, on May 10th, of George F. MISS LILY LYTLE MACALESTER, granddaughter of Mr. Charles Macalester, of Philadelphia, has just been married at Rome to Signor Feichi Vici, a member of a distinguished old Italian family. The young lady is a recent convert to the Catholic Church. Princess Massimo, the half-sister of the Comte de Chambord, having been her godmother.

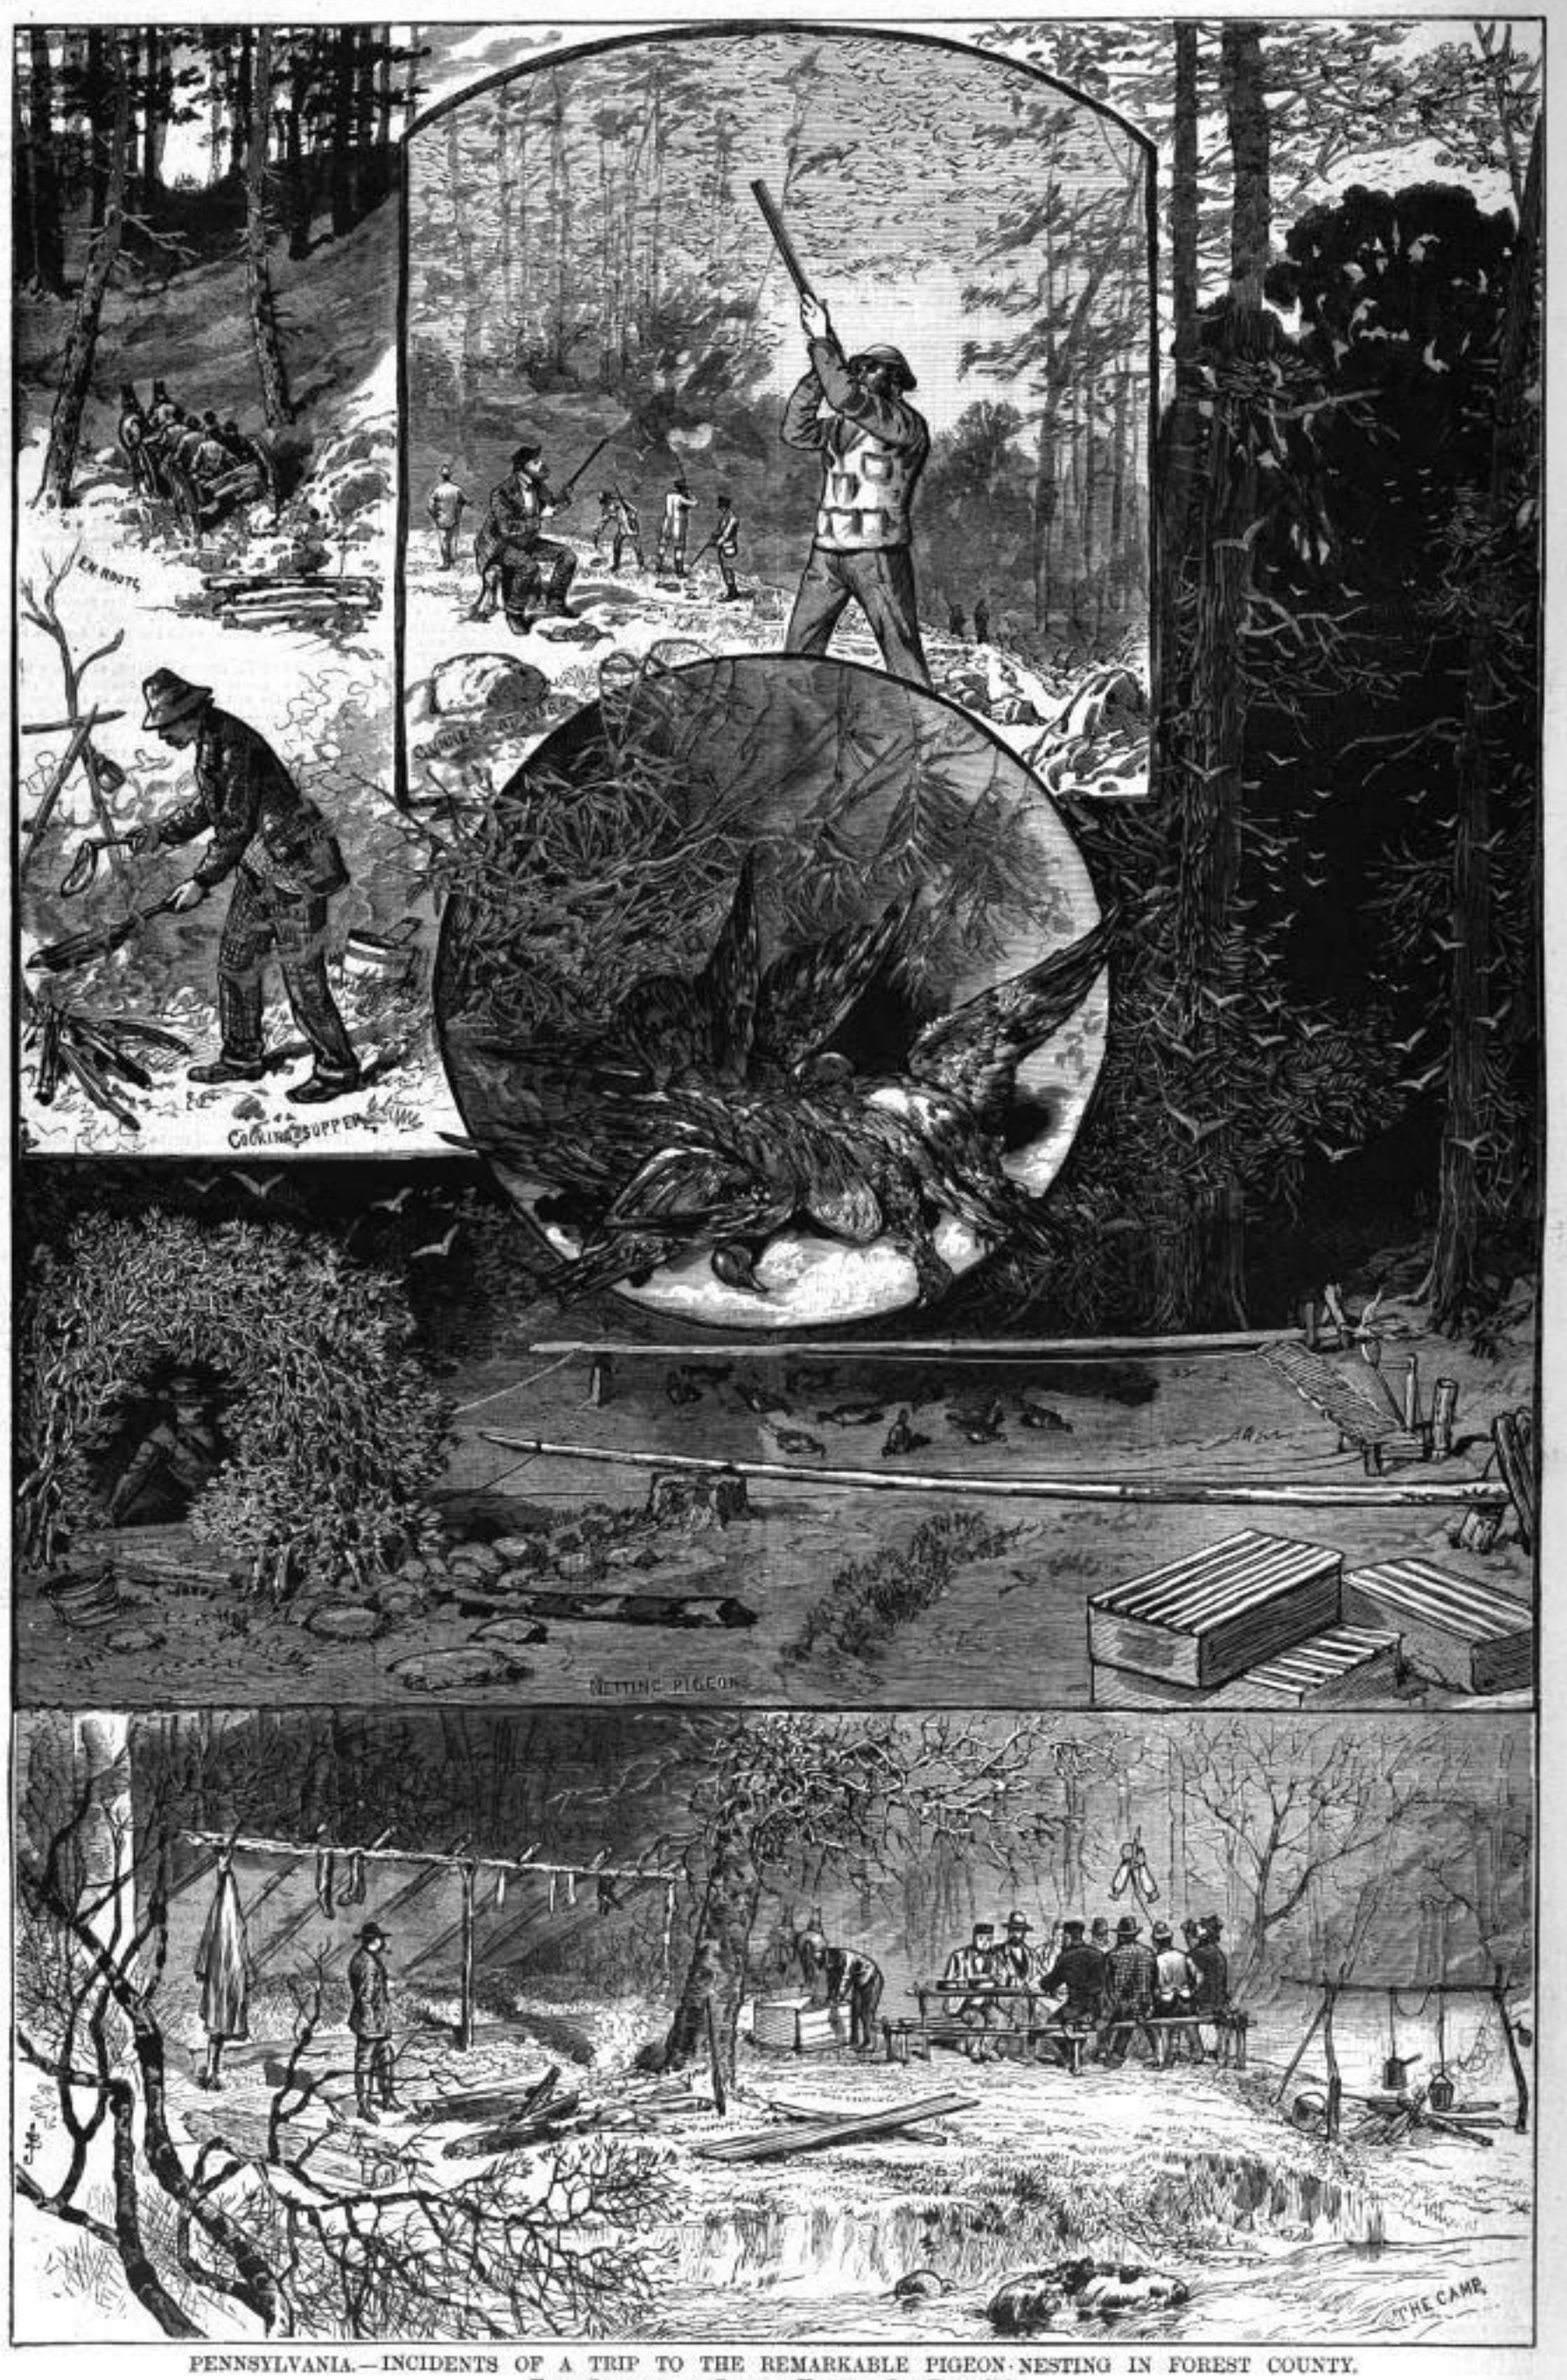
ITALY is jealous of the honors that France has recently paid to Verdi. King Humbert has decorated the composer with the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Maurice and Lazarus. A gold medal is being coined in his honor at Naples, and Milan has opened a subscription, which is fast filling up, for the erection of a colossal statue representing the composer in the attitude of an orchestra leader.

ON the occasion of the anniversary of the birth of Francis Joseph of Austria, the City of Spalato, Dalmatia, celebrated the reopening of the aqueduct which brings water from Salona to the city, and which was built by the Dalmatian Emperor Diocletian. The curious feature about the affair is that, notwithstanding the sure need of water under which the city has always labored, the aqueduct had never been repaired, and had therefore been unavailable for fourteen centuries.



AT the funeral service of Wieniawski, at Warsaw, his violin was placed on a cushion of violet velvet at the foot of the bier, and was environed with crowns of laurels presented by his brother-artists. Speaking of Wieniawski, it may be stated as a fact known to but a few persons, that when in this country he and Rubenstine had a serious quarrel, and did not exchange a word for many months. They were forced to meet "officially" for rehearsal and performance, but never talked together.

THE German Empire has commissioned Baron Max Maria von Weber, son of the composer, Carl Maria von Weber, to visit the United States this Summer and report upon our system of internal navigation and our cheaper railroads, as the construction of a great system of local railroads and canal and river improvements is contemplated in Germany. Baron Weber was for years manager of the Saxon State railroads, afterwards consulting railroad engineer of the Austrian Government, and latterly has been attached to the Prussian Ministry of Public Works.

IT was at the meeting of the Cabinet held in Lord Salisbury's bedroom on the day after his return from Hatfield House, after his long illness, that the question of immediate dissolution was decided. The idea was strenuously opposed by the Premier, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Salisbury, and they stated reasons for their views which turned out to be thoroughly well founded. On the other side they found arrayed against them the Home Secretary, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the War Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who were no less energetic in declaring their conviction that an immediate dissolution, following on the Liverpool and Southwark elections, would give the Government a new lease of power. The question was then put to the vote, and the Premier found himself in a decided minority.

MR. GLADSTONE'S religious opinions are those of the High Church Party, of which he is the most distinguished lay champion. He belongs to what in his remarkable paper on the "Courses of Religious Thought" he calls the Historical School—believing in a divinely established visible church, with a ministry descended in perpetual succession from the apostles, not infallible, but teaching ex cathedra, and the repository of the faith, of which the essential articles are contained in the ancient creeds, and shown by the consensus of Christendom. He feels a warm sympathy for the oppressed churches of the East, as well as for the Old Catholics of the Continent. He has always had a sympathy for free thought and free investigation, for the deep piety and devout life exhibited in the Evangelical or Calvinistic denominations have constantly called forth from him expressions of admiration.

THE REV. DR. CYRUS D. FOSS, OF MIDDLETOWN, CONN., NEWLY-ELECTED BISHOP OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

THE REV. DR. HENRY W. WARREN, OF PHILADELPHIA, NEWLY-ELECTED BISHOP OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

THE REV. DR. JOHN F. HURST, OF MADISON, N. J., NEWLY-ELECTED BISHOP OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

NEW BISHOPS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

ON Wednesday, May 12th, the Methodist General Conference, in session at Cincinnati, elected four Bishops to fill vacancies caused by death. The new dignitaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church are: The Rev. Henry W. Warren, of Philadelphia; Cyrus D. Foss, D. D., LL.D., President of Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn.; John F. Hurst, President of Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N. J.; and Dr. E. O. Haven, Chancellor of the Syracuse University. The election occupied the entire day and created much local interest.

The Rev. Dr. Foss is a native of Kingston, Ulster County, in this State, where he was born January 17th, 1834. He entered the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., as a student in 1850, after having pursued a preparatory course of study at Amenia Seminary. He was graduated in 1854, and passed the succeeding three years at Amenia Seminary as Professor and Principal of the preparatory school. On May 6th, 1857, he was received into the New York Conference at Newburg. His first charge was Chester, N. Y., a post which he held with satisfaction to himself and the Society until 1859, when he was transferred to First Street, Brooklyn. After serving the two years allotted by the rules of the Church, he was advanced, in 1861, to Hanson Place Church, Brooklyn. In 1863-4 he officiated in St. John's Church, Williamsburg; in 1865-7, at St. Paul's, in this city; in 1868-70, at Trinity, in this city; and in 1871-3, a second time at St. Paul's. In 1873 he was appointed to the pastorate of St. James's Church, Harlem; and on July 28th, 1875, he was elected President of the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn. He was installed in his seat on October 26th of the same year, and has since filled that responsible position with satisfaction to his pupils as well as the trustees. His degrees of Doctor of Divinity, Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts were all conferred upon him by his Alma Mater. He was one of the delegates from this city to the General Conference, held at Brooklyn, at which he received eighty-five votes for Bishop.

The Rev. Dr. John F. Hurst was born near Salem, Md., August 17th, 1834. He pursued a preparatory course of instruction at Cambridge Academy, and was graduated with honors in 1854. After teaching ancient languages for two years at Hedding Institute, New York, he went to Germany, and continued his theological studies at Halle and Heidelberg Universities. Returning to this country in 1858, he entered the Newark Conference, where he continued for some time in the itinerant work. He was next appointed Principal of the Theological Department of the Mission Institute of the Methodist Church in Bremen, where he remained for three years. He was appointed Professor of Historical Theology in the Drew Theological Institute, in Madison, N. J., and was elevated to the Presidency of the Institute in 1873. He is a distinguished writer, and the author of many theological works.

The Rev. Henry W. Warren is a native of Massachusetts, and was graduated at Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., in 1853. For two years after being graduated Dr. Warren taught the ancient languages at Wilbraham Seminary, and in 1855 he joined the New England Conference, filling the pulpits of various churches. The Massachusetts State Senate appointed him to preach the election sermon in 1864. In 1871 he became a member of the Philadelphia Conference, and was assigned to the Arch Street Church. He was transferred to the New York East Conference in 1874, and remained there three years. Then he returned to the Philadelphia Conference, and resumed the pulpit of the Arch Street Church. Dr. Warren has traveled extensively in Europe and the East. He has written many prominent articles for the Church periodicals, and is the author of a popular work called "Sights and Insights," and a treatise on astronomy. He is highly esteemed in Philadelphia.

The Rev. Dr. E. O. Haven is Chancellor of the Syracuse University. He was born in Boston, November 1st, 1820, and is a graduate of the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn. He held a professor's chair at Amenia Seminary for two years, and was engaged in pastoral work from 1848 to 1853, when he accepted a position in the University of Michigan. While there he was Professor of Latin and of Rhetoric and English Literature for two years. He became the editor of Zion's Herald, in Boston, in 1856, and left it in 1863 to become President of the University of Michigan. He resigned that office to accept a similar position in the Northwestern University, at Evanston, Ill., in 1869, and remained there for three years. In 1870 he was elected Chancellor of the Syracuse University. He is also Secretary of the Board of Education of the Methodist Church. Dr. Haven has been a member of five General Conferences. He is the author of several works, chief among them being Haven's "Rhetoric." As a preacher and lecturer he is able and eloquent.

FUN.

TEACHER (to pupil)—"How old are you?" Pupil—"Six years." Teacher—"When were you six years old?" Pupil—"On my birthday."

WHEN a man's wife comes in and sees him razor in hand and with his face all lather, and asks him, "Are you shaving?" it's a provoking thing in him to answer, "No; I'm blacking the stove."

TALK about the sincerity of poets! Tennyson thinks there is nothing so good as American navy plug tobacco, and yet he writes his poems about modest violets and blushing roses. When has he ever hauled out an ode to navy plug?

"MY boys," said a kind Old City teacher, "if you would be President of the United States you must be good and studious." "Who wants to be President?" yelled out a young chap from a back seat. "I'd ruther be Buffler Bill, and shoot an Injun." And the boys all chorused: "Them's our sentiments."

A POOR fellow up-town fairly danced with joy when the doctor told him he had Bright's disease. "What will the Smith girl say now?" he exclaimed triumphantly. "She always said there was nothing bright about me! Oh, I guess not; but the doctor's certificate will show what kind of a hair-pin I am."

A TEACHER, trying to impress on the youthful mind the sinfulness of not speaking the truth, asked him if they did not tell him in Sunday-school where bad boys went to who told falsehoods. Choking with sobs, he said: "Yes, marm; it's a place where there is a fire, but I don't remember the name of the town."

SCENE: A Country Road. Squire (who is a candidate for the representation in Parliament of his county): "Well, John, and what do you think of my chances for a seat in Parliament?" John (a canny-going countryman): "Well, Squire, a really dinna like to say, but sin' ye've pit a strecht question, an' a'm thinkin' a should but add an honest answer, a'm thinking you should staun as lang as ye can, for a doot if ye'll ever sit."

IN a house occupied by two families, in this city, there recently died an old gentleman. As the time for the funeral approached, the widow of the deceased applied to her neighbor occupant for the use of a large front room for funeral purposes. The gentleman appealed to hesitated slightly, but quickly assented when his thirteen-year-old daughter spoke and said: "Father, what's the odds, as long as the neighbors furnish the corpse?"

"OH, indeed, it is a very busy time with us," said charming Miss Fizzjoy. "There are a great many services to attend, and then we have so much shopping to do just now." "Pardon me, but is not this the season of humiliation—" "Why, certainly, John, you darling; but you see if we should fail to come out on Easter in the new styles, the season of humiliation you speak of would continue longer and be much more dreadful."

AN agent of an accident insurance company entered a smoking-car on a Western railroad train a few days ago, and approaching an exceedingly gruff old man, asked him if he did not want to take out a policy. He was told to get out with his policy, and passed on. A few minutes afterwards an accident occurred to the train, causing a fearful shaking of the cars. The old man jumped up, and seizing a book at the side of the car to steady himself, called out, "Where is that insurance man?"

M. BERTRAND, the director of the Paris Varieties Theatre, was once considerably bothered by a young author, who insisted on reading a play to him. Pushed at last into a corner, Bertrand appoints a day, and the young man presents himself. "Read away, my friend," he says, in his kindest manner. The young man begins in a trembling voice. "Stop," says Bertrand, "you shiver; are you cold?" Glad of an excuse to cover his timidity, the trembling author confesses that he is cold. Bertrand rings the bell. "Madeline," he says, to the servant, "put a few plays into the fire." Madeline goes to a big chest and brings out an armful of manuscripts which she tumbles into the grate. Bertrand's kindness was warm, but scarcely encouraging.

SCENE FROM A POLICE COURT IN SACRAMENTO: The Judge—"Bill Sheets, you are charged with burglary. Are you guilty?" "Sure, yer 'onor, an' if it's goolthy I am, do yes thinks I be afther tellin' yes ov it? I pleads not goolthy," was the response of Bill. "All right," said the Judge, and turning to one of the most eminent members of the bar, said: "You will please act as counsel for the defendant." At this the prisoner turned and calmly surveyed the placid countenance of his champion, and then addressed the Court as follows: "Sure, an' if it's that yes afther givin' me fur a lofyer, I pleads goolthy, and be done with it at once." Then as he turned and pointed to the robust form of a youthful member of the bar, he continued: "But if yel'll give me him, as what is a foine lofyer, I'll plade not goolthy." The prisoner was allowed his choice of counsel.

LOOK AT THE EVIDENCE.

A RETIRED physician in the State of New York says: "I have read with care your Brochure and many of the cases given and treated by the 'Compound Oxygen Treatment,' and freely say the testimony from so many persons of reputation and character, and your reasonings and facts, ought to influence the most incredulous to take the treatment—in such cases, at least, as have baffled long perseverance and skill." Brochure sent free. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A CAPITAL anecdote is told of a little fellow who in turning over the leaves of a scrap-book came across the well-known picture of some chickens just out of their shell. "My companion examined the picture carefully, and then with a grave, sagacious look at me, slowly remarked, 'They came out 'cos they was afraid of being bothed.'"

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES IN AUSTRALIA.

[From the Report of Judges at the Sydney International Exposition, 1879-1880.]

IN the examination of scales exhibited, the jury find as follows:

MESSRS. FAIRBANKS & CO., New York and London, are adjudged to have exhibited the largest and most complete assortment of scales for all purposes, from heavy track scales to the delicate chemist's scales, shown at the Exhibition. We find the same uniformity of skillful manufacture in all their scales and the same sensibility of balance. The most severe tests to the qualities of the materials employed prove the uniformity and excellence of the same in every part. The variety of manufacture and modification of form and adaptability of the scales of this firm exceed all others combined exhibited, all the designs being original with the firm. They show over thirty patents for improvements made in the manufacture since the establishment of the factory.

The levers being all in a direct line and free from torsion, with a simple beam combination, make them less liable to error than any scale we examined. By a new process of surface carbonization the pivots and bearings, made from the toughest Bessemer steel, are rendered hard as agate without destroying to any appreciable extent their tensile strength, and by scientific and practically tested distribution of weight and strength the scales are lighter than any other of equal capacity. The system of suspending the weighbridge platforms on swivels, with corner lockings, is specially to be commended, as there can be no unequal settling or strain upon the levers, and the transmission of the strain in a vertical line prevents any cramp of the levers. By the system of levers shown there is practically no limit to the modification of forms of platforms and adaptability to every conceivable want, of which there are already over 800 modifications now in use, including the balance and trip scales. The different parts being made by machinery and first tested to standard gauge, are all interchangeable, the beam of any ten-ton scale being equally serviceable for any other scales of the same capacity. Check-rods are used on all platform scales the same as corner lockings upon the weighbridges, which prevents any oscillation upon the knife-edges of the pivots, which must necessarily greatly increase the longevity of the scale and preserve the sensibility of the balance.

In view of the many practical advantages which this scale possesses over any and all exhibited, and as a collective exhibit, showing the perfection now arrived at by the genius of one family, your jury recommend a special distinctive diploma or award to Messrs. Fairbanks, in addition to what would be simply a first-class award.

A VALUABLE volume, entitled "Graded Selections for Memorizing, Adapted for Use at Home and in School," has just been issued by Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., of Cincinnati. The book appears to have been suggested by the success of the method of memorizing choice thoughts from our best authors which is pursued in the Cincinnati public schools, and which has exerted a powerful influence for good upon the pupils. The volume contains extracts from more than 100 standard authors in English literature, and these are so graded as to suit the capacity of children anywhere from six to thirteen years of age. The book will no doubt command a wide sale.

GREAT projects and great successes are sure emblems of a great country. New York and the other large Eastern cities have no peers in the world for fine modern buildings; this is particularly true in everything pertaining to hotel life. The ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, New York, represents a success founded upon real merit. It is in the first place one of the most conspicuously handsome buildings on Broadway, while its interior caters to every taste of refinement. Mr. Welch deserves the patronage which the public have always given him for the conscientious way in which he has performed his duty to his patrons.—Boston Home Journal.

THE
NEW & POWERFUL SERIAL STORY
Commenced in the present issue of Frank Leslie's
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER
ENTITLED
"THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS,"
By the Author of "IN THE MESHES."

The story abounds in romantic incidents and thrilling scenes of passion, most of which are laid in Russia, and is brightened by interesting pictures of Russian life.

SIBERIA also, with its horrors and frozen wilds—the toil in the mines, and hopeless daily drudgery called life in exile—are all vividly portrayed.

The story will not fail to attract wide attention as one of the very best of recent novels of American authorship.

BANKERS—National Park Bank.

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines, the Louis and the Baden Baden, covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

THE UNIT RULE.

THE New York Times has recently called the attention of its political friends to some grave defects in that part of the Republican organization which presides over the constitution of its national conventions held every four years for the selection of candidates for the two highest offices in the people's gift. The system of such nominating conventions dates from the days of "Jackeonism" in our Federal politics, and was originally devised for the avowed purpose of bringing the choice of candidates more nearly home to the business and bosoms of the people than had been common under the preceding dominion of the "Congressional Caucus." It was charged, moreover, that much of bargaining and corruption was incident to the methods of the latter, and the strain put upon it by the Presidential "scrub race" of 1824 was so great that the whole machinery of the Congressional Caucus fell into a confusion and wreck from which it has never recovered.

And yet when we compare the Presidential line which owed its selection to this caucus with the line of Presidents which dates from the beginning of the modern system, it is safe to say that the names of Jefferson, of Madison, of Monroe and of John Quincy Adams have nothing to fear from being placed in competition with their more modern successors in the Presidential office. And in point of intrigue, of finesse and of management, it is now painfully evident that the existing system is no improvement on the system which it superseded, with this element of danger superadded—that the members of a National Convention act with a much less vivid and tangible sense of personal responsibility than did the members of a Congressional Caucus. The members of the old Congressional Caucus had this at least to be said in favor of the prerogative which they assumed—that they were the élite of their party in the nation, and that they could always be held by their constituents to a rigid responsibility for the selections they might make; while the members of a national nominating convention come like shadows, and like shadows depart after their work has been ended.

And instead of bringing the choice of a Presidential candidate more directly home to the people, the modern system has come of late years to be worked by managers who studiously devise ways and means for the suppression of any political sentiment, within their own party, which is antagonistic to the dynastic schemes they have elected to favor.

Prominent among these devices for the suppression of a free and a proportional representation of political sentiment is "the unit rule," according to which the delegates appointed by a State convention to participate in a national convention may be bound to vote as an unit in obedience to the instructions of the State convention. In this way the wishes and preferences of large masses of voters are entirely overslaughed by the vote of a small majority, and the national convention, instead of being a reflex and representative of the real composite sense of the party, becomes the reflex and representative of the slightly dominant preference which has prevailed, it may be, by the arts of trickery and coercion, in a few of the most populous and influential States. That such is the working of "the unit rule," and that it was devised for the purpose of forestalling a given result, is apparent to all who have watched the proceedings of the Republican State Conventions in Pennsylvania, in New York and elsewhere—Indeed, wherever the "Third Term managers" have felt that it was in their power to accomplish by the coercive force of a resolution what they could not hope to accomplish by the free and unfettered expression of public sentiment.

In this way the political centre of gravity within the Republican organization has been violently wrested from its true and natural position, and has been placed in the hands of a few adroit manipulators of the political machine. And all this has been done in the face of the precedent set by the last nominating convention of the Republican Party, which expressly voted to release certain members of the Pennsylvania delegation from the obligation with which the State convention had endeavored to bind them.

And the injustice of "the unit rule" is exceeded by its futility. Invented for the purpose of solidifying the Grant sentiment in the Republican ranks, it has proved the fruitful source of sects and schisms, of reactions and defections. As the old Congressional Caucus broke down under the strain put upon it by the political hurly-burly of 1824, it is to be hoped that the time is not far distant when the wreck and débris of the present political machinery will be removed for repairs. The present method has come to minimize the share which the people should legitimately take in the selection of the nation's Chief Magistrate, and the mournful prophecy of Mr. Jefferson, that the President of the United States, considered in the mode of his election, "would be a poor edition of a Polish King," has received more confirmation than it is pleasant to contemplate. Our Presidential "campaigns" illustrate the strategy and ferocity of actual warfare, without its generosity, and without its chivalry. The nobility of Poland electing a king in the open air, seated in the saddle and with arms in their hands, were scarcely a more tumultuous body than the members of a modern national convention, with its belligerent clansmen following the beck of some feudal chieftain.

We have reason to tremble for the stability as well as the beauty of our political system in the presence of such disorders. For the strength of any system is always equal to the strength of its weakest part, and the part of our system is weakness itself. What should be the highest exercise of the intelligent choice of a great and magnanimous people has come to be a mere scramble for place and spoils, in which the victory is won not by the most deserving, but by the most impudent and the most grasping.

DECORATION DAY.

DECORATION DAY, sacred to the memory of the dead who died for the Republic, comes on apace. The indications are that it will be observed with unusual honors. The instinct of patriotism in the souls of the people impels them more and more, every year, to emphasize with conspicuous marks of appreciation the heroism and valor which welcomed wounds, disease and death for the nation's sake. Just as kindly nature has healed the scars of our rent and ghastly battle-fields, so sectional animosities and party hates are cooled with the lapse of years, and we are able to measure with judicial clearness the real value of the service which the wearers of the blue performed for their country and mankind, and our memorial tributes have all the greater meaning because they are offered soberly and in a deliberate persuasion of their justice, rather than under the impulse of frenzy and passion.

Decoration Day ought to be, and may be, the general Sabbath of the nation. Then, if ever, all animosities should be hushed, all old feuds forgotten, all jealousies and contentions silenced. The one lesson of the day should be, everywhere, that the maintenance of peace and fraternity is the supreme duty of all good citizens, and that gratitude for past deliverances should beget a closer unity and kindlier forbearance in all the future. That was a beautiful incident, illustrative of the fraternal spirit which should characterize all our people, which happened the other day in Tennessee. General Joseph E. Johnson, a distinguished Confederate general, while on his way with a large escort of ex-Confederates to Nashville to witness the unveiling of the Jackson equestrian statue, passed through the National Cemetery of Murfreesboro. As the train reached the sacred limits, the Confederates uncovered, and the band struck up a dirge, in token of respect to the Union dead. It was the tribute of brave men to the memory of others no less brave; but it was more than this: it was an expression of the growing and deepening sentiment of brotherhood in the hearts of the true men of all sections and all parties—a proof that we are outgrowing the hates of the past and falling into line, elbow touching elbow, as one people, having a common country and a common destiny.

We cannot recall the dead. No drum-beat can awaken them out of their sleep. No bugle-call can ever summon them again to the serried ranks from which they fell out. But, strewing their graves with flowers, we may at least emulate their patriotism, and faithfully carry forward to coming generations the principles and the ideas for which they died. Profiting by their example, we may make our lives, as were theirs, grand and noble in their allegiance to duty, and so prove ourselves worthy to enjoy the blessings and the opportunities which their royal sacrifice secured to us and our children.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

THE scheme to give Congress absolute control over the electoral system to the country should be stoutly resisted. To permit that body to become the sole judge of the qualifications and acts of State electors, and to exercise the power of rejecting the votes of any or all of them, as contemplated by Senator Morgan's Bill, is simply to sanction a violation of the Constitution and the overthrow of a well-defined right pertaining to the several States.

The Constitution is explicit in its details and free from all obscurities. Its language is never susceptible of double interpretation. In no one thing is it more definite than with reference to the method of electing the chief administrative officer of the country. It leaves nothing to Congress except to witness the opening of the certificates transmitted by the Electoral Colleges to the President of the Senate, and the counting of the votes by, or under the direction of, that officer.

The third paragraph of Section I., Article II., permits Congress to determine the time of choosing electors and the day on which such electors shall give their votes; but each State is made the sole arbiter of the qualifications of its electors, subject only to the following constitutional formula:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector. . . .

"The Electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President. . . . They shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

From first to last the matter of electors is made a State affair. Each State by and for itself must choose a certain number of electors, in the way and manner prescribed by its own legislative body. It is an exercise of sovereignty with which the organic law permits no interference. It is a right which cannot be infringed save through usurpation. The electors, when chosen, must meet in their own States and consummate the work assigned them by the Constitution. The two Houses, acting within the limits of the law, are permitted to judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of their own members, but the States, individually, are to exercise full supervisory power over the elections, returns and qualifications of members of their Electoral Colleges. To maintain, then, that Congress may clothe itself, or a majority thereof, with power to decide all matters pertaining to the counting of the electoral votes of the States, and to reject such votes in whole or in part, is simply to promote a monstrous pretense. If the President were to disperse Congress at the point of the bayonet, the act would be no more of an usurpation than that contemplated by the Morgan Bill.

It is a noteworthy fact that the convention which framed the Constitution voted three several times—and once by a unanimous vote of all the States represented in that body—to make the President elective by the two Houses of Congress. Each time the vote was reconsidered and, after a four months' continuous session, it was finally decided to place the power of election with the States and thus prevent the Executive from becoming the mere creature of Congress.

So carefully did the convention choose to guard the electoral system against usurpation that it made the President of the Senate—Vice-President of the United States—sole guardian of the electoral certificates forwarded from the States. Furthermore, the Constitution declares that he, "the President of the Senate," the constitutionally appointed custodian of the returns, with the Senate and House of Representatives witnessing his action, shall open the certificates and declare their contents, or, in other words, announce the number of electoral votes of each State, and for whom cast. The work is purely ministerial and calls for no aid from Senators or Representatives. If there be no choice either of President or Vice-President, then each House, acting by itself, has a duty to perform. The Constitution determines that in that event—namely, if no candidate for these offices shall have received a majority of the votes set forth in the certificates—then the House shall choose a President and the Senate a Vice-President from among the candidates voted for by the States. The fact that such a duty may devolve upon them doubtless had weight with the framers of the Constitution, and led them to confide the opening of certificates and the counting of votes to the President of the Senate.

It is scarcely possible that Congress will pass the Bill of Senator Morgan during the present session, but its very introduction should serve to put the American people on their guard, to the end that they may prevent legislation hostile to their rights and to the supreme law of the land.

ENGLAND AND TURKEY.

THE Queen's Speech, read at the opening of the British Parliament last week, proposes but few measures of legislation, but these are of real importance. They include a Bill relative to burials, the renewal of the Ballot Act, and Bills for giving more effectual protection to the occupiers of land against injury from ground game; for determining on just principles the liabilities of employers for accidents sustained by workmen, and for the extension of the borough franchise in Ireland. The Peace Preservation Act for Ireland will not be renewed. As to the foreign policy of the Government, the address says its present and chief aim will be to promote, in concert with the other powers of Europe, "the early and complete fulfillment of the treaty of Berlin with respect to effectual reforms and equal laws in Turkey, as well as such territorial questions as are not yet settled in conformity with the provisions of the treaty."

In discussing this part of the address in the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone said that the appointment of Mr. Goschen as Ambassador Extraordinary to the Porte was specifically designed to clear up the misapprehensions entertained by Turkey as to the attitude and purpose of Great Britain touching the literal execution of the Berlin Treaty. "The Government," Mr. Gladstone said, "viewed the Greek and Montenegrin questions as pressing. It was desirable to disabuse the minds of the Turkish people of the notion that England had a special, separate interest in the maintenance of Turkey. It was also desirable to remove from the mind of the Porte the idea that England was disposed to trespass upon their rights in Asia. All that the Government desired, he said, was to see the obligations of Turkey faithfully fulfilled. They had no desire to reduce the limits of Turkish territory in any direction."

There can be no doubt that the purpose here announced will be vigorously prosecuted. Mr. Goschen has already had interviews on the subject with the Premiers of France and Austria, and there is every reason to believe that Turkey will soon be summoned to give a categorical reply to the collective demands of representatives of the signatory powers. Among the measures which will probably be imposed on Turkey is the establishment of the International Administration Commission stipulated by the treaty. If Mr. Gladstone shall succeed in bringing the perfidious Turk to an honest performance of his obligations, or, failing in that, shall array against him the conscience and power of civilized Europe, he will, in one act, render a service to the cause of good government greater than Beaconsfield, with all his pomp and pretense of statesmanship, has ever, in a long lifetime, performed.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE meeting of the British Parliament is referred to elsewhere. The two appointments made by Mr. Gladstone that have drawn upon him the most severe criticism and abuse are those of the Marquis of Ripon as Viceroy of India and of Sir Charles Dilke as Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. The appointment of the Marquis of Ripon was a surprising one to most people. In the first place, every one believed that Lord Northbrook, the former Liberal Viceroy, would again be appointed; and, in the second place, the Marquis of Ripon is a convert to Roman Catholicism. It will be remembered that, according to English law, the Viceroy of Ireland cannot be a Catholic, and it was considered a maxim of unwritten law—something like our third term tradition—that the Viceroy of India, representing as he does the person of the Queen, must be a member of the State Church. So, when his appointment was announced, there was a general howl of dismay from the Anglicans and Nonconformists. A society calling itself the British Reformation Society drew up a series of resolutions objecting to his appointment, and quoted with considerable force Mr. Gladstone's own pamphlet against Vaticanism, in which he points out that no statesman being a good Catholic can be also a true patriot. Gladstone has gone to the trouble of writing an explanatory letter in which he says that he is convinced that the Marquis will allow nothing to interfere with the conscientious performance of his duty towards the Queen. Had the appointment been made before Mr. Gladstone's election for Midlothian, it is more than probable that it would have caused his defeat at the hands of the Scotch Nonconformists. The whole matter is curious as illustrating the feeling in England against Rome.

When the Marquis of Ripon joined the "Mother Church," it was in every way detrimental to his position, and he by his own act disqualified himself for high Government appointment. At the instance of the Church he resigned his high Masonic position, but when called upon to join the Conservative ranks, he sternly refused, and would not allow any priestly dictation upon political subjects. As to his fitness for the post there cannot be the slightest doubt, for he is a man of considerable ability, and has been Secretary of State for India. London club gossip has it that the Queen approves of the appointment, not because of its propriety, but as an amende honorable for not having honored another Catholic, the Duke of Norfolk, by presenting his Duchess with a shawl upon her marriage, as is generally her wont.

The appointment of Sir Charles Dilke to the under Secretaryship of the Foreign Office also deserves a few words. Dilke is the son of a man who owed everything he had to the late Prince Consort. When, therefore, the present Baronet was first elected a Member of Parliament, and began his career by pitching into the Queen and her civil list, there was a general uproar. Mr. Gladstone gravely rebuked him, while the Conservative members of the House hooted and jeered. His advanced Liberal opinions were almost unanimously denounced, and he was relegated to the society of the Bradlaughs and Odgers. Since then, however, Sir Charles has pursued a most diplomatic course, and although always fearlessly advancing his own ideas, he has done so with so much tact that he has not alarmed the prejudices of the English people. As Under Secretary, Sir Charles will be the representative of the Foreign Office in the House of Commons, for Lord Granville, the Foreign Secretary, is a member of the House of Peers.

In one of the clubs a gentleman lately offered to bet $50,000 to $2,500 that Dilke will be either Prime Minister or a leading statesman within five years, and he found no one willing to take the wager.

In the French Chamber of Deputies the Government came very near being defeated upon a clause in the Bill regulating public meetings. It was proposed by the Government that the police should be allowed to interfere in all meetings at which the chairman had allowed any remarks instigating to revolt, or armed demonstration, to be made. An amendment conferring this power upon the mayors, who have enjoyed it since 1790, would have been passed through a coalition of the right and the extreme left had not Gambetta, the President of the Chamber, suggested the recommittal of the clause. This saved the Ministry from defeat, but not without injuring the prestige of M. de Freycinet and necessitating the resignation of M. Lepère, the Minister of Justice.

M. Lemoinne, the famous writer in the Journal des Débats, who was lately appointed Minister at Brussels, has thrown up his high office without a word of public excuse. It is said that at the last moment he became afraid that the gay routine of balls and dinners that he would be obliged to undergo in order to keep up the traditions of the diplomatic service, would ill suit his habits as a journalist and man of letters. It is rumored that Léon Say, the present French representative at London, may possibly resign, and that Lemoinne will take his place.

The Ultramontane party in Germany is once more in arms. A great meeting was held at Dortmund, in Westphalia, and resolutions were passed urging the Catholic party in the Reichstag to bring in a Bill making the Government responsible for their acts and calling for the entire abrogation of the May laws. Delegates have been sent to Rome to consult upon the best course for future action, and the fight promises to be protracted and severe. Meantime, the presence of Prince Hohenlohe in the Foreign Office is beginning to make itself felt. His predecessor, Von Bülow, always supported the Emperor against Bismarck in Russian affairs. It was customary to "knuckle under" in all things to Russia, and as long as that country was conciliated nothing was too servile. But Hohenlohe is a Bavarian, does not hold the docile Prussian views regarding Russia, and some very stringent measures are to be adopted in regard to Russian steamers in German waters. Hitherto the reciprocity on the frontier rivers was all on one side, the side of Russia, but now there is a better tone at the German Foreign Office.

The result of the elections in Italy is not yet fully known, but there has been a formidable reaction against the Cairoli ministry. The enormous majority that the ministry had in the last Parliament has dwindled down almost to nothing, and it is more than doubtful whether it can continue in power.

The health of the Pope is reported as not very good, and it is not surprising that this should be so after the extraordinary entertainment given in his honor some time ago by the Propaganda presided over by Cardinal Simeon. The programme consisted of a series of recitations in forty-nine European, Asiatic, and African languages, in each of which His Holiness was lauded. A native of Nova Scotia celebrated in Celtic verse the Restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy in Scotland; Mr. Martin Kehoe, of the United States, recited a poem entitled, "Leo and Newman," in English; Mr. Fox, of Creggan, sang the "Restoration of St. John Lateran," in Irish, and Mr. William O'Reilly recited a poem in Italian, the subject of which was the Propaganda at the feet of the Pontiff. After this performance it is not to be wondered at that His Holiness should feel unwell and wish for change of air.

The varnishing-day at the Paris Salon will be long remembered by those who were fortunate enough to be present. All the fashion, the talent and the notoriety of Paris were there, for certain of the queens of Parisian society have this year resolved to patronize art. As a display of pictures, this year's Salon is a success in quantity, but sadly deficient in quality. Neither Gerôme nor Meissonnier is represented; the much talked-of "Phædra" of Cabanel is said to be utterly beneath him. Bouguereau's two paintings are incomprehensively bad, and the "Joan of Arc listening to the voices of the Angels," of which so much was expected, is a sad disappointment. But the interest on varnishing day was in the people and not in the pictures. Sarah Bernhardt was the cynosure of all eyes, and as she wandered from room to room, accompanied by a tall youth of some fifteen Summers, she was followed by a crowd of three or four hundred admirers. Her famous part of the Queen Marie de Neubourg in "Ruy Blas" has been taken with great success by Mlle. Bartel, and many of the Parisian critics prefer her performance to that of the divine Sarah. The latter is engaged to play in London, where a German company is also to appear during the Summer vacation. This company is called the Grand Ducal Company of Saxe-Meimengen, and it is said that a large part of the Grand Duke's income is derived from starring this company through the various cities of the Continent.

THE exports of domestic breadstuffs from thirteen American ports during the month of April last amounted to $21,679,115 against $14,168,630 for the same month last year. The exports from New York alone amounted to $11,122,131. For the ten months ending with April, the exports from the same ports were $207,306,615, being $58,221,349 in excess of the corresponding period in 1879.

THE delay of Congress in the matter of the Bill ratifying the agreement with the Ute Indians may have unpleasant results. While Congress hesitates, thousands of settlers are preparing to invade the agricultural portions of the Indian lands, and the Indians having become suspicious of the good faith of the Government, a collision will almost certainly follow any serious attempt to occupy the reservation prior to the formal ratification of the agreement under which the owners were to be paid for the land surrendered.

SENATOR BUTLER of South Carolina made a very effective speech last week in support of Senator Kellogg's right to retain his seat. He was especially severe in his comments on the course of Mr. Hill, whose right "to sit in judgment on others" he indignantly denied. Mr. Hill's "intellectual atmosphere," he said, "does not occupy a plane so far above that of ordinary individuals as to give him the right to denounce them as being influenced by unworthy motives." It may be regarded as settled that Mr. Kellogg will retain his seat.

FOUR harbor thieves who made an assault on the crew of a vessel in Flushing Bay, and were captured on Monday of last week, were indicted, arraigned and sentenced to ten years imprisonment before sunset of the day after the crime. Such prompt punishment is rare, but it shows what can be done by our courts in the way of the speedy administration of justice when there is an honest disposition to avoid delay. But suppose these criminals had been able to command counsel with "political influence," would they have thus promptly got their deserts?

THE Commercial Bulletin groups the statistics of recent fires, showing that the destruction of property has been much greater than is generally supposed. During the first three months of the year, the losses by fire in this country and Canada amounted to $17,586,900. From the first of April down to the present time, the figures show the annihilation of over $13,000,000 worth of property, of which over $1,000,000 was consumed by the forest fires in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Thus the total losses from January first to date amount to nearly, if not quite, $31,000,000. It is to be hoped that the experiences of the year may induce greater caution in our towns and cities as to the character of their structures, and the provision of water supply and necessary facilities for suppressing fires.

IT will strike fair-minded people as somewhat extraordinary that while Congress does not hesitate to appropriate over eight millions of dollars on river and harbor jobs, it cannot find time to provide for the payment of the money due to United States Marshals, or to start the machinery of the Federal courts, now stopped for want of funds, and at the same time acts reluctantly for the relief of the needy pensioners of the United States, to whom the Government is in debt, and many of whom are suffering for the necessities of life. One paper says that dangerous criminals are out on small bail because Congress has failed to supply the means necessary to bring them to trial, and it is not at all improbable that some offenders against the laws will altogether escape the punishment they deserve, unless the majority in Congress shall speedily make up their minds that they cannot afford to trifle any longer with important public interests.

THE annual steal, otherwise known as the River and Harbor Appropriation Bill, was put through the House of Representatives last week by an overwhelming vote. The committee which framed the Bill seem to have first taken good care of their own individual districts, and then added such further appropriations as were necessary to secure sufficient votes to pass the measure, and on that basis its defeat was of course out of the question. The Bill appropriates $8,523,000, and this sum is distributed not with reference to the demands of the internal commerce of the United States, but with a view of silencing the opposition of influential members. The largest appropriations are made for the rivers and harbors of Texas, New Jersey, West Virginia, Kentucky, Maryland and Virginia, all of which States are represented on the Committee of Commerce; while the Mississippi River, the great artery of internal communication, is comparatively neglected. The Tribune tells the whole story when it says on this matter: "As long as it is possible to purchase the votes of the members of Congress by dividing the public money among their districts, for the nominal purpose of digging out creeks on which it is now impossible to float a flat-boat, just so long Bills of this kind will be passed." The fact is by no means creditable to the average Representative, but then the average Representative is never too careful of his reputation.

THERE are some signs of awakening enterprise in Mexico. A steamer which sailed from this port last week carried out to Vera Cruz 400 tons of rails and tools for 2,000 workmen, which, with ten flat cars and a locomotive which will go by the next steamer, are for the Mexican Central Railroad Company, limited, which is about to build a railroad from the Mexican capital to the American frontier. It is intended to build the first section of this line—from Mexico to Leon—in eighteen months. The distance is 262 miles. Another road has been commenced at Guaymas, and will be built to Hermosillo—86 miles—by next February. Both these enterprises are backed by American capital, and they will have an important bearing on the development of the resources of the country.

THE publication of Secretary Evarts's correspondence in regard to the injuries inflicted upon American fishermen at Fortune Bay has been followed by the introduction of a Bill in the House of Representatives which proposes to abrogate that clause of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington which remits to British fishermen the duties on fish and fish oil brought by them into the United States, and provides that duties upon fish and fish oil so imported shall hereafter be collected. The Bill further provides that out of the duties so collected $125,000 shall be retained for the payment of claims of American fishermen for losses at Fortune Bay. Some of the Canadian papers strongly condemn the attitude of our Government on this question, but the London Times says that the situation is altogether unsatisfactory, and adds that "the agreement suggested by Secretary Evarts that the contracting parties should, by some joint action, adopt regulations protecting the fisheries, would, at any rate, prevent further disputes. Nor need there be," it thinks, "any insuperable obstacle to an amicable adjustment of the present dispute."

WE do not wonder that British critics, almost without exception, "make all sorts of fun" of Mr. Tennyson's last poetical effort, "De Profundis." The poem is unmitigated bosh and nonsense throughout; there isn't so much as a glimmer of real poetic thought, or even a suggestion of genuine rhythm, in any one of its sixty-five lines. If any unknown versifier had offered such trash as this to the Nineteenth Century, or any other reputable magazine, it would have been declined with derision and contempt; but being Mr. Tennyson's it was worth a guinea a line at least. What shall be thought of the intellectual condition of a poet laureate who felicitates a new-born child in this:

"That thou art thou—who wailest being born
And banish'd into mystery, and the pain
Of this divisible-indivisible world
Among the numerable-innumerable
Sun, sun, and sun, thro' finite-infinite space
In finite-infinite time——"

And then concludes with this amazing chaos of meaningless words:

"HALLOWED be Thy name—Hallelujah!—
Infinite Ideality!
Immeasurable Reality!
Infinite Personality!
Hallowed be Thy name—Hallelujah!
We feel we are nothing—for all is Thou and in Thee:
We feel we are something—that also has come from Thee:
We are nothing, O Thou—but Thou wilt help us to be,
Hallowed be Thy name—Hallelujah!"

THE expedition of General Garcia, of which we recently gave some account in our news columns, is reported to have landed safely in Cuba, where a Provisional Government has already been set up. The expedition consisted of seventy-four men and eight officers of high rank, who carried with them 1,000 rifles, a large supply of ammunition, and a quantity of stores. General Garcia, after a conference with all the insurgent chiefs, issued a proclamation to the Cuban people, urging them to renew the struggle for independence, and subsequently published an address also to the Cuban army. In the first of these proclamations, General Garcia says:

"It is not hate which guides me to war, although hate would be justifiable on our side. The wish for peace leads us to war; the needs of securing our property in the future compels us to destroy the same at present—to deprive Spain of this revenue, which would enable her to carry on the war for some time to come. We combat for the freedom of the white and the negro. Spain steals from you the earnings that provided your children bread, and those are spent not for plows to cultivate your land, but for muskets to slaughter your own offspring. The warriors of to-day shall not cease this war until the Cuban flag of revolution shall float over the Spanish fortresses. But they will tear the revolutionary flag to pieces before the sacred altar of the law when we shall have redressed our wrongs. The country is helping us. Thousands of men are swelling our ranks, and the gates of the cities shall be open to our armies because the people hate the Spanish tyranny. If they are not, we propose to wade through them in blood."

Many of the Cubans in New York entertain high expectations as to the result of the new revolutionary project; others regard it as untimely and as almost certain to fail, retarding rather than promoting the final deliverance of Cuba from the Spanish yoke. The result will in all probability justify this latter apprehension of the cooler and more prudent observers.

IN A STUDIO.

"I AM mad to speak of love to you," he said, with a sad, womanish smile on his handsome mouth; "no one knows that better than I do, and yet sometimes I have fancied that I saw a look in your eyes that has made me forget everything. Oh, Francia, it is true that I am a penniless painter, a man with nothing but aspirations; but——"

"But people cannot live on aspirations," answered the young girl, in a clear, composed voice, singularly cold and calm.

She stood in the soft Spring sunshine, the embodiment of the day, as it were, lovely, full of promise and budding beauty, a little chilly out of the sunshine of her favor, with a warmth that was not to be trusted, as it was liable to cloud over and die away into a stormy coldness at any time. She was young, slender, yet softly rounded as to form, with a proud head, crowned by soft masses of blonde hair, very low on the brow, very light and fluffy and curling in sunshiny tendrils about her face. The eyes were bluish-gray, like a cold morning sky, but the face was full enough of warmth and rose-tints. She wore a dress of some soft clinging material, a dark blue in color, that pleased Herbert Wayne's artistic fancy well. She had indeed a natural artistic taste in dress that had first touched him, and he had painted eagerly and by stealth a picture of her in that very costume, over which he was wont to gloat in the hours, the long hours, when he could not see her.

"I know it," he said, simply, but with a sort of heartbreak in his voice.

"You said," the young girl went on, "that you had sometimes fancied you saw a look in my eyes that made you forget everything. What did you mean?"

The young man hesitated. "As if—mind I say I fancied—as if you cared for me——"

"It was fancy," Francia said, looking down. "I do care for you, but not in the way you want—I care for other things more."

"You are frank," said the other, in a pained voice.

"It is best. I would not mislead you."

The man's face—a handsome face, tender but not strong—with dark, passionate eyes, changed and quivered with intense emotion. He would not charge this girl with leading him on; he had too much nobility to recall her wiles, "her sweet eyes, her low replies," or the hundred subtle nothings that had forged his chains. It was not in his nature to say a harsh word to her now, when he stood there madly longing to touch one of the slender girlish hands, feeling that he could give his life for one moment's happiness—if she loved him. Yet he had never really hoped. He knew what things Francia cared for more than any man's love—pretty toilets, flashing jewels, praise and flattery, and a whirl of excitement—and yet it was true that the vain little heart had been more fluttered by his love than ever before. It was an uncomfortable sensation, and Francia hastened to get rid of it, as she always did with unpleasant things; and the knowledge that he might have really read the heart tumult in her eyes made her more cold and decisive.

"Well, my dream is over," he said, with a sudden effort. "Spring, you know, is a time when, as Tennyson says:

> 'A young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.'

So, let the season excuse me. Everything looks so promising. I thought the year might have something for me, but it's all over now. I will get used to it, I suppose, and learn content. Good-by, Miss Francia."

"Are you going?" she said, looking into his changed face with an uncomfortable twinge.

"Yes; I must go and work," he said, in an absent way, his glowing eyes fixed upon the young girl's face with a devouring glance, as if taking farewell of it.

She held out her hand with an impulse of kindness. He seized it, half-raised it to his lips, then dropped it. He could not trust himself, but turned swiftly and went away along the road under the fresh green branches that made a verdant arch over it. Francia stood watching him with absent eyes.

"If he were rich," she said, with a little sigh; and then she began to dream of a lover who could give her all she longed for—a man who had lately singled her out for marked attention. Her fancy rioted in a succession of Worth's toilets, billows of gleaming satin with foam of lace, ropes of pearls and the glitter of diamonds and the red span of rubies, turned before her vision like the confused figures of a kaleidoscope; and yet, after all, she found herself walking somewhat slowly and sadly home, seeing only a quivering face, pale as ashes, a pair of dark, eloquent eyes full of passionate pain, and her heart seemed to be stirred with a dull pain that would not be stilled.

"I believe I love the man," she said, with a petulant laugh.

The sunshine struck athwart the trees and kindled the vivid greens of some, the dark-red buds of others, into new brightness, the next afternoon, as two people strayed in a lingering and lover-like way beneath them. Francia paused suddenly, with the prick of memory at her heart, and said:

"Let us go home; I am tired."

The gentleman laughed.

"You are frank, at least. Suppose we go into Wayne's studio. He has wanted me to look at his pictures. I think it would encourage him to buy one, poor fellow! I am afraid he has a hard time of it. Will you go with me? I should like to have your taste in selecting."

Francia hesitated a moment. If she could be of any use materially to this man whose hopes she had slain, why not do it? She had some kindly feeling, and she knew the sale might depend on a word from her. Perhaps the artist might kindle to new enthusiasm over his work, if success smiled on him, and so lose that other maddening dream that had blighted his life.

"Yes; let us go," she answered.

So they mounted up the stairs without further words till they stood somewhat breathless at the top—the rooms were nearest the sky.

"Artists like to get above the small affairs of our lower life," said Mr. Thorne, somewhat pompously—"near the stars and comets, I suppose."

There was no answer to their knock, but Chester Thorne pushed open the door and went in. Palette and brushes were thrown about in that disorder that seems somehow fitting to a man of dreams. The place seemed filled and permeated with the immediate presence of the owner, so that Francia looked about for him, and rather expected to see him emerge from a dim alcove before which hung a faded bit of rare Gobelin tapestry. There seemed some sort of figure there; but, then, the room was full of phantoms. A woman's form here, with classic Greek drapery; a wooden model there, with an ancient toga about it; plaster hands, a foot, a face, old armor, a Malay creese, a carven chair, a faded shawl.

Francia looked about curiously enough, and then started back with a cry. She was looking at—herself!

The artist had not expected such a visitor, or he would have turned that picture to the wall. It was Francia in the dim-blue dress, but he had painted her as Juliet in the balcony. About her round, young neck were three strings of pearls. The blue silk was cut square in the neck, and some sort of white under-robe came up to the throat, and was puffed with blue bands across the rounded, plump young arms, which were covered to the wrist with tightly-fitting blue sleeves. Through the masses of blonde hair a blue ribbon was carelessly drawn. She leaned her elbows on the gray stone of the balcony and rested her cheek against her two slender clasped hands. Her face was pale, and there was an inexpressible sadness about the small mouth, and unshed tears in the eyes, over which the lids drooped heavily. You could see she thought of her absent lover. Life at that moment looked hard and drear to her. A word would make those lips tremble and the tears fall.

"How like you, and yet how different!" exclaimed Thorne, in a matter-of-fact way. "How did he ever see that expression in your face? How could he paint such a heartbreak there!"

"I don't know. I do not see how he painted me at all, as I never sat to him," Francia said, staring at the picture in an uncomfortable way. It was so like that it seemed to her as if some time that look must come to her, as if she would verify it by having some heartbreak to complete the likeness. Francia shivered a little with apprehension and turned away.

"I will buy that picture," Thorne was saying in the assured way in which millionaires are wont to speak. "Here is something he spoke to me about the other day," continued Thorne, "and I said I would come and look at it. Do you know I have found a change in him lately. There was something curious, vague, and drear in his eyes. I wonder if he was not in want? I know there came a very eager look in his eyes when I spoke as if I might possibly buy his picture. Poor fellow! I don't know much about these things, but it strikes me there are elements of greatness in it."

The picture was a large one of Prometheus. Bare, cold rocks uplifted high and above a heaven full of thunderous glooms. A desolate sky above a desolate sea, as if both were in league with fate, and in this atmosphere of doom lay that awful figure chained to the barren rocks—that face of untold agony, yet contemptuous, scornful, bold—those awful eyes turned to the unrelenting heaven, those wordless lips eloquent with despair.

"I will take it," said Mr. Thorne, after a pause. "It is not to say cheerful, but I feel that it is great. Yes; I will take this struggling young fellow by the hand. I will foster his genius; he shall go to Rome for a couple of years, if he likes. He can repay me with his painting. When I get a home of my own I shall need a good many."

"It would be a noble work to help him," said Francia, with a pretty blush, which made her companion look at her instead of at any other picture.

"He does not come," he said; "he does not know what good fortune awaits him. Let us sit down; you are looking tired. Why may I not say here some words that I have been longing to say for a week or two?"

Francia flushed still more, but did not object.

"These shadowy people will not interrupt us," said Thorne, with a comprehensive gesture towards the pictures. "When I think of a future home, I think of you, Francia. You would grace any home, however stately. Will you share mine?"

It was an odd sort of love-making, the girl thought, and yet she had dwelt so much on material things, why should they not be offered, instead of hearts and undying love and sighs and vows?

Chester Thorne came nearer, and took her hand.

"You would make me very happy if you could care for me in that way," he went on, some eagerness coming into his tone. "I have money, as you know, but that is not everything. I want you. I cannot be happy without you."

Well, that was something, Francia thought, with a stir of gratified vanity at her heart. She wished Mr. Thorne had chosen some other place, for it still seemed as if the artist's presence was there. The room must be full of his aspirations, as he had called them, his dreams, his soul.

Perhaps that prevented the answer that rose to her ready lips; or was it the sudden gleam of the afternoon sun that seemed to push through the dim curtains and irradiate the room. It fell on the old china, the armor and the lace on the stiff wooden model; on the faded Gobelin tapestry of the alcove; on the strange effigy within, hanging from a beam. Ah! the light sought that out with terrible power. The smile froze on Francia's lip! A horror sprang into her eyes! Her face paled as she pointed with a trembling hand to the strange spectre!

"He has hung himself!" she moaned, with stiffening lips.

Thorne sprang forward, gave one glance of horror, and then took her hand.

"Come," he said, "it is no place for you."

She shivered. She did not look back.

"He is dead," she muttered; "and I loved him!"

POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

HON. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, OF VERMONT.

HON. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, United States Senator from Vermont, was born in Richmond, Vt., February 1st, 1828. After receiving a public school education, he studied law and was admitted to practice. When twenty-six years of age, he was elected a member of the Legislature, and was returned four times, acting as Speaker three years during this service. In 1851 he was elected to the State Senate, and was its President a portion of the term. Upon the death of Hon. Solomon Foot, Mr. Edmunds was appointed his successor, taking the seat in April, 1866, and his first public remarks were made on the occasion of the delivery of the eulogies on that venerated and popular man. He began immediately to take part in the discussions of the Senate, in which Sumner, Fessenden, Trumbull and Wade were then the Republican leaders. Chandler, Sherman, Sprague, Wilson, Grimes, Dixon, Pomeroy, Ramsay and Doolittle were chairmen of committees. Beverly Johnson, Hendricks, Buckalew and Saulsbury were the leading Democrats in the chamber. At the time when Mr. Edmunds took the oath of office the principal measure before the Senate was the Bill for the protection of United States officers in the South. It was a Bill designed to save from prosecution under the State laws men who had committed acts, while under military authority, which might be actionable under civil laws. It aimed to extend the mantle of the Federal authority and protection over all the military agents of the Government in the rebellious States. Mr. Edmunds thought that the provisions of the Bill should extend only to those States in which the habeas corpus had been suspended, and he moved an amendment to that effect, which he defended with ability against the vigorous opposition of the framers of the Bill. He voted alone with the Democrats for his amendment. Sumner, Trumbull and all the others went solidly against him. But in the light of the political history of fifteen years Mr. Edmunds can safely appeal to this record as more creditable than that of his then more distinguished compeers.

When the Republicans in Congress came into collision with President Johnson, Mr. Edmunds was charged with the care of the Tenure-of-Office Act, which he reported to the Senate and advocated till it was passed. Mr. Edmunds was now a member of the Judiciary Committee, of which he has always since continued to be a member, and for several years was the chairman before the Democrats obtained the majority. As a member of this committee he has had a leading part in shaping all the more important legislation of Congress for the past thirteen years. With the reconstruction legislation no man had more to do. The records of Congress show his careful attention to, and earnest discussion of, every detail of the great measures of the Republican Party which were designed to garner up and preserve "the fruits of the war."

In the long contest over the State Government of Louisiana, Mr. Edmunds was always an earnest advocate of his party's claims and a supporter of the Administration, but he never went as far as Morton and other extremists, and when Morton undertook to seat the pretender Pinchback, it was Mr. Edmunds who put his foot down and blocked the audacious scheme. On the financial question no man now in Congress has a more admirable record than Mr. Edmunds. From the beginning of his term of service he was a vigorous advocate of measures for the return to specie payment. He believed that this object could not be obtained without the adoption of a definite policy for years before it was adopted. When the reaction from the inflation movement occurred, after the panic of 1873 and the veto by Grant of the "four hundred million Bill," it was largely Edmunds who forced the Republican Senators in caucus to agree upon the Resumption Act. More recently his great achievement in originating the Electoral Commission Act, through which Mr. Hayes was peacefully seated in the White House, has won for him no little party prestige, and it is a curious testimony to his courage and ability that while no other man had so much to do with the great settlement of 1876, no other man on the Republican side, who had any share in it at all, has been so little abused by his political opponents. On the 13th of December, 1878, Senator Edmunds's Bill to amend sundry provisions of the law relating to Presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, was passed in the Senate by a vote of 35 to 26. That Bill having failed in the House, Mr. Edmunds, in March last, introduced another in the Senate embodying "the simple proposition of providing that the meeting of the electors shall be on the second Monday of January, instead of the second Wednesday in December. He also modified it so as to give time for such States as have any existing laws adequate to the purpose to determine for themselves and according to the Constitution, which they have the sole right to do, who their electors are. This Bill, therefore, makes the simple provision for a State disposition of any controversy under such laws as it may have in existence prior to date of choosing electors. It provides for a later meeting of electors in order that each State may dispose of any controversy that may arise, and then provides, as the Bill of the last session did, for the meeting of the two Houses and proceeding in conformity with the decisions reached in the respective States in any case of dispute. The Bill was referred to the select committee on the subject, but as yet has not been finally acted upon.

One of the greatest public services ever rendered by Mr. Edmunds was the Pacific Railroad Funding Act, originated and carried through the Senate by himself and Mr. Thurman against the opposition of jobbers in and out of that body. By this Act millions of dollars have been saved to the Government, and the relations of the Pacific railroads to the Government definitely established. As a Senator, Mr. Edmunds is noted for his strict adherence to all the rules of the Senate. He is almost a stickler for the observance of the strictest etiquette. He is a ready and brilliant debater, seldom failing to get the better of an opponent, and is equally ready to knock him down with a quotation from a weighty authority, thrust him through with the lance of his sarcasm, or cross swords with him in fair discussion. His hair is white, and what little skin his thick beard and mustache reveals is of a parchment color. He wears spectacles, and stoops a good deal. But his eyes are young and full of fire.

As representing the best element of his party, Mr. Edmunds would undoubtedly prove a strong candidate before the people, should he be nominated for the Presidential office. There is absolutely not a single point in his whole career against which successful assault could be directed. Pure, upright, the inveterate foe of all forms of dishonesty and jobbery, and possessing a courage and independence of opinion amounting almost to audacity, he would, as President, give the country an Administration at once robust and manly; and while he might, of course, commit mistakes, they would be mistakes proceeding from honest convictions, and, therefore, capable of defense. More than all, the Administration of such a man would never be open to the suspicion of being "run" by other than its legitimate head; and there are not a few who would like to welcome such an era in our politics—an era marked by a rule absolutely pure, unselfish, and wholly independent of control by unworthy partisan influences.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

THE CITY OF LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE, or the "Falls City," situated at the Falls of the Ohio, and distant from New York by railroad averages about 1,000 miles, is one of the four great cities of the West which chiefly control the collection and distribution of the produce of the soil and the mine, and the counter-movement of merchandise from the East and from foreign countries. Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati and Louisville, each the centre of an extended area of production and consumption, control in the aggregate the commerce of the West. According to the census of 1870, the population of Louisville was, in round numbers, 100,000, and the local estimates of the present population range from 160,000 to 175,000. The larger of these estimates, based on a popular method of computation on premises furnished by the city directory, may not be too liberal, as the ratio of growth in previous decades is a fact in its favor. However, this is a question which will soon be put at rest by the enumeration of the census taken.

THE RATIO OF GROWTH.

The "Falls City" has not claimed heretofore any special distinction as a peculiarly progressive city; but a comparison of its ratio of growth with that of the other old cities of the United States reveals a very remarkable fact. Taking the census of 1840 as a starting-point, and comparing with 1870, we find that in ratio of increase Louisville has surpassed every city in the entire catalogue, with the solitary exception of Brooklyn. It is to be remarked, in respect to Brooklyn, too, that a large proportion of its population might be designated as nocturnal—New York business men who lodge in Brooklyn—and who, in consequence of cheaper rents and lower taxes, select Brooklyn as their legal domicile. What special offset is to be charged to this peculiar circumstance it is not necessary to the purposes of this article to investigate. But a fact of such interest is worthy of proof, and, for the purpose of stating the matter clearly, a table is subjoined, showing the population of every city of the United States which in 1840 boasted of 21,000 inhabitants or more, in contrast with their respective populations in 1870:

Cities.	Pop. in 1840.	Pop. in 1870.	Per Cent. of Increase.
Louisville.....	21,210	100,753	375
Cincinnati.....	46,338	216,239	366
New Orleans.....102,193		191,418	86
New York.....312,710		942,292	201
Pittsburgh	21,115	86,076	307
Philadelphia....258,037		674,022	161
Boston.....	93,383	250,526	168
Brooklyn	36,233	396,099	1,010
Albany	33,721	75,216	123
Providence.....	23,171	68,904	198
Baltimore 102,313		267,354	161
Washington	23,364	109,199	368

In 1840 several of the big cities of the West, such as Chicago, St. Louis and San Francisco, were insignificant, but the contrasts of all the older cities shows that Louisville may claim a very exceptional distinction—a multiple of growth which, if it be sustained, will ultimately change her place in the list of great cities. This development seems to have occurred without the aid of forcing measures of any kind, and without such special exertions applied to the movements of immigration or other like factors of development as would accord either with Western ideas of enterprise, or even with a prudent regard to protection from the aggressive policy of her rivals.

COMMERCIAL PROGRESS.

There are numerous evidences that a more ambitious and progressive spirit is pervading the community. Within the last twelve months the solid men of Louisville have succeeded for the first time, after many attempts and failures, in establishing on a secure basis a Board of Trade. The present organization has given pledges of its faith and determination by purchasing a fine building, which in 1873 cost $217,000. The 301 firm memberships, representing about 300 members, are all interested in the stock, and the property is paid for in full. In the same period a cotton compress, with a capacity of 300 bales per day, has been established here, with the view of controlling a large proportion of the 300,000 bales of cotton which annually pass through this port. Attached to the compress is a warehouse of commensurate proportions. A grain elevator was erected here a year or two ago, and subscriptions are now being taken to the stock of an additional elevator of greater capacity. There are also numerous private enterprises, some of considerable magnitude, which testify to the presence among the population of a spirit which promises well for the future.

RAILROAD EXTENSIONS.

Simultaneously with these developments the railroad situation at Louisville has been simply revolutionized. A year ago the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, whose home office is located here—the president and a majority of the directors residing here—was a line of about 700 miles. The Louisville and Great Southern system of to-day either owns or controls over 4,000 miles of railway. This system extended a year ago to Montgomery, Memphis and Nashville, as its southern termini. It controls to-day every route to every part of the southeastern seaboard except Charleston; every route to Mobile and Pensacola on the Gulf, and every Ohio-Mississippi route to New Orleans, except one. It also owns the only Ohio-Mississippi routes from St. Louis to the south and southeast. Within the last twelve months Louisville capitalists have also purchased the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago railroad. An unfinished railroad, the St. Louis Air Line, has been reorganized and put under construction between Louisville and St. Louis in the same time. Within the year the Chesapeake and Ohio has commenced active operations to connect the Louisville Short Line with that route to the harbors of Virginia. A few weeks ago a company of Boston capitalists obtained charters for a railroad to connect Louisville with Richmond and Norfolk on a line further to the southward, passing through Emory Gap in the Cumberland mountains. Altogether there is no doubt that Louisville has been the centre of a greater railroad development in the last twelve months, or since the commercial revival manifested itself, than any other city in the United States. It is for the future to determine how far the sequel of these movements will justify the preamble; but if, as there seems to be ample reason to conclude, the commercial spirit of the city should prove equal to its enlarged opportunities, the results are not doubtful.

SOCIAL STATISTICS.

On May 1st, 1880, Louisville entered upon the second century of its legal or chartered existence—the charter being granted on May 1st, 1780, by the Virginia Legislature. At that time Kentucky was a part of a Virginian county. At the first census the population was 1,357; in 1820, 4,012; in 1830, 10,352; in 1840, 21,210; in 1850, 43,194; in 1860, 68,033, and in 1870, 100,753. There are 25,000 houses in the city limits to-day, and a hundred years ago, according to contemporary history, there were 63 finished houses, 37 in process of erection, and about 100 cabins.

The early settlers were all Virginians, and the descendants of Virginians are a very large and influential element of the present population. The later additions to the population are from all sections of the Union, especially from the Eastern States and from foreign countries. The German population is very strong numerically and financially, as a proof of which it may be noticed that German influence is powerful enough to retain their language as a branch of the regular curriculum of the public schools, despite the protests of the remainder of the population. The Jewish race is well represented in numbers and respectability, many of whom have attained distinction in trade, banking, and the learned professions.

In the last century the location of Louisville was considered very unhealthy. There were also occasional outbreaks of an exceedingly fatal fever. Of the period covered by authentic and intelligent history, the records are highly favorable in sanitary averages; but it is very probable that great improvement has been made in sanitation by means of drainage and otherwise. If the accepted estimate of the present population be true, the ratio of mortality is as favorable as in any city of the United States without any exception; and if that estimate be reduced by 25,000, the ratio would still be better than the average of American cities. Louisville has never been visited by any epidemic disease except cholera and small-pox—diseases to which all climates, latitudes and elevations are subject.

There are 119 churches in the city, exclusive of 12 Catholic convents and societies with foundations. The Catholic element is large and influential, but is greatly surpassed in weight and numbers by the Protestant population. There are thirty public and private hospitals and benevolent institutions, several of which are very extensive establishments. Journalism of all types and grades is represented in Louisville by about thirty newspapers. The dailies are the Courier-Journal (Democratic); the Commercial (Republican); the Ancsager (Democratic); the Volksblatt (Republican), and the Evening Post (Democratic). There are nineteen incorporated banks, State and national, with an aggregate capital of eight and a half million dollars. The transactions of the banks of the Clearing House Association footed up in 1879 $215,706,075, an increase of $39,266,148, or about twenty per cent. as compared with the exchanges of 1878. The largest bank has a capital of $1,645,100, and the capital of five others ranges from $500,000 to $800,000.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY.

The more important branches of trade are, in order of precedence, the following: Leaf-tobacco, whisky, dry-goods, hog products, live stock, agricultural implements, groceries, manufactured tobacco, grain and flour, leather, iron and hardware, furniture, malting and brewing, drugs, oils and chemicals, cotton, boots and shoes, clothing, lumber, wool, hides, skins and poltry, etc.

There is only one important trade in which Louisville takes precedence over all other cities, either of America or Europe. The quantity of leaf-tobacco sold there annually is greater than in New York, Baltimore, Richmond, Cincinnati, or any other market. The sales after good crop years run from 60,000 to 70,000 hogsheads per annum, and the hogshead is also a heavier average in weight than in any other important market. New York receives a larger quantity of tobacco in most years, but a considerable percentage of this is merchandise in transit at Louisville, and is not sold here, a considerable percentage having been bought in Louisville and shipped to foreign destinations on through bills of lading. Usually the purchases for foreign consumption do not vary far from sixty per cent. of the whole amount handled, but all the large American manufacturers are represented by resident agents or brokers. The method of sale is by public auctions, which are held every day. Each of the thirteen warehouses is visited in turn by the inspectors of the Board of Trade, every package to be offered is uncovered and sampled, and the cups of buyers proceed in stated order of rotation from one warehouse to another, until all the day's offerings have been cried off by the auctioneer. The bidding is always upon guaranteed samples, as well as upon exposed packages. Our artist has taken a very life-like sketch of one of such daily auctions, the scene being laid in a Louisville warehouse. The daily sales very rarely fall as low as 150 hogsheads, and sometimes exceed 500.

The tobacco-manufacturing industry is not so large an interest as the superior conditions of supply and distribution should have created, but in the last decade the progress of growth has been rapid. The value of the annual product is now 400 per cent. greater than in 1870. The capacity of one establishment exceeds 5,000 pounds per day, and another is being extended to equal proportions.

Of Bourbon whisky, otherwise known as fine Kentucky whisky, Louisville claims to be headquarters. The largest distilling interest in the State is owned by Louisville houses, and the major part of the whole Kentucky product is handled here. The whisky of Kentucky sells, tax paid, at $1.75-6 per gallon, while the staple whisky of most other Western centres, technically known as high wines, sells at $1.16 to $1.08. These two classes of "goods" are adapted to different classes of trade and use, and the differences in value are due to varying conditions of cost which it is unnecessary to explain.

The internal revenue receipts in the district in 1879, derived chiefly from tobacco, whisky and beer, amounted to $3,300,411, against $1,300,174 in 1870.

There are numerous industrial interests which present evidences of marked prosperity, among which may be mentioned prominently the manufacture of agricultural implements, leather, plate glass, furniture, iron ware, woolen cloths, etc. Louisville boasts the largest plow factory in the United States.

It is to be observed, on the other hand, that the expansion and development of both industrial and commercial activity have not been forwarded and encouraged by the money class in Louisville in as liberal a spirit as would have been dictated by a wise forecasting enterprise. Real-estate owners and capitalists have been prone to "let things rack along," the one class relying upon the ventures and labors of others to make increasing values for their lands and improvements, the other awaiting the recurrence of dividend and interest days to take their tolls upon the grist of commercial risk and industrial toil. Against both these classes lies "a true bill," in that they have failed to take measures specifically directed to extending the activities upon which their incomes directly depend, a class of effort especially addressed to immigration, skilled labor, foreign industrial enterprise, etc.

PRIVATE RESIDENCES.

A very notable feature of the Falls City is the elegance of the private residences of her more substantial citizens, and the beauty of the principal streets occupied by residences. Broadway and Fourth and Chestnut Streets are the most fashionable thoroughfares, though a very promising competition is appearing on several streets in the newer precincts of the city. Gray Street is a short but charming avenue, shut off from the invasions of trade and travel, lined by handsome residences, and in the Summer season under the almost unbroken shade of overarching trees. The floral display in private lawns on Fourth Street are of remarkable beauty; and this brings up a frequent explanation or excuse for a very singular hiatus in the city's harmonies—there is no public park. The apology is that wayfarers, as well as the owners of the pretty private grounds abounding on the fashionable streets, are so surrounded by arboral and floral wealth that a public park is scarcely needed.

Private dwellings have received a disproportioned share of the capital and taste applied to building and architectural ornamentation, and public buildings have been noticeably silusted.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The architectural achievements of Louisville in the way of public edifices are not above the average to be found in American cities of the third-class, and of works of eminent merit there are absolutely none. There is not a public structure in the city as imposing in appearance or as costly as the Courier-Journal building. The most ambitious municipal building is the City Hall, completed about seven years ago. This building has a frontage of 200 feet on Sixth Street, and 100 on Jefferson Street, connecting with the jail. The Sixth Street façade consists of a central portico with curtains extending to blocks or wings at each lateral street, one of which is surmounted by a clock-tower. The central portico presents two successive orders or architecture, the lower being the Roman Doric and the upper the Corinthian. The third story recedes, and is decorated with a full composite entablature. Opposite the City Hall is the Court House, in the centre of the public square. This is a very heavy, massive structure of gray stone, and is the best specimen of the Grecian Doric order in the city—exceedingly sober and dignified in its aspect, and sufficiently commodious. The City Hospital is a large and very creditable pile of stone and brick, with an occasional glimpse of Corinthian ambition, graceful enough in outline, ample in dimensions, and located in the centre of the prettiest open square in the city. There are received and treated here about 2,500 patients per annum. Uncle Sam is represented by the Custom House—a solemn, heavy building, constructed of Quincy granite in the severest mood of Grecian art, and as barren of ornament as a rough-hewn ashlar. The Custom House was erected to accommodate the needs and tastes of a community less than half as large as the Louisville of 1880, and measures are on foot looking to the erection of a building which will compare favorably with the operations and requirements of the times. There is very little doubt that these efforts will succeed, as the Custom House is entirely inadequate to the accommodation of the many departments of the public service which are confined within its walls. The Marine Hospital is an extensive and conveniently constructed pile, which presents no points of special interest.

Our special artist presents an excellent sketch of the city from a point of view looking to the south-west. Partly on account of the merits of the point of observation selected, the sketch will probably be recognized as one of the best ever taken. Many objects of interest will be readily recognized by those acquainted with the subject of the sketch. We also give sketches of the Board of Trade rooms, and will in a future number present views of the objects of interest.

POLITICAL NOTES.

THE Minnesota and New Jersey Democrats last week elected uninstructed delegations to the Cincinnati Convention.

THE Virginia Conservatives in State Convention last week, elected delegates to the Cincinnati Convention favorable to the nomination of Judge Field.

IN the California Democratic Convention a vote on Presidential preferences resulted: Thurman, 173; Tilden, 76; Seymour, 75. An unpledged delegation was elected.

THE Mississippi Greenbackers have selected delegates to the National Greenback Labor Convention, which meets at Chicago on June 9th. The delegates were authorized to select electors.

THE Pennsylvania State Prohibition Convention last week nominated George F. Turner for Auditor-General, and elected a list of delegates to the National Convention which meets in Cleveland, June 17th.

THE Minnesota delegates to the Republican National Convention are instructed to support Senator Windom for President, but seven of the ten delegates are for Blaine. Nebraska has elected a solid Blaine delegation. Dakota has chosen delegates favorable to Windom or Blaine.

SENATOR GORDON of Georgia has resigned his seat and ex-Governor Joseph E. Brown has been appointed to succeeded him. The more radical portion of the Democracy of Georgia strongly denounced Governor Brown's appointment on the ground that he does not truly represent the party sentiment.

THE ILLINOIS REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

THE Illinois Republican Convention, which is likely to be historic because of its important bearing upon the struggle for the Presidential nomination, was in session three days. On the second day the Committee on Credentials submitted three reports, one in favor of admitting a full Grant delegation from Cook County, one in favor of a full Blaine-Washburne delegation, and one in favor of a compromise delegation numbering thirty-six Grant and fifty-six anti-Grant delegates. The last one was adopted by a vote of 241 to 261. The convention finally passed a resolution declaring Grant to be the choice of the Republicans of Illinois by a vote of 386 to 307, and then referred the selection of the delegates to the National Convention to a committee, thus usurping the rights of the district caucuses, many of which had already chosen Blaine delegates. On the third day the committee reported a list of delegates, all of whom are pledged to Grant, and the convention thereupon passed a resolution directing the delegation to vote as a unit for him, eight of the disfranchised districts entering a formal protest against the whole proceeding. Governor Cullom was nominated for re-election, with George M. Hamilton for Lieutenant-Governor. The convention was marked throughout by great excitement, and while the result was in every way favorable to the Grant managers, the effect upon the party fortunes may prove otherwise than gratifying in the canvass for State officers.

SOME GOVERNMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

THE Sundry Civil Appropriation Bill, which was reported to the House May 21st, appropriates in the aggregate $20,729,987. The estimates aggregated $24,374,026.41. The Bill exceeds last year's by $1,256,963.49. Among the new items are: $130,169 to continue the work on the Washington monument; $150,000 for the Mississippi River Commission; $10,000 for the purchase of the Confederate Post Office records; $2,846,543 for public buildings. Still other items are: For taking the tenth census, $2,825,000; for public printing, $1,600,000; for the lighthouse establishment, $1,274,000, including $150,000 for lights and buoys on the Mississippi, Ohio and Missouri rivers; for the Signal Service, $375,000 are appropriated.

Lima, Peru.

A CORRESPONDENT traveling in Peru says that Lima now has about 150,000 inhabitants, and looks like a European city. It is lighted by gas, and it has water-works, street-cars, hacks and all the modern improvements. The stores, nearly all owned by foreigners, are many of them, magnificent. But the greatest financial depression now exists. The currency is sufficiently inflated to suit the most extravagant Greenbacker. Although a silver-producing country, there is no silver. The metallic currency is nickel, the largest piece being a real, one-tenth of a dollar, and it is about the size of our five-cent nickel coin. The medio, or half-real, one-twentieth of a dollar, is only one-third the size of their real. There are no silver dollars—no silver of any denomination. It has crawled away to hide. But they have plenty of paper money. The price of paper is exorbitantly high. Eggs are four reals—forty cents—apiece; beefsteak, eight reals—eighty cents—a pound; butter that comes over the mountains and is good, $1.50 a pound.

The New House of Commons.

The new English Parliament assembled on Thursday, April 29th, for organization. On the morrow the ceremony of taking the oath of allegiance to the Queen and signing the roll was begun by the Speaker. But first the right honorable gentleman was summoned by "Black Rod" to the House of Lords. There he was graciously assured by the Lord Chancellor that her Majesty had "most readily" approved and confirmed him as Speaker. Safe in the haven of his own Chair again, the Speaker duly informed honorable members that he had in the Upper House "laid claim to all your ancient rights and privileges—freedom of speech in debate, freedom of arrest for your persons and servants, freedom of access to her Majesty the Queen whenever occasion may require, and that the most favorable construction may be placed upon all your proceedings." Throughout the afternoon the example set by the Speaker was expeditiously followed, and a goodly number of Commoners took the usual simple oath of allegiance, standing round the two additional tables placed for their convenience as they read the words from the tables each held. One by one—the new members instructed by the Clerk—they thereafter pass down on the Ministerial side of the Treasury table, and subscribed their names in the book in the manner illustrated. On Thursday, May 20th, Parliament re-assembled. The Queen's Speech was read by Lord Selborne, Lord High Chancellor. The House of Commons was crowded, but the attendance in the House of Peers was meagre.

The United States Ship "Constellation."

The United States Relief Ship Constellation reached Queenstown, in Cork Harbor, on April 26th, and a few days afterwards His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, Rear Admiral R. N., commanding the reserve, officially received the American naval commander, Captain E. Potter, on board H. M. S. Lively, dispatch-vessel, and bade him welcome to Great Britain's shores, heartily thanking him and the United States Government and people for their signal act of kindness to a portion of the Queen's subjects. After the exchange of friendly civilities, his Royal Highness speedily arranged with Captain Potter the manner in which the stores brought by the Constellation were to be transhipped to the flotilla of gunboats which were to convey them to different parts along the west coast of Ireland. On the 24th the Duke with his staff returned the visit. He was received by Captain Potter and all the officers, also Colonel King Harman, Rev. Dr. Hepworth (the Commissioner of the New York Herald Relief Fund), Major Gaskill, and others. The utmost good feeling prevailed, but as the practical work was of the first importance, the visit was not prolonged. The Stars and Stripes, in honor of the United States, were displayed from the fore of all Her Majesty's ships of the Relief Squadron.

The Return of the "Vega" to Stockholm.

Nordenskjöld, on the 24th of April, completed his famous voyage, having on that day reached Stockholm in the Vega, Captain Palander, after sailing past the north of Europe and Asia, descending around the latter continent and passing through the Suez Canal, the Mediterranean, Atlantic and Baltic to Stockholm. Our illustration shows the grand reception that awaited him. The hills were all lighted up, a guard of steamers gay with bunting escorted him up to the landing where the hereditary Prince of Sweden, with a host of civil and military authorities, awaited him in the midst of a countless multitude of the people. The whole city was lighted up, and the fireworks made it look like a scene in fairy-land. The next day a solemn service of thanksgiving was offered up in the Castle chapel, and in the evening a grand banquet was given to all the members of the expedition.

International Fisheries Exhibition.

This exhibition was opened on April 28th by the Crown Prince of Prussia and Germany, in the Agricultural Museum at Berlin, of which we give an illustration. It is very extensive and various, both as regards the interesting collection of living fish, and that of many descriptions of fishing-tackle, which have been gathered from all parts of the world, and the great variety of smoked, preserved and tinned fish. China, Japan, Holland, Germany, America, England, Russia, Italy, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Austria Hungary are all more or less represented. It is, in fact, as the Commissioner of the United States remarked, "a union of all nations of the earth in a comparative and competitive display of the wealth of their rivers, lakes and seas, and the ingenuity with which the inhabitants of the waters are laid under contribution to furnish food, clothing and ornament for mankind."

Fine Arts Exposition, Turin.

This Exposition was opened on the 25th of April by King Humbert, attended by Cairoli, President of the Council and Vile Minister of the Interior. As all the artists of Italy responded to the call, the Exhibition, in the number and value of the paintings, is worthy of the palace. This stands in one of the finest quarters of Turin, that of the old Parade. It is a quadrilateral about 600 feet long by 200 feet deep, fronting on Sicmarn Street. The façade comprises a pavilion with an attic, and on either side porches with three arcades. The interior is divided into three galleries, that in the centre devoted to sculpture, those at the sides to paintings. There is an annex set apart for industrial art products. The ceremony of inauguration took place in the vestibule and grand saloon at the entrance of the palace.

The New Hotel des Postes, Paris.

The post-office at Paris is a series of buildings successfully added to an old historic edifice now black and tottering with age, the Hotel Fleurand Armenonville. It once belonged to the family of Paul de Gondy, then to Harvart, a great financier, but since 1750 has been the post office. Additions were made from time to time in different directions requiring a perfect labyrinth of corridors and staircases, which rendered the whole as unfitted as possible for the immense postal service of the French capital. The Government has now resolved to demolish it and erect an edifice worthy of the country. Meanwhile the postal business will be transferred to the Place du Carrousel and the wing of the buildings in the Rue de Rivoli. The streets adjoining the site of the new post-office will be widened and the new building will occupy a whole block facing on the Rue aux Ours, Rue du Louvre, Rue Jean Jacques Rousseau, and a new street not yet named. The public will enter on the Rue du Louvre, the mail wagons on Rue aux Ours. The building will be solid and commodious without pretensions to architectural elegance and will cost eight and a half millions of francs.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—A DISPLAY of American plants is to be held annually in Hyde Park, London.

—MANY Jesuits will leave France for this country when the decrees against them are enforced.

—RUSSIAN students are now forbidden to marry, and those who violate this rule are to be expelled from the university.

—THE Literary Congress at Lisbon, which was to have been held in June during the festivities in honor of the poet De Camoens, has been postponed to September 15th.

—THREE-FOURTHS of all the Baptist churches in the country are in the South. The membership of this denomination in the Southern States is 1,500,000, of whom 900,000 are colored.

—A FURTHER concession is said to have been granted to the Old Believers in Russia. The churches from which they were violently excluded forty years ago are to be restored to them.

—A TELEGRAM from Jackson, Tenn., says the Supreme Court has decided that the taxing district of Memphis is the successor of the City of Memphis, and is therefore liable for its contracts.

—THE persons who wrecked a train on the Andalusian Railway, in Spain, recently, have been court-martialed. Thirteen of them were sentenced to death and thirteen to imprisonment for twenty years.

—A SUPPOSED relic of Sir John Franklin's expedition has been pulled up off Shearness by a fisherman. It is a large wooden-stocked anchor marked Terror, and is believed to have belonged to the unfortunate vessel lost with the Erebus in 1845-46.

—THE losses by the recent fire which destroyed the town of Milton, Pa., amounted to $1,100,000. Over 600 houses were burned. For some days after the fire, hundreds of homeless people lived in tents. All the surrounding towns contributed liberally to the relief of the sufferers.

—THE engine of the train which went down with the Tay Bridge has been raised, and the reversing-bar shows that the engineer had not time to reverse the engine before he went over. The recent evidence shows that the train and bridge fell together, and before the former left the track.

—APPLICATIONS for space at the Melbourne Exhibition are pouring in, especially from the United States and France. The Exhibition at Sydney closed on April 20th. The exhibits numbered 14,000 and the awards 7,370. The number of admissions was 1,020,000, and the receipts were $225,000.

—THE Caucasian authorities hope to complete the military road connecting Alexandropol with Kars by the beginning of June. The road was begun last year, and is calculated to have cost upwards of $6,000 a mile, though the ground is singularly easy. The military road joining Kars with Batoum is already finished.

—GERMANY continues to fortify herself on her eastern frontier. Not content with strategic railways and intrenched camps, she is building forts around the largest fortresses. For instance, in the present year around Königsberg, in Prussia proper, ten forts will be completed, and an eleventh at Neuendorf will be begun.

—THE following operas have been prohibited by the Government of St. Petersburg: "Boris Godunow," by M. Mussogorski; "The Death of Ivan the Terrible" (English type not available for the original Russian title), by M. Tolstoi; and "Wassiliesa Melentjewa," by M. Ostrowski. It has been stated that the prohibition is attributable to political fears.

—IN Belgium there are 40,000 persons engaged in braiding straw hats, and 6,000 in sewing hats. The yearly income accruing to these workers is 4,000,000 francs. The greater part of this amount represents labor, the value of the raw material being very small. The larger portion of the material is wheat straw, cut before it is quite ripe and bleached in the sun.

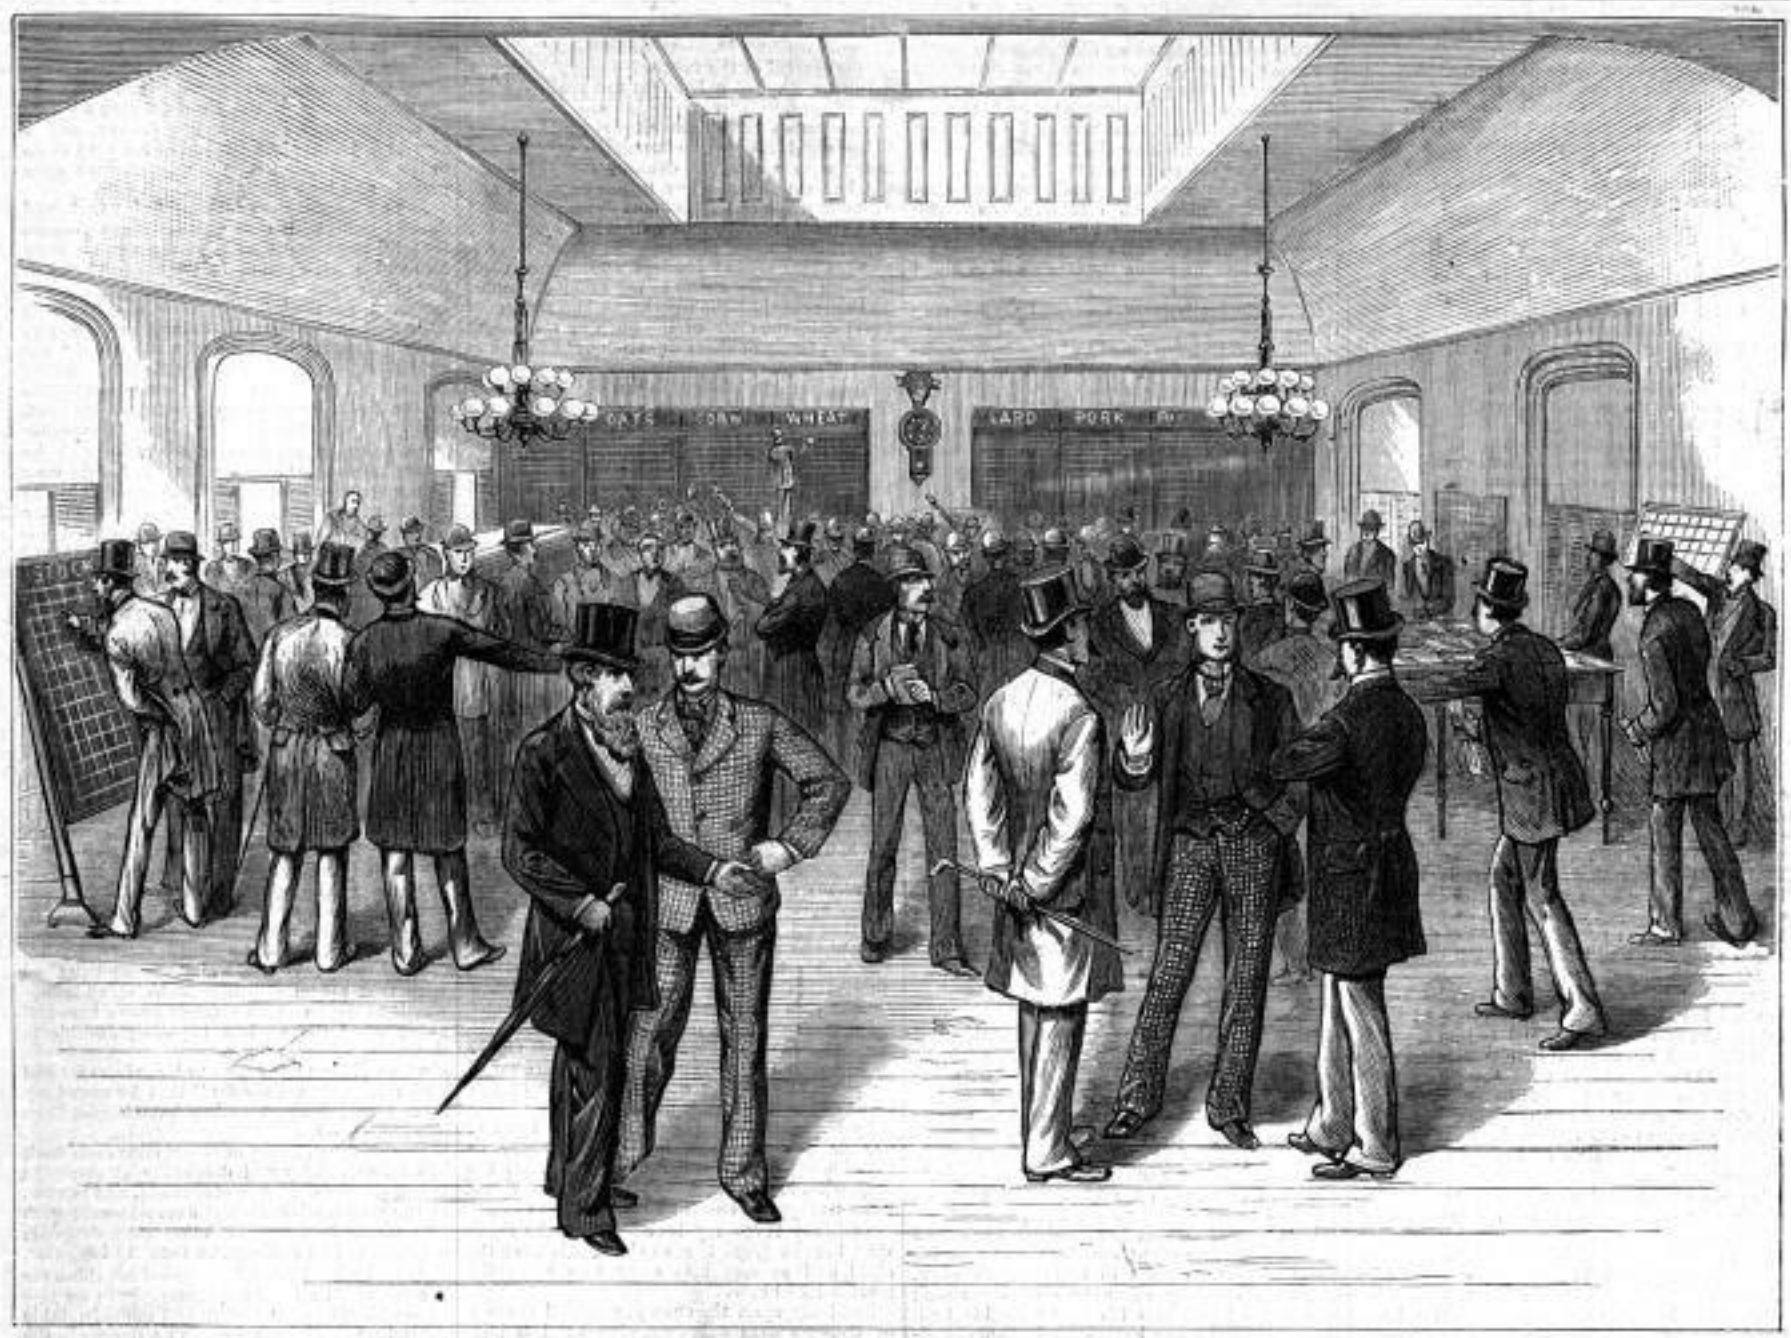
—"THE Temple of Glory of Russia" is the name of the building which it is proposed to erect in St. Petersburg, on Vasilievsky Island, just opposite the Winter Palace. The form of the building will be similar to that of the crown of Vladimir Monomach, a brave prince of the eleventh century, and the internal arrangements are to represent the history of Russia.

—THE workingmen of California have adopted a comprehensive platform. It is anti-Chinese, anti-subsidy, anti-national banks, anti-monopoly, and favoring greenbacks, Government control of corporations, female enfranchisement, compulsory education, the creating by tax of a fund to be used in assisting heads of families in settling on public lands, and the election of President and Vice-President of the United States and Postmasters by a direct vote of the people.

—PARIS has 365 miles of paved streets. Stone blocks are used on 264 miles, macadam on 82 miles, and asphalt on 19 miles. The macadam has been abandoned on account of the expense of maintaining it in good order and the impossibility of keeping it free from mud or dust. The cost in Paris for stone-block pavement has been $2.99 the square yard, against $2.10 for the asphalt. In Washington the new stone block pavements have cost on an average only $1.30, and the asphalt $1.47.

—BULGARIA is a nice kind of a place to live in. A resident says that when three or four armed Bulgarians meet an unarmed Turk alone, they generally cut off his head; and when three or four Turks meet a Bulgarian under similar circumstances, they generally cut off his head. When the Turk loses his head the case is ended, but when the dead Bulgarian is found there is an inquiry. Turks are arrested and examined, and encouraged to speak the truth by the application of red-hot irons to the soles of their feet.

—THE grand opening musical festival took place at the London Crystal Palace on May 1st, and was an immense success. The prima donna, Mme. Marie Roze, met a most enthusiastic reception upon making her appearance, and at the conclusion of each of her pieces received a perfect ovation. The other artists were Mme. Trebelli, Miss Patey, Mr. Lloyd and Signor Foli, and all met with deserved success. At the conclusion of the festival there was a grand Venetian fête in the gardens, which were magnificently illuminated, while the united bands of Her Majesty's Guards played. Over twenty thousand people were present.



—THE General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, now in session at Madison, Wis., embraces nearly 300 delegates, ministers and elders from the thirty-eight Synods in this country, which include 170 Presbyteries. The strength of the denomination is shown by a few figures. In 1879 there were 5,415 churches, 4,938 ministers, 574,486 communicants and 614,774 Sunday-school members. To support these churches $6,311,765 was contributed by their congregations, while to Home Missions $190,683 was given, and to Foreign Missions $261,658. For all purposes the amount of money raised aggregated $8,298,013. In the care of the denomination are thirteen theological seminaries, with 534 students for the year, and 161 were graduated. The consideration of all these interests come within the scope of the General Assembly.

THE YOUNG LOVE AND THE OLD.

OH, the young love was sweet, dear,
The dainty dream of ours,
When we could not keep our feet, dear,
From dancing through the flow'rs;
When hopes and gay romances
Were thick as leaves in Spring,
And cares were old folks' fancies,
And joy the solid thing.
Of all youth's visions best, dear,
Of all its golden dow'rs,
Oh, the young love was best, dear,
That dainty dream of ours!

Oh, the old love is sweet, dear,
These chill October days,
When we tread with faltering feet, dear,
The sere and silent ways,
When earth has lost its glory,
And heav'n has lost its blue,
And life's a sober story,
And care a comrade true.
Though hopes no longer cheat, dear,
And dreams have lost their sway,
Oh, the old love is sweet, dear,
That gilds the Autumn day!

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

Author of "IN THE MEADS," etc.

CHAPTER III.—(CONTINUED).

IN Toboskie's soul is a great doubt of this woman, over whom more than one man has well nigh gone mad. She confronts him in her sunny insouciant youth, with a dazzling smile upon her perfect lips, and her eyes shining like Summer seas. Still his keen instincts, swifter and more unerring than an Indian's, tell him that something is lacking in her soul. She has spoken carelessly, naturally; she, this queen of fashion, this pet of the high-bred throng; yet that growing doubt of her is upon him, and he tells himself that Jack Ashhurst's wife has lied to him.

Still, though his soul is for ever above and beyond her, though in all the years of their future she can never awaken in him that immutable and reverential love that is characteristic of the men of his race, though he feels her utter falsity and want of soul, still, despite all this, the sensuous grace of her Southern beauty appeals to his senses. He feels a blind, dizzy passion seize him as her eyes and lips smile up at him.

To his eyes, dazed as they are by passion, there is a vast invitation in her manner. Their surroundings fade away; he sees only that dazzling face, and bends lower and lower above it, while his breath breaks from him heavily.

Then suddenly his senses return—they have been literally swept away in that swift gust of passion—and he straightens himself, while his eyes flash. In this moment an utter hatred of himself rushes into his soul; he knows how near he has been to weakness, how nearly this woman has swept away that haughty self-containment which has been his pride, and a loathing both of her and himself deepens upon him.

And she has seen that sudden, irresistible, bending towards her, and is well pleased. She vows to have this man at her feet. She believes that it can be done by that swift weakness that so nearly overpowered him. Gypsy is not a bad woman; perhaps in all that throng there is no truer wife than Jack Ashhurst's. Between themselves there is a perfect understanding, and in Jack's breast confidence unlimited.

It pleases him that she is admired, and all her conquests are known to him. Never has she deceived him in any point, never could she be prouder of her triumphs than is he.

Now a deliberate resolution has fastened upon her to win this man's love. He is different from her past victims. Quite possibly she has seen handsomer men—in fact, she is sure that she has—but never one so haughty and regal, so proudly unapproachable. His general appearance is that of ice. His eyes are dark and keen as an eagle's, and flash at times like sun's rays upon an iceberg; his features straight and clear; his lips being thin and tightly compressed, and holding around them deep lines that tell of a dominant will. He is a man born to command, and although yet young, being not over thirty, has already celebrated himself in his own country as a powerful statesman, a just ruler and a man invulnerable to the charms of women, though always treating them with the courtliest deference, and never by any means shunning their society. Jack Ashhurst's wife, young and insouciant as she is, has a native ability for reading countenances. And, looking up now into the dark and icy visage of her companion, she knows that fierce passions slumber in his nature, or are restrained by an iron hand. She knows that some day he will awaken to love—a love that shall possess him like a mighty tempest—that shall smite his pride and self-security to the dust; that shall call crime holy, guilt sacred, if they but gain him the object of his incomputable passion.

It is something new, this wild, fierce, but suppressed nature of the man, and again she vows that for her this new life of love shall be awakened, that upon her shall centre all the overwhelming force of that passionate and dominant soul.

And at the same time, he, too, is busy with his thoughts. He is well aware that her beauty for an instant enthralled him as with a sorceress's spell. Yet he swears that never again, whatever the future may hold for him, shall he be betrayed into such weakness—weakness born of her. And he will keep his vow; in that wild, swift gust of passion, Clair Ashhurst's power over him began and ended. There is nothing in her antagonistic to him; it cannot be dignified by that title. But he has a terrible shrinking of her. There is in her nature something lacking that places an insurmountable barrier between them—that lifts him forever above her power.

A strange silence has come between them—a silence which he now breaks by resuming the conversation where she left off.

"And had she no friends?"

"None; she was the granddaughter of an impoverished nobleman, I believe. Jack collected all he could about her history, and has it saved in writing. Strange to say, although she was born in Greece, there is Russian blood in her."

Toboskie looks interested, and Gypsy continues:

"There is Russian blood in her—Jack ascertained to a certainty. And there is a lot of property somewhere around St. Petersburg that is hers by law. When Jack and Maize and I spend all our money, we are going to emigrate to Russia and pick up the stray wealth around there," she speaks, laughingly, and he sees that her eyes always brighten when she mentions the child. That she is sincerely attached to it he cannot doubt.

"And when am I to see 'Jack?'" says Toboskie, with a smile.

"Poor, dear Jack," ejaculates Gypsy, and the corners of her mouth go down. "He is laid up with the gout. And the best husband;" beyond doubt these are Gypsy's honest sentiments; still, she shoots a little upward glance at her companion. As a usual thing men do not accept this unqualified praise of their rival with cheerfulness, but in that dark, clear-cut face she can trace no signs of disquiet. "He would make me come down to-night; he is so unselfish. But I run up every hour and see him. By the way, it is time that I should go now. Won't you go with me? It would cheer Jack up so. And it's only a step." The great, azure eyes are turned fully upon him, and he cannot refuse without rudeness.

Accordingly, he professes his delight at the prospect of "cheering up Jack," and, giving her his arm, they leave the ballroom.

CHAPTER IV.—THE RESCUE.

THROUGH the hall, up the broad stairs, and then through another hall, they go, Jack Ashhurst's wife talking blithely as they leisurely proceed. Finally, they pause at the commencement of a suite of rooms, and, throwing open the door, Gypsy ushers her companion into her private parlor, wherein sits great, honest, handsome Jack Ashhurst, reading the Turf and Farm, with his unruly foot propped upon a chair.

It is not often that Lord Toboskie is seized with sudden or violent emotions, but now his heart instantly warms to this English peer, and they speedily enter into conversation; and, while he charms his host with his brilliancy, his eyes are busy with his surroundings. There is nothing of the "hotel" about this apartment. It is airy, home-like and daintily perfect. Upon the walls hang paintings by Murillo, Carracci and Guido. Bric-à-brac is strewn promiscuously around, and here, too, are memories of Rome, Venice and Dresden. Suddenly the door of the apartment opens, and a lady enters. She is tall, above the average height of women, and extremely slender. Her hair is black, with that soft, purple darkness seen only in Spaniards; her eyes are of the same hue, deep-set, and born with a peculiar magnetic fire; her complexion is dark, amounting almost to swarthiness, and her lips are thin and straightly shaped; her brow, broad and denoting a powerful intellect, though one, he is inclined to think, wasted. She wears her hair drawn straight back from her forehead, and is dressed plainly in black, though in good taste. She is, he should think, thirty years old.

She advances with ease and dignity, and is introduced by Gypsy as "My dear friend and companion, Mrs. Gabaudie."

The conversation now becomes general; and during a lull, Gypsy turns to her companion with the question:

"Is Maize abed?"

"Yes. She was not well, and I sent her to her room quite early," answers the dark lady.

Lady Ashhurst starts in some alarm.

"Not well?" she says. "I must see her," and crosses the room. Lord Toboskie's gaze follows her as she passes into the next apartment, which she also crosses, and opens the door of the chamber beyond.

He sees her stand for an instant as though petrified, then recoil and fling up her soft, jeweled hands with a sharp cry of horror. Then from the opened door rushes a flood of smoke, before which Lady Ashhurst turns and speeds back to the parlor. Her face is blanched to the hue of marble, and she runs straight to the Russian.

"Fire! Save her!—oh, save her!" The words break from her in a hoarse, choked cry, and every one springs to his feet.

In an instant Toboskie has rushed through the long suite, and stands upon the threshold of the furthest chamber. The windows being up, the smoke principally escapes into the outer air; only the red flames of the fire fill the room—the pitiless fire that leaps and sparkles and fastens on all the soft drapery of the chamber.

And through the flames and heat, standing in the centre of the burning circle, he sees a small white-robed figure. All the long mass of golden hair falls down over her snowy robe; and through the fire her great solemn eyes meet his in that strong mysterious expression, now intensified, that holds him for an instant entranced.

A great shudder creeps through all the length and breadth of his magnificent frame, and his eyes are fastened upon her. He has seen all this before—in fancy. Her eyes have haunted him, and always with them has come this picture—the fire, the spirit and martyrdom—the soul struggling upwards to its high attainments through the purification of the flames.

Is it typical of the future?

But he is speedily brought to a realization of the present.

The flames have drawn nearer and nearer to the child. A swift convulsion crosses her face; with a gasping, choking cry she flings out her small arms, her form sways and she drops downward to the floor. With one bound he gains her side, and, gathering her in his arms, flings over her face and shoulders a blanket that lays at his feet, and speeds back through the fiery circle to the outer chamber. At the same time the watchman and assistants burst open the door of the burning room, and the fire, being of short duration, is soon under their control.

Everything has been done quietly, and below the gay throngs dance on unconscious of the hair's-breadth that separated them from a tragedy.

In the parlor of the Ashhursts' Jack's wife wrings her hands, and alternately cries and laughs in a most hysterical manner. Her face is pallid, her eyes wild and still terrified. Jack himself is somewhat pale, as he hobbles across to his darling, whom the Russian still holds tightly in his arms.

Only the dark lady has any semblance of composure, and she, too, crosses to the child, evidently with the intention of ascertaining the extent of her injury, which is comparatively slight. She lies pale and apparently lifeless in his arms, her head thrown backwards against his breast, the straight, clear-cut features gleaming like a cameo, and all the long flood of golden hair sweeping downwards over his arm.

"Maize, my darling!" Honest Jack Ashhurst's voice quivers and is husky, as he bends over the child just plucked from death. "Oh, Maize; oh, my sweet love! oh, my dear—my dear!" Like a rush of south wind Gypsy springs from a couch upon which she has thrown herself in her frantic terror, and flies to the child. She bends low above her, and winds her lovely white arm around the small form that the ambassador still holds. All the rich color has faded from her cheeks, leaving her pale but beautiful as an angel. Around her slight form sweep the soft riches of her silken robes, and in the nut-brown of her hair and around the rich contour of her throat gleam diamonds fit for a princess.

By her side is stationed the sable form of her dark companion, her swarthy face as emotionless as stone, her eyes bent upon the lady who, in a perfect abandonment of weakness, wrings her hands and sobs like a child.

"Oh, my love—my love!" again the shrill wail breaks from her, as she bends over the child, and presses kiss after kiss upon the marble-like brow.

Suddenly upon the snowy, rounded surface of Gypsy's arm a brown, slim hand is lain. Toboskie notices this without raising his eyes, and also observes how the four dark fingers press tighter and tighter upon the soft flesh.

Involuntarily glancing at Gypsy's face he sees the lips quiver convulsively, and a frown creases the smooth beauty of her brow. At first he is sure that she makes an effort to withdraw from that powerful touch; then her arm lies passively, while gradually her sobs cease; and with one final convulsion in her pallid face, as if occasioned by actual pain, she slowly withdraws her gaze from the child and fastens it upon her companion.

Toboskie also glances at the woman. In her eyes is a chill, powerful gleam that dazzles like lightning—a gleam that reveals to him the wonderful mesmeric power of this soul.

"Well?" Jack Ashhurst's wife puts the question, looking helplessly into the fathomless eyes of her companion.

"You are excited, Lady Ashhurst, and can do no good. Don't you think it would be better for you to sit down and leave me to attend to this?" Her voice is smooth and natural and honest. Unsuspicious Jack has observed nothing unusual in this circumstance; but Toboskie notices the dog-like humility with which Gypsy obeys the unspoken command and sinks in a chair.

Then her companion turns to him:

"Give me the child, my lord, if you please." The words are simple, but they rouse a fierce wrath in him.

"I will hold her myself if Lord Jack does not object," he says, calmly.

"Certainly not. Shall be delighted if you will be so kind," replies Jack, who, between his recent excitement and the pangs of his abused member, is well-nigh destracted.

The woman fastens the full light of her fathomless eyes upon Toboskie in a steady and peculiar gaze; but his own never waver. He sees the gathering, scintillating gleams, and the red light that speaks of wrath as well as power. He sees her take a step nearer him, while her eyes deepen in their mysterious splendor. He knows how terrible must be this will that he is combatting to a weaker spirit, but the haughty supremacy of his own matchless strength never wavers. Between them is that steady, continued stare while two powerful wills struggle for ascendency.

Finally the woman sees how useless are her efforts to subdue the mighty force of this man's icy and immovable character, and, dropping her arms, turns away. For the first time her peculiar power has been resisted successfully, but Toboskie knows that in her he has made a bitter and implacable enemy for all eternity.

"Is she burnt much?" groans Jack, struggling with his own pangs.

"Comparatively very little; one poor little arm is considerably blistered, and must necessarily be very painful, but not serious," says Toboskie, gently lifting the injured member, he having lain Maize upon a sofa and seated himself beside her.

The Dark Lady, as he always designates her in his mind, now returns with lint and washes, and places them upon a stand by his side. There is something amounting almost to stolidity in her excessive calm as she stands silently above him. Gypsy lies, motionless as a statue, upon a distant divan. And now over the countenance of the child flickers a gleam of awakening life. The lips quiver, and a scarlet flush creeps upwards to the very roots of the golden hair; then the great, dark eyes unclose and look straight into his own.

For an instant she continues to lay mute and dazed; then, with that quick, defiant gesture that he remembers so well, she recoils from him and a flash comes in the shadowy splendor of her eyes.

"Jack, oh, Jack!" There is a convulsive little ring in the voice that started so bravely, and the faintest auspicion of a sob, as the excruciating pain of the burnt flesh shoots through all her frame. With a mad disregard of the gout, Jack hastily gets upon his feet, and again valiantly hobbles across the room.

"What is it, my darling, my little pet?" he cries, bending above her. "Oh, Lord! look at her arm!" recoiling suddenly at sight of the red, blistered flesh, where the sleeve of her nightgown hangs in black and charred remains. "Good mercy! what a —— shame! I'll have every man arrested in this house. I'll make somebody pay dear for this heathenish carelessness. Tell me, darling, if you can, who set the room on fire? Only let me find out and I'll—— There, then, dear, don't cry!"

"Dear Jack, I am not going to cry," murmurs the child, and a ghastly attempt at a smile flits athwart her pallid lips. "But Jack, couldn't you do something for my arm? And take him away!" She jerks her golden head in the direction of the Russian, who has given way to his host.

Honest, tender-hearted Jack is instantly plunged in the direst confusion at this last request, and bends over her in alarm.

"Don't be uncivil, Maize," he begs, in an undertone. "Why, good fathers, child! he saved your life, in all probability!"

Jack and the ambassador stand alone now beside the child—the Dark Lady having crossed to Gypsy—and Maize, raising her head with that proud uplifting, looks steadily upwards at the two men bending above her, and every word, though low, is plainly audible to them.

"I would not have gone to him; he came and took me. It is not my fault that he saved my life. I would much rather have burned than had him save me!"

During the delivery of this civil speech Jack has made sundry and desperate attempts to check the flood of her eloquence, and is now, at the termination, almost overwhelmed with confusion. Feeling that the occasion demands some sort of an apology, he turns to his guest.

"Don't mind her—I hope you don't think for a moment," he begins, vaguely. "Maize is—er—subject to most violent and unaccountable prejudices. In fact, there isn't a person in the world that she doesn't detest," he tells this lie unblushingly, and continues with a long preamble, with the laudable intention of preventing any tender speech Miss Maize may have in waiting.

"My dear sir, I don't 'mind' in the least," cheerfully affirms the hero of the evening; "to the contrary, I am very fond of this sort of thing." The fervency with which he attests to this falsehood causes Jack to look at him dubiously. "It is but natural that Miss Maize should detest me; twice I have been unfortunate enough to do the young lady a favor—once I rescued her from a wetting, and to-night I saved her from the flames. Since the world stood, that has been sufficient cause for enmity on the side of the favored."

A queer, half-abashed look steals over the child's face, which also shows plainly the tokens of a desperate struggle. Then suddenly it ceases, and propping herself up with her well arm, she lifts its burnt and aching fellow-member and extends it to Toboskie.

There is something inestimably touching in the simple gesture, telling that even her pride and enmity shall be sacrificed to justice; and he looks first at the small quivering hand and then at the pallid face. It must be confessed that there is nothing nearly so amicable as the gesture in the gaze that meets his. There is a suppressed hostile gleam still in those splendid eyes that shows him her flag of truce is raised under decided protest.

Jack, just made aware of the absence of his wife, has hopped over to ascertain the extent of Gypsy's ailments, and Toboskie and the child are briefly alone.

"I am sure," she says, stiffly, and he sees it is with difficulty that she can force her lips to frame the words, so great is the growing pain of her burns—"I am sure I am very much obliged to you," and she furthermore humbles herself by pressing her hand upon him in the form of a vicious little thrust.

But he refuses to take it, and bends above her.

"No," he says, half-laughing. "Let it be an even warfare between us. As you justly say, you did not ask me to rescue you, and I should have done the same for any chambermaid in the house; you are under no obligations. If you were hostile to me an hour ago, there is no earthly reason why you should deny yourself that pleasure now."

The little hand drops, and she sinks back upon the pillows with signs of evident relief, that can be anything but flattering to her rescuer.

Jack and his wife now come to Maize, both suggesting a thousand impossible remedies that would be of no earthly use to the sufferer, and wildly impatient for the arrival of the doctor, for whom every available servant in the house has been dispatched.

The consequences are that in five minutes one after another of the reports are sent in, to the effect that not a doctor can be procured for love or money.

Jack immediately launches forth into vindictive abuse of the whole medical profession, while Gypsy, again bathed in tears, persecutes the sufferer with constant inquiries as to "How she feels," "And if it hurts her much," and "If she won't have her arm bathed in lavender-water." The child bears her pain with a Spartan heroism, but her face blanches more and more, and her eyes are a trifle wild and agonized.

"What shall we do?" groans distracted Jack.

"I have had some slight experience in surgical matters," begins his guest, stiffly, perfectly conscious that if the child have her own way his services will be promptly declined, "and if——"

"Oh! I should be so thankful!" interrupts Gypsy, frantically. "Do—do something for her, Lord Toboskie! Oh, the poor child! See how she suffers!"

He sees a fierce objection in the pain-filled eyes of the child; but with a manner that announces his determination of taking the case wholly in his own hands, he kneels beside the couch and examines the injured arm. Then he calls for scissors, which are speedily supplied him, and, without one glance at the little white face, but with inestimable gentleness, proceeds to cut away the burnt skin and growing blisters.

It is an agonizing operation for the child, and as she lies back upon the couch with closed eyes, anon a suppressed groan breaks from her twitching lips. Finally, he has the torn and useless flesh removed, then proceeds, somewhat awkwardly, it is true, to bind the arm in a simple ointment, the ingredients of which have been supplied him by Mrs. Gabaudie, who now stands beside him.

"In knowledge you are irreproachable, but in practice a trifle maussir," she says, courteously. "Perhaps I can be of some service in bandaging."

He bows and politely gives way. She kneels beside Maize, and softly taking up her arm, proceeds to bind it up. Toboskie watches her, unconsciously interested. All her gestures are slow and graceful and full of magnetic rest. There is about her, in moments of tranquillity, a soothing, slumberous influence that makes itself conscious to those in her vicinity. There is an inestimable ease in all her manners.

Until this moment he has seen in her nothing positively beautiful, though no one could doubt her refined extraction. Now, as he watches her hands, he is struck with their beauty. They are more perfect than sculptured marble, because they possess wondrous character. In shade, like her face, they are a rich olive, interlaced with just a suggestion of dark-blue veins. In the palms a pink flush, heart-shaped, breaks through the darker shade, across which lead straight and perfect lines. The fingers are slender and exceedingly tapering, with rounded, delicate nails, through which breaks faintly that same soft tint of the palms.

It is a wondrous delicate hand, softer than satin, he knows, yet as it trifles in its idle, slumberous grace over the details of the bandaging, there is in it an expression—I use the word advisedly—of marvelous and incomputable power—a power that would surmount every earthly obstacle, and even cope with heaven for a coveted boon. All the hidden, mysterious soul of this woman, all the strength and fire and passion repressed from the icy exterior, claim existence in her hands.

And he sees, too, that her touch is soothing to the sufferer. She lies more quietly, and her eyes close, but not with that spasmodic compression borne of great agony.

The bandaging is accomplished, still those dark hands with their sensitive beauty flit around the child, brushing like the breath of a zephyr the pallid cheek, the closed eyes, the still twitching lips, and lingering longer than elsewhere upon the heaving chest.

Minutes pass.

Finally the lips and breast grow motionless, and the soft, regular breathing denotes slumber.

Maize is actually asleep!

He is amazed at this proof of the mesmeric power of the woman, and glances at his companions. But they apparently perceive nothing remarkable in the occurrence. Feeling that he can be of no further service, but proffering his assistance whenever they shall honor him by calling upon him should occasion demand it, he makes his adieus in a low voice, and, after a superfluity of thanks, takes his departure with the growing conviction upon him that, altogether, Jack Ashhurst's household is, to say the least, a trifle peculiar.

HANLAN AGAIN WINS THE $6,000 PURSE.

THE long-talked-of meeting between Edward Hanlan, of Canada, and Charles Courtney, of Union Springs, N. Y., took place at Washington, D. C., on Wednesday, May 19th. It was scarcely more than a meeting, for, with the exception of a few strokes by Courtney at the start, the Canadian oarsman had the race entirely to himself. Although falling somewhat behind his previous record, he retains the championship and secures the purse of $6,000 which he fairly earned last year.

The conditions for a great aquatic contest were never better. The water was admirable, the weather fresh, the spectators numerous and encouragingly demonstrative.

By 4 o'clock the aqueduct bridge, which spans the Potomac a few yards above the starting-point of the race, swarmed with people. The housetops and windows which overlooked the course, the decks of the vessels in port, the stands which had been erected for the accommodation of spectators—all were alive with a perspiring mass of humanity. Thousands of people who would be ill-natured and impatient on any other occasion, sat three, four, five hours to-day without a murmur, waiting for the race to begin. It is no exaggeration to say that when the starting-gun was fired at nine minutes past six o'clock at least 50,000 spectators had their eyes bent upon the course.

At a quarter to six o'clock Hanlan and Courtney both appeared on the river, paddling leisurely towards the starting-point. Their appearance was the signal for enthusiastic cheering from the thousands of spectators. Hanlan appeared in good form, and seemed to watch Courtney's rather deliberate movements with languid curiosity. Courtney stopped once or twice to adjust some of his tackle. As he passed up to take his place his face wore a downcast look, which was ascribed to sullenness by some, and by some to illness. Courtney's lack of hope and spirit was apparent before he had gone a hundred yards in the race. At the first quarter of a mile he had lost nearly two boat-lengths. At the end of half a mile he stopped rowing, and bathed his head, and from that moment he was virtually out of the race. Hanlan continued to draw away from him without any apparent exertion, and at the end of the first mile was one-eighth of a mile ahead. After this he stopped rowing several times to bathe his head and sponge the water out of his boat, as he did in the famous race on the Tyne last year.

Courtney plodded on, steering wild, and running afoul of the flags placed to mark the course. As he arrived opposite his headquarters at the Potomac Club house, he appeared to be on the point of leaving the course, but did not. He paddled leisurely along, occasionally resting to bathe his head, until he had made about two miles, when he gave up altogether. After resting a short time, he turned about and paddled back to the boat-house.

Hanlan rowed over the course, but apparently without an effort to make a quick record, on account of time. He finished the race in 36 minutes and 46 seconds.

Pulling up to the referee's boat, Hanlan was awarded the race by the referee, and was cordially congratulated by Mr. Soule. Hanlan then picked his way through the scores of steamers and river craft of every description, and reached his quarters at the Analostan boat house, where he was received with the wildest demonstrations of delight, lifted bodily from his boat, and carried upon the shoulders of his enthusiastic friends into the boat-house.

In the evening the winner was serenaded at his quarters in Willard's Hotel, and made a short speech, in which he thanked the people of Washington for the courtesy that had been shown him. He said that he came intending to row a race, and was sorry that he had been disappointed. During his sojourn in Washington the corridor of the hotel was crowded with people anxious to obtain a view of the Canadian oarsman.

HON. HENRY WATTERSON,

EDITOR OF THE LOUISVILLE "COURIER-JOURNAL."

HON. HENRY WATTERSON, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, has just attained the fortieth year of his age. Barely in the prime of life, he is already recognized by the public, as well as in newspaper circles, as one of the most distinct personalities in American journalism. His name is familiar to the reading public of all sections, and his editorial character is very strongly individualized in the popular conception. Like Horace Greeley, he presents an image sui generis, though in most respects the two differ from each other in their professional traits quite as widely as they differed on many political issues.

Mr. Watterson entered upon his career as a journalist in the nineteenth year of his age, serving his apprenticeship, figuratively speaking, on the Washington Star. After the outbreak of the civil war he assumed editorial control of the Nashville Banner, succeeding the brilliant Confederate General Zollicoffer. He afterwards became a cavalry soldier in the Southern Army, commanded by the Episcopal bishop, General Polk. He filled an interlude of his military career by editing the Rebel in Chattanooga, Tenn., a sheet of which no relic survives except the name. The United States received his surrender at Atlanta in due course of time, and his next appearance in his chosen profession was on the staff of the Cincinnati Times. Subsequently he returned to the Nashville Banner, and in 1866 abandoned this to locate himself in Louisville, the theatre of his true journalistic career. Becoming an associate of the gifted Prentice in editing the Louisville Journal, in which he had purchased an interest, he extended his fame as his opportunities developed, and at once began to be recognized as the appropriate heir to the honors and responsibilities which the failing veteran must soon be forced by his infirmities to lay down. He subsequently became, with one or two others, an associate with Mr. Walter N. Haldeman in purchasing and consolidating the Journal with the Courier, and mounted the tripod as editor of the Courier-Journal. For thirteen years he has held this position. That period constitutes the finished portion of his public career. At the date of the consolidation his reputation was purely local, but now he is one of the best known editors in the United States, his influence in the Southwest equals that of any other man, and the newspaper which he edits is one of the greater powers of the land.

Mr. Watterson had been actively instrumental in bringing forward Mr. Tilden's candidacy in 1876, and the Democratic Party generally admitted his leadership in that movement. He was elected temporary chairman of the St. Louis Convention, and, though destitute of parliamentary practice and training, he brought to bear upon the task before him a surprising readiness and tact contributing materially to the results of the convention's labors, its debates, its diplomatic tactics, and its final harmonious action.

In the Summer of 1876 he was elected to fill an unexpired term as a representative of the Louisville district in Congress, by a vote of 14,000 to 500. The attention of Congress was immediately absorbed at the beginning of the session by the Presidential election muddle. For weeks and months the country was on the verge of an internecine war, and all other questions sunk out of sight. Mr. Watterson, actuated by his devotion to Tilden's cause, and by the natural ardor of his convictions, was a leader of the more aggressive wing of the Democratic Representatives, and favored strong measures. It was in this connection that his rather vague but threatening allusion to "100,000 unarmed Kentuckians" as arbitrators became a text for newspaper articles and public comment. He and his associates were soon convinced by the tone of the Press, the appeals of commercial associations, and the arguments of the veteran leaders of the Democratic Party, that the country desired peace at whatever cost. He accepted the verdict of the Electoral tribunal, and with characteristic zeal distinguished himself as an opponent of the obstructionists, both in and out of Congress. In a public speech he reasoned as follows: "The battle was really lost before we passed the Electoral Bill. It provided for but one out of two contingencies—Hayes or Tilden. What could be thought of a man who, having voted for it in his full senses, and referred his case to the commission named under it, should, of his own motion, turn about when it decided against him and try to evade it? Bear in mind that it was a Democratic, not a Republican, measure, passed by Democratic votes, opposed by a majority of Republican votes."

Controlled by such sentiments, Mr. Watterson, while persistently denying the legality and justice of the settlement of that great and perilous issue, resumed his editorial pen after the decision to urge upon the people of his section to give Mr. Hayes "a gentleman's chance," and to respond generously to his efforts to reverse the civil policy of his predecessor in office. Mr. Watterson is now the most strenuous and prominent advocate of Mr. Tilden's claims to the Democratic nomination. This is for the nonce his chief ambition.

A man of robust constitution, quick and impetuous in his movements, with a good liver and a clear brain, he has a remarkable capacity for hard work; at the same time, for the drudging and plodding branch of newspaper work he has but little liking. He has in a marked degree the professional intuitions of the home journalist, with a rare tact in creating opinions and carrying with him the sympathies of his constituency. Socially, Mr. Watterson is genial and companionable, and has hosts of personal friends.

Belgium's National Festival.

IN common with the old Flemish cities of Ghent, Antwerp, Bruges, Liege, Verviers, Mons and Charleroi, and all other cities, towns and hamlets, great and small, within the dominions of Leopold II., Brussels, the elegant capital of this kingdom, is now preparing with almost feverish activity for the commencement of the jubilee of the foundation of the Belgian monarchy and of Belgian independence. On the 15th of June, King Leopold, surrounded by all the notabilities of the kingdom, will in person open the Great National Palace on the Champs des Manœuvres, which is now rapidly approaching completion. The Prince of Wales, the Crown Prince of Austria, many German Princes, and members of the Russian Imperial family, are expected to visit Brussels in the course of the Summer. It is reported, too, that the Emperor of Austria has also been invited.

Both political parties are entering with great enthusiasm into the preparations for the great celebration, which is to commence on the 15th of June, and during the jubilee fêtes there will be but one party—the nation. There will be interminable processions and cavalcades, representing every constituted body, national and municipal, in the kingdom. A grand banquet will be given, presided over by the King in person, and attended by the representatives of the Legislature and the leading men of the country, whether connected with the State, with the municipalities, or with commerce, industry, literature, or art.

But the great centre of the celebration will be the exposition in the Palace on the Champs des Manœuvres. In this structure, occupying independently of various annexes for exhibitions of domestic animals and other objects, nearly 70,000 square metres, there will be the most comprehensive show of Belgian industry ever brought together. Every kind of object produced by manufacturing, mining and agricultural industry within the temperate zone will there be presented, with the sole qualification that everything from beginning to end will be of Belgian production.

The manufacture in Shiraz, Yezd and Ispahan has been steadily increasing, and great care is being exercised to maintain a high quality.

One of the Coaches on the Great Western Railroad of England has been painted with Professor Balmain's luminous paint. It is in appearance very little different from ordinary paint, but during the time the carriage is exposed to the light the paint is rapidly absorbing the daylight, and when night comes it throws out a mild radiance. It has been employed on life-buoys, rendering them visible from a long distance.

A Few Days Ago, as some laborers were making an excavation at Iwano, a village on the Nidan, near the Lake of Biwano, they came on a magnificent lacustrine canoe, in an excellent state of preservation. The vessel, oak built, was 30 feet long and 2 feet 6 inches wide. Dr. Goss, a local antiquary, purchased it from the owner of the land where it was found, and superintended its removal to the Museum of Neuveville, whither it was transported without injury.

The Inoculation of cattle as a preventive of pleuro-pneumonia, which began in Australia, has been successfully introduced on a large scale into Edinburgh, Scotland. During the past three years about five thousand cattle have been inoculated in that city and its vicinity, reducing the mortality from seventy-five to about five per cent. It has been estimated by a competent authority that the loss in England from this disease was not less than one million head of cattle in the six years ending with 1860, and the loss in Australia a few years ago was thirty to forty per cent. of the whole.

According to Mr. Potter, United States Consul at Crefeld, Germany, the number of beet-sugar mills in Germany is 229; in 1850, 154. Pounds of sugar made in 1878, 850,000,000; in 1850, 113,000,000. About twelve pounds of beets make one pound of sugar. The total product of beet sugar in all Europe is 3,600,000,000 pounds. Mr. Potter submits a variety of suggestions to American producers. The territory in the United States best suited to the beet is in New England, the vicinity of the great lakes, and in the same lines westward. The United States have many advantages favoring the production of beet-root sugar. No industry, he thinks, could be introduced into our country yielding more wealth and contentment to the people than this.

The Long-expected Map of Palestine, drawn in twenty-six sheets, on a scale of one inch to the mile, after the surveys of Lieutenants Conder and Kitchener, R. E., is now reported as complete and ready for publication. It has been photozincographed, under the superintendence of Colonel Cooke, R. E., the Director-General of the Ordnance Survey, for the committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund. The first issue will be to the two hundred and fifty holders of the special edition of the memoirs and map, as a first instalment of that work. It will afterwards be forwarded to the general subscribers of this fund, and will then be issued to the public. The survey of the country was accomplished between January, 1872, and September, 1877, since which time the maps have been laid down, the memoirs written, the observations calculated, the hills drawn, and the sheets lithographed. The whole of the work, except the coloring, has been executed by officers and men of the Royal Engineers.

The Excavations in the garden of the Villa Farnesina, Rome, for widening the bed of the Tiber have again yielded several interesting archæological results. A statue of a Roman matron, one metre seventy centimetres high, and perfect except for the loss of the left hand, was found recently, and close by another statue of Tiberius, which was, however, in many fragments. Near these a sepulchrum containing several urns was discovered, four of which were of the finest workmanship, decorated with reliefs of fruits and flowers; in the other two, besides the ashes and calcined bones found in all, there were two gold rings, with onyx stones, somewhat damaged by fire, but still perfect enough to show an intaglio—one of a lion sleeping, the other of three children chasing a bear. It is conjectured that the urns had been previously discovered in the building of the Aurelian wall, which passes by a few steps off, and that the finer urns had been robbed of anything of value, while the plain ones escaped notice. On one of the latter is an inscription, "Minati A. Pollæ."

THE late Joseph Seligman, of this city, bequeathed $30,000 to charitable and educational institutions, including $5,000 for the Society of Ethical Culture. He had already, shortly before his decease, given the sum of $10,000 for kindergarten and industrial schools for the poor, established by that society.

THE Emperor William and the Empress Augusta will attend the unveiling of the Goethe monument at Berlin, June 1st. They both knew Goethe intimately, the Empress being a daughter of Karl Augusta, Grand Duke of Saxe Weimar, the patron and friend of the poet. It was during his latter years at Weimar that the courtship and marriage of William and Augusta occurred.

THE appointment of Lieutenant-General Ernrot, of the Russian Army, as Minister of War to Prince Alexander, gives Russia another hold upon the principality of Bulgaria. Already most of the principal appointments in connection with the Bulgarian Army are in the hands of Russians, while as many as seven hundred non-commissioned officers of Russian nationality are engaged in drilling the troops.

THE Council Chamber at Charleston, S. C., is ornamented with full-length portraits of George Washington, James Monroe, Andrew Jackson and John Caldwell Calhoun; portraits of Zachary Taylor, Wade Hampton and General Moultrie, and marble busts of Robert Fulton and Senator Calhoun. The portrait of Washington is by Trumbull, and is valued very highly. The bust of Calhoun is by Clark Mills.

THE late Lord Derby and Mr. Gladstone's favorite author was Homer. The present Lord Derby said recently of his father, that "the only thing he knew precisely was Homer, and even at that Mr. Gladstone beat him." Mr. Bright's favorite author is Milton, a copy of which he always carries in his pocket. Mr. Lowe, in his great speeches on the reform debates of 1866, laid Virgil and Ovid heavily under contribution.

MR. GLADSTONE, in taking upon himself the duties and responsibilities of the offices of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, follows an example set by several of his predecessors in Downing Street. The two posts were held simultaneously by Walpole, Stanhope, Pelham, Grenville, Pitt, Addington, Percival, Canning, and by Peel in 1834 and 1835. Mr. Gladstone himself also, at the close of his last administration, acted as his own Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIX black envoys have arrived in London from Mtesa, monarch of a wide region in the dark continent, of which Stanley has so much to say. They come with the king's compliments to Queen Victoria, requesting her to express through her envoy her desire as to the status of missionaries in his kingdom. They had also orders to request a supply of rum and rifles, and, as an inducement to their request being granted, to announce their master's wish to embrace the Christian religion, provided he is permitted to retain the worship of his idols—the great snake, the lord lion, and the strong elephant. The Queen was to give audience to the six envoys, who stay at the Charing Cross Hotel.

A FEW weeks ago President and Mrs. Hayes went to Mount Vernon, and passed the night there, sleeping in the bed formerly used by George and Martha Washington. A good deal of fun was had when the fact got out, but the custodian of the property at Mount Vernon says that it is the usual thing for Presidents to do. Lincoln, Grant, Johnson, Buchanan, Pierce, Fillmore and Tyler, he says, have all slept in Washington's bed, and he supposes that other Presidents have, too, that is as far as his memory runs. Some of the Presidents named occupied the bed several nights during their term of office, and President Pierce was in the habit of going to Mount Vernon to pass the night very often during the Summer.

M. JEAN BAPTISTE LÉON SAY, who has recently been made Ambassador at the Court of St. James, is the third in descent of what may almost be called a race of political economists. His father was Horace Emile Say, author of "Studies on the Administration of the Town of Paris and of the Department of the Seine" (1846), and a leading contributor to the Journal des Economistes, the "Dictionnaire de l'Economie Politique," and works of a kindred nature. The grandfather of the new ambassador was the celebrated Jean Baptiste Say, whose "Decade Philosophique, Politique et Littéraire" is one of the most remarkable products of the Revolutionary period. Jean Baptiste Say is also known by a treatise on political economy, and by a history of what Mr. Carlyle calls the doleful science. The M. Say of the moment had, however, a great-uncle, Louis Auguste Say, who was a distinguished political economist, and brother to the illustrious Jean Baptiste. Louis Auguste Say is chiefly known by a work on the wealth and poverty of nations.

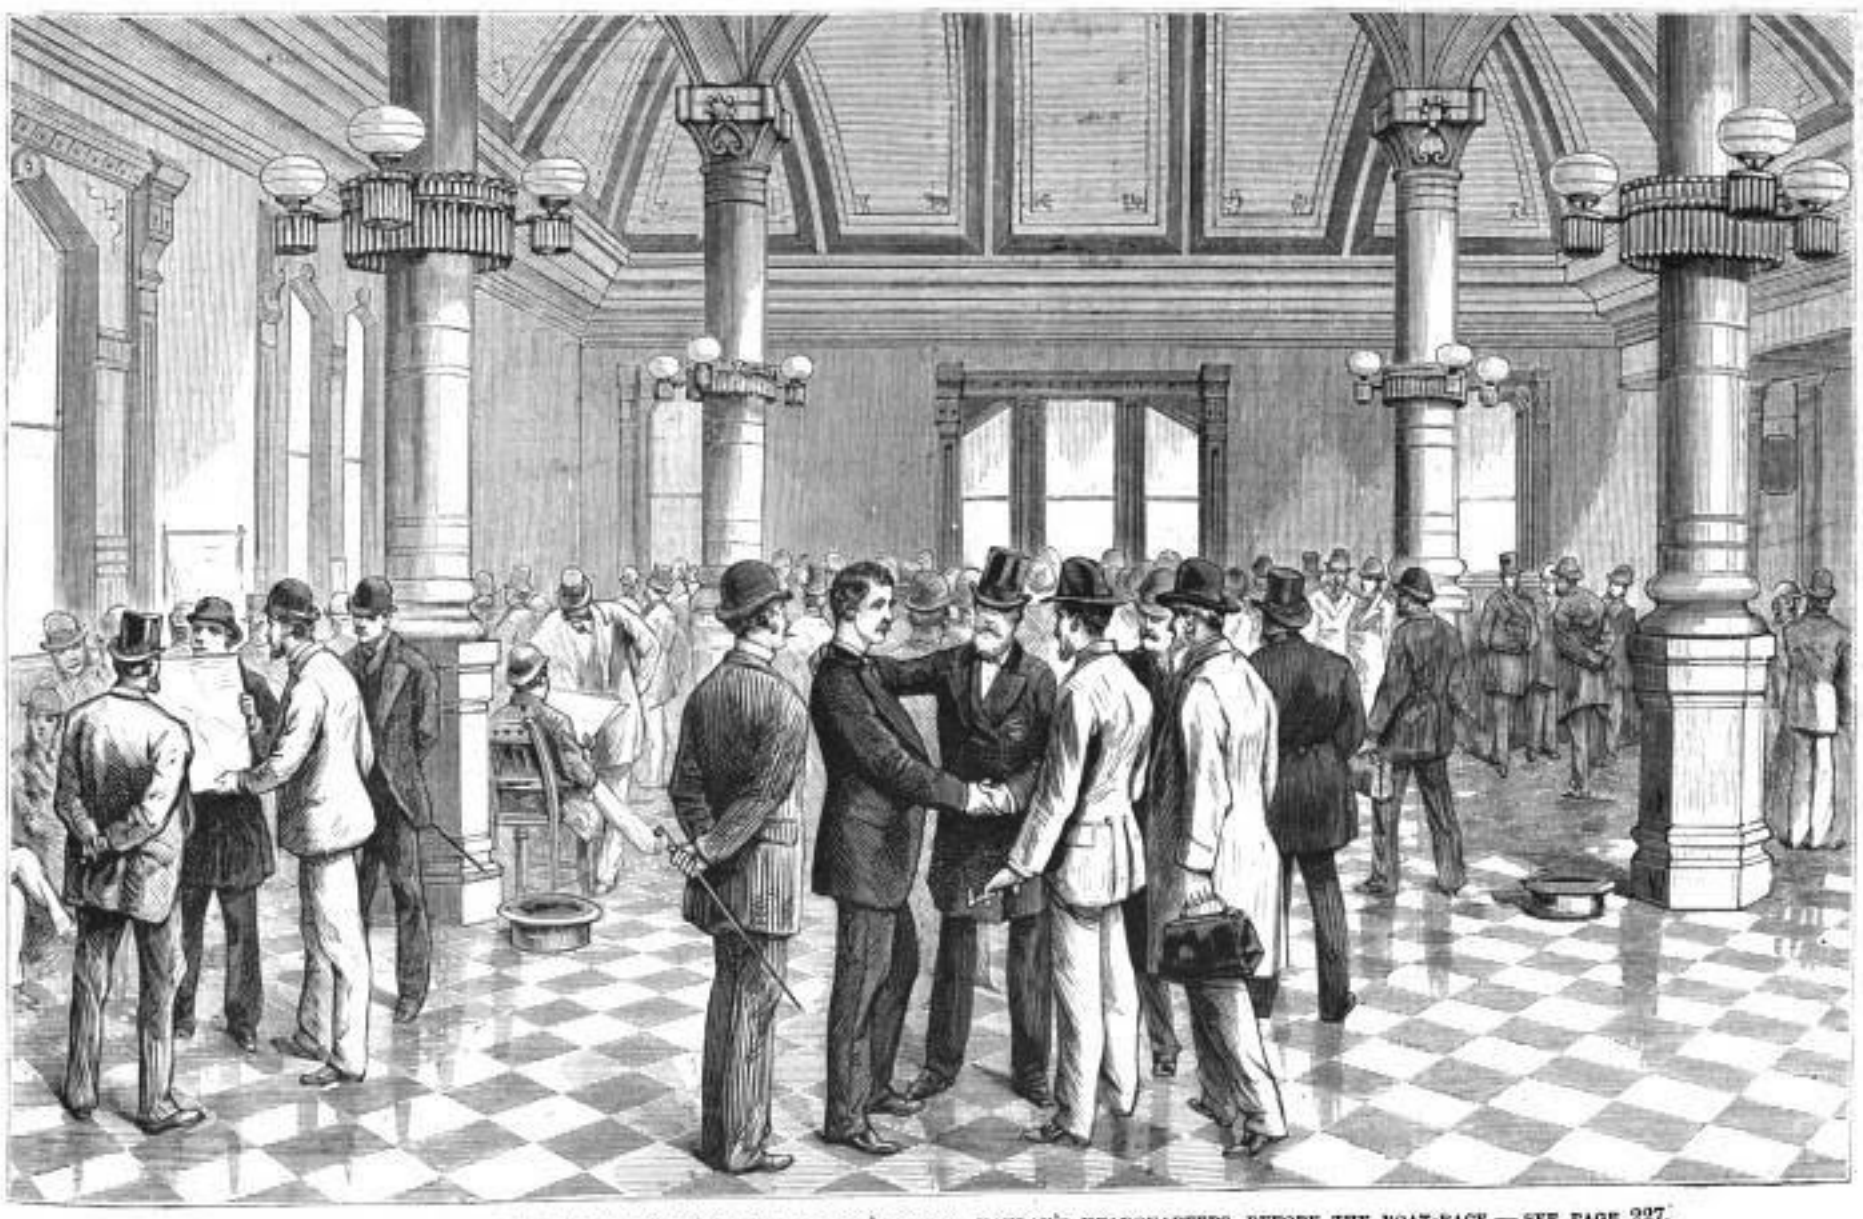
GENERAL JAMES LONGSTREET, NOMINATED FOR UNITED STATES MINISTER TO TURKEY.

HON. HENRY WATTERSON, EDITOR OF THE "COURIER-JOURNAL," LOUISVILLE, KY. SEE PAGE 227.



GENERAL JAMES LONGSTREET.

JAMES LONGSTREET, who was nominated on May 19th to be United States Minister to Turkey, in place of Hon. Horace Maynard, at the same time nominated to be Postmaster-General in succession to Hon. David M. Key, now a United States District Judge, is the well-known Lieutenant-General of the Confederate Army. He was born in South Carolina about 1820, but became a resident of Alabama while very young. In 1838 he was appointed a cadet from that State in the West Point Military Academy, whence he was graduated July 1st, 1842. Having been assigned to the infantry, he served on garrison duty and on the frontier in the South and in Texas, until the outbreak of the war with Mexico. He took part with distinction in the principal battles of that war, and was severely wounded in an assault upon a fortified convent at Chapultepec. For his gallantry in action he was successively brevetted as captain and major. After the Mexican war he was on frontier duty in Texas until 1858, having been promoted captain in 1852. In the former year he became paymaster, with the rank of major of staff, and served at Albuquerque, New Mexico.

At the opening of the rebellion in 1861, Longstreet cast his lot with the South, and was made a brigadier-general under Beauregard. After taking an active part in the first battle of Bull Run he was advanced to the rank of major-general. When the Confederates abandoned Yorktown, General Longstreet commanded the rear guard, and fought the battle of Williamsburg. His division did most of the fighting at Seven Pines in May, 1862, and later in the engagements at Cold Harbor and Frazier's Farm, losing 4,292 killed and wounded out of 10,000 men in the division. When the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia was formed into two corps, General Longstreet was given command of one, General Jackson commanding the other. The second battle of Bull Run was won through Longstreet's successful effort to join Jackson. After fighting at South Mountain, Antietam and Fredericksburg, Longstreet was detached for special duty in North Carolina, but was recalled after Chancellorville, and made lieutenant-general. A part of his corps fought at Gettysburg. At the battle of the Wilderness he was mistaken by his own men for a Union officer, and was severely wounded. On resuming service he was placed in command of the forces east of the James River, and took part in the final engagement at Petersburg which enabled Lee to escape from that city. General Longstreet was a member of the last council of war held by Lee in the woods, on the night of April 8th, 1865. General Longstreet is one of the very few Confederate generals who has thoroughly acquiesced in the results of the war, and was one of the first to avail himself of the proffered amnesty. He has been known for a number of years as a sincere and earnest Republican, but never intruded his political opinions upon his neighbors. He has served as Surveyor of the Port of New Orleans, and was one of the School Commissioners in 1874. During the war he was constantly exposing himself in a reckless manner, and became known as "the bull-dog."

NEWCASTLE AND ITS ATTRACTIONS.

AMONG the New England Summer resorts which are rapidly growing in popularity is Newcastle, in New Hampshire, which, in point of healthfulness and attractiveness of surroundings, may fairly be said to be entitled to the eminence it enjoys. A description of the place necessarily includes prominent reference to the attractive Summer hotel, the "Wentworth," which, built in 1875, and recently purchased by Hon. Frank Jones and Frank W. Hilton, of Portsmouth, has been subjected to so many improvements during the past year that it is now not only the largest Summer resort on the New England coast, but the most complete in all of its appointments. Situated seventy-five feet above the sea level, in decidedly the most romantic as well as healthful spot on the shores of the Atlantic, it affords more than ever a delightful Summer home for tourist as well as invalid. Every one of the rooms for 400 guests has a frontage—not a single apartment looking towards the rear—and all are thoroughly ventilated, high studded, and completely furnished in black walnut. A steam passenger elevator leaves no choice in the matter of location, accessibility being easily obtained to all apartments. In these respects, the "Wentworth" stands unequaled.

Other attractions of its interior, from which can be gained some idea of the resources of the hotel, are a dining-room, 140 by 45 feet; parlor, 42 by 80 feet; amusement hall, 42 by 65 feet, spacious corridors, reading, writing and toilet-rooms, billiards, bowling and all other accompaniments of a thoroughly first-class home. Steam heat is supplied in ample quantity for the corridors and all the public rooms, the internal arrangements being as nearly perfect as it is possible for skill and ingenuity, with the advantage of experience, to make them.

The enlargement of the "Wentworth" naturally brought with it an extension of facilities for amusement within as well as without doors. An orchestra of twenty first-class musicians will furnish morning and evening concerts, besides affording music for hops, theatrical performances, concerts, etc., in the amusement hall in the evening. The electric light is to be used from the verandas—which measure 800 feet in length—to illuminate the grounds and sea beyond: and every possible method of enjoyment will be brought into requisition.

The sea prospect from the veranda has nothing but the picturesque Isles of Shoals to obstruct the view between the New and Old England shores. From Massachusetts to Maine the twinkling beacons of half a dozen lighthouses can be plainly seen, extending from Thatcher's Island, off the extreme point of Cape Ann, along the shore of New Hampshire, to Cape Porpoise, on the Maine coast. The spectacle is limitless in its beauty. Sauntering to another side, charming landscape pictures are to be enjoyed. From the southwest stretch the shores of Rye and Hampton Beaches, shrouded in green foliage, through which run narrow roadways so canopied by trees that they seem in the Summer-heated days more like tunnels than New Hampshire turnpikes. At the north the aroma of fragrant pines just tempers the atmosphere which comes landwards from the historic "Old Strawberry Bank"—in modern parlance, Portsmouth. These views present a beautiful and most unique contrast. At no other Summer resort can there be witnessed, simultaneously, day dawn on the sea and on the land, gilding water and rocks on one side, and brightening and adorning lake, steeple, grove and shrub on the other.

On the north side is also a lagoon or inland pond of fifty acres, only 200 feet from the house, sheltered by trees, shallow and perfectly safe for ladies and children to indulge in aquatic sports. It is very easily reached from the hotel, and boats are always in readiness under the supervision of men of experience in such matters.

Towards the east by a winding way through beautiful grounds, abounding with bowers and rural retreats, ramblers on the three-mile road to Portsmouth pass through Newcastle, a quaint old town, full of curiosities for the careless as well as the scholarly tourist. Its houses are moss-grown, and the streets, narrow enough to be called lanes, are like pastures. Old Fort William and Mary, which, seventy-two years ago, was christened Fort Constitution, in its decadence frowns at Whaleback Light on one side and respectfully bows its head but snarls at Kittery Navy Yard on the other. Up and down the Piscataqua River views of surpassing delight are obtained, and no more pleasant hour can be spent than, lazily, upon the used-to-be ramparts of Fort Constitution.

Altogether, therefore, nowhere else on the coast has nature done so much for Summer wanderers as at Newcastle, N. H., and her work has been fittingly supplemented by Messrs. F. W. Hilton & Co. Telegraph and telephone, steam and sailing yachts, boats and boatmen for deep sea or off-shore fishing, bathing facilities, livery, etc., etc., are provided in abundance.

The "Wentworth" can be reached in two hours from Boston or Portland by the Eastern Railroad, and is only four hours' ride from the Fabyan or Twin Mountain Houses in the Ammonoosuc Valley, through the grand White Mountain Notch, North Conway and the beautiful valley of the Saco.

The Victoria Docks in London.

SOMEWHERE about 3,000 workmen, 600 or 700 wagons, 17 or 18 locomotive engines, 3 steam "navvies" and a great quantity of minor machinery of various kinds have been engaged since 1875 at the southeast end of London in a work compared with which the building of the pyramids—with modern appliances—would have been no very signal feat. Hitherto the one entrance to the Victoria Docks from the Thames had been at Blackwall Point, but now there is a dock capable of receiving all vessels, no matter what they may be. Three and a half miles of walls have been built, inclosing ninety acres of water. These "walls" are 40 feet high, 5 feet thick at the top, and 18 feet to 19 feet thick at the bottom, the whole of this enormous mass being composed of solid concrete, for which 80,000 tons of Portland cement have been used. Some 4,000,000 cubic feet of earth have been dug out. It may assist the imagination somewhat to state that if it were filled into ordinary carts the vehicles would form an unbroken line 7,000 miles long. The excavations have gone through a submerged forest, and among other curiosities dug out have been a reindeer's horn, a Roman vase, and what is supposed to be an ancient British canoe carved out of solid oak. The latter is now in the British Museum. The new entrance below Woolwich will save about 5¼ miles of river navigation, which, in the case of vessels of heavy draught, is of course a matter of very great importance. The London and St. Katharine's and Victoria Docks Company are now prepared for vessels of all kinds, not excluding the largest ironclads of the British navy. The cost has been estimated roundly at £1,000,000. It is expected that all will be in readiness for the admission of the water about the end of May. The docks will take about a fortnight to fill, and the ceremonial opening will be celebrated some time early in June.

A PLEASANT BOOK.

"MRS. BEAUCHAMP BROWN," the last of the "No Name Series" of American novels, issued by Roberts Brothers, is one of the best and most enjoyable so far published. The story is exquisitely told, and there are bits of dialogue and description which would do no discredit to any of the masters of fiction. Some of the characters—notably of Mrs. Beauchamp Brown, Margaret, Castilla, Rochfort and Paul—are drawn with a vigor and clearness which give them a strikingly distinctive individuality; they stand out, indeed, in the story like the central figures in a picture, full of rare and beautiful effects. The heroine of the story, the scene of which is mainly laid on a breezy island off the coast of Maine, is a typical society-woman of Beacon Street—one who, after playing for years the part of a soulless coquette, ravaging men's hearts with cruel indifference of consequences, and repeatedly, in her lust for conquest, exposing her reputation to suspicion, is herself caught in the meshes of a genuine affection for a strong and lordly nature. How contact with that nature finally purifies her own; how she comes to comprehend the worthlessness and waste of the old life; and how she is led, step by step, up "the radiant stairs of Love" to the shining heights of Duty and Content—all this is told so enchantingly as to hold the attention closely to the very end. The worldliness of the genuine votaries of fashion has seldom been more strikingly portrayed than in this little volume, whose author certainly must have had more than a passing glimpse of the sort of life she describes. The book, too, deals with some religious problems in a most effective way, dealing telling blows at certain conspicuous shams as to doctrine and system, which strut in gilt and feathers in only too many fashionable churches. In every way the volume is fresh, bracing and uplifting, and there can be no doubt that it will command a wide circle of delighted readers.

BANKERS—National Park Bank.

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines, the Louis and the Baden Baden, covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

THE AUSTRIAN ROYAL MARRIAGE.—THE ARCHDUKE RUDOLF.

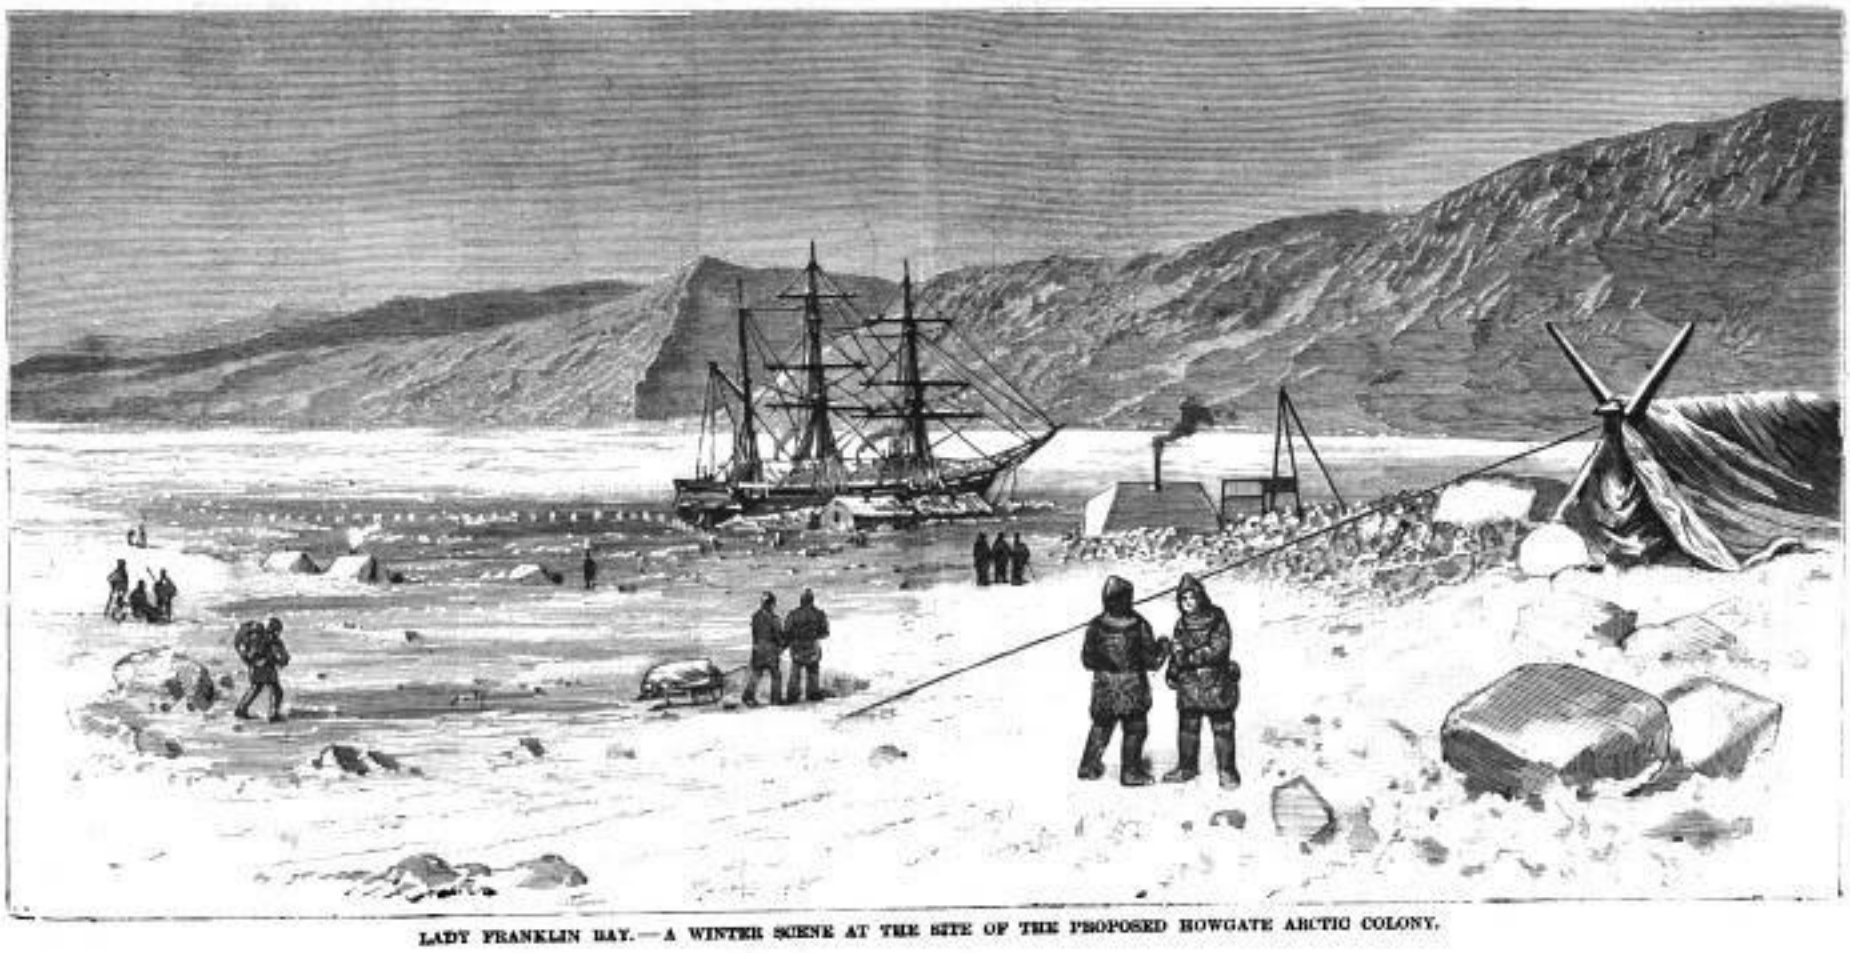
THE AUSTRIAN ROYAL MARRIAGE.—THE PRINCESS STEPHANIE OF BELGIUM.

THE AUSTRIAN ROYAL WEDDING.

FEW even amongst royal betrothals have been hailed with such complete satisfaction by the countries to which the two betrothed respectively belong as that of the Archduke Rudolf, the heir to the Austrian Empire, with the Princess Stéphanie, second daughter of the King and Queen of the Belgians. This is especially the case in Austro-Hungary, where for some time past there has been much speculation respecting the choice of a wife that Prince Rudolf would sooner or later have to make, though the fact of the selection being practically confined to reigning Catholic houses somewhat narrowed the field for conjecture. The Princess Stéphanie, however, is singularly acceptable to Austro-Hungarians, owing to the fact that she is a granddaughter of the late Archduke Joseph, for more than half a century the Palatine of Hungary, and whose memory is warmly cherished throughout that kingdom. In Belgium also the betrothal is eminently popular.

The Archduke Rudolf is the only son of the Emperor and Empress of Austria, and is twenty-one years of age, having been born on August 21st, 1858. Great care and pains have been bestowed upon his education, and antiquated traditions and rules have been broken through so as to develop as far as possible that sound judgment and intellect which is so necessary to one destined to rule a great empire. The result is said to be eminently successful, and those who have had opportunities of knowing the Prince intimately find that in spite of his youth he possesses a rare quickness of understanding and independence of judgment and character. These good qualities have strengthened the attachment the people of the Empire bear towards him as their sovereign's son. The Prince has, of course, gone through the military curriculum considered so necessary to all princes of a European Empire, and, as a rule, he resides with his regiment at Prague, where, it is said, he intends to make his home after his marriage.

The Princess Stéphanie is the second daughter of the King and Queen of the Belgians, and is only sixteen, having been born on May 21st, 1864. Owing to her extreme youth, the Princess never appeared, previous to her betrothal, at any state festivities, and has only been seen in public driving with the Queen, and once at a representation at a circus, this strict domestic education being carried out with the junior members of the Belgium Royal family. The Princess is said to be as tall as her mother, with golden hair and blue eyes, and bearing in general a striking resemblance to the Orleans family. She has been very highly educated, particularly in the classics, and of late the King has been instructing her in political matters.



HOUSE BUILT IN SECTIONS FOR THE HOWGATE COLONISTS.

HOWGATE'S ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

OF the many scientific expeditions sent out towards the North Pole within the last century or so—from the time of Captain John Constantine Phipps downwards—that of Captain H. W. Howgate, which is soon to sail, seems to promise the best results. Captain Howgate has been wise enough to accept the fact that ships cannot be forced beyond the 84th parallel of north latitude, and to frame his plans accordingly. He intends simply to pass as far north as is compatible with a safe return in the present season, and to found at the highest point reached an observatory which will also be a base of supplies for sledge expeditions northward.

The expedition will be made in the steamer Gulnare, purchased by Captain Howgate for the purpose. She is 247 tons in measurement; 137 7-12 feet in length; 21 8-12 feet beam; 11 1-12 feet depth of hold; half-brig rigged; furnished with a pair of compound engines, and was built in Glasgow, April, 1878. The hull is of oak planking over an iron frame, and the vessel has been especially fitted for the hazards of exploration in the Arctic seas. On the sides above the water-line are placed wedge-shaped timbers, calculated to ease the vessel up in a pinch of ice. Every available inch of room in the vessel will be packed with supplies and men. The Navy Department is to man the vessel, and the War Department is to furnish recruits who are to be stationed at the proposed post.

The expedition, which will consist of about twenty-five persons, including a corps of scientific observers, is expected to sail within a fortnight, and, after touching at various points on the coast of Labrador and Greenland, it is intended to proceed to the west coast of Smith's Sound at latitude 81 deg. 40 min., where the first permanent depot for supplies will be made. Landing the men and supplies, the vessel will return in the Fall. Captain Howgate's plan of reaching the Pole, as already intimated, is by a system of slow but continuous advances, made in several successive seasons, pushing his camps further and further northward as rapidly as may be found practicable, establishing a sure basis of supplies, and replacing with fresh recruits each year men who may become disabled or disheartened. The expedition will not be forced to return as far south as Newfoundland for coal supplies, but will probably avail itself of the "Eureka" coal mine, discovered and worked by one of the officers and a detail of men from the United States steamer Juniata, when attached to the Polaris Search Expedition in 1873. This mine is on the Island of Disco, about ninety miles distant from Godhaven, in the Waigat Straits. It was readily worked, and proved to be an excellent quality of bituminous coal. A portable house, built of heavy timber and joined by sections, will be carried out to be used as a depot.

The expedition commends itself to all thoughtful people on the ground that it aims to accomplish nothing more than is plainly possible. Even if the sledge parties are not successful in getting beyond the hitherto impassable 84th deg., it is certain that a large store of useful information will be secured as to the most effective provisions and methods for traveling by land in these high latitudes; and information of this sort is precisely what is most required if the mystery of the Pole ever is to be solved.

NEW MASONIC HALL AT KOOLANGSEE, CHINA.

SOME of our readers may possibly be ignorant of the situation, if not of the very existence, of Koolangsee. It is a small island in the harbor of Amoy, one of five ports thrown open to trade by the Treaty of Nanking in 1842, and is now chiefly occupied by the private residences of the various officials, merchants and missionaries, who make up the total foreign community, all business being transacted upon the other side of the water in close proximity to the native city of Amoy. Our illustration, taken from a photograph by Mr. St. J. H. Edwards, of the American Consulate, shows the new Masonic Hall, recently erected to accommodate the members of the Ionic and Corinthian lodges. It was designed by Mr. W. Danby, of Hongkong, and contains a spacious hall of 50 feet in length by 25 in breadth.

The officers for the present year are as follows:

IONIC.—Worshipful Master, Herbert A. Giles, District Grand Senior Warden, Hongkong; First Past Master, T. D. Boyd, Past District Grand Junior Deacon; Senior Warden, Randall H. Pyo; Junior Warden, J. J. Henningsen; Treasurer, A. W. Bain, District Grand A. Director of Ceremonies; Secretary, T. G. Harkness; Senior Deacon, James Bruce; Junior Deacon, Captain A. J. Booth; Organist, Oct. Johnson; Steward, N. Moalle; Inner Guard, De Westley Layton; Tyler, C. Killeen.

CORINTHIAN.—Worshipful Master, W. C. Howard, District Grand Junior Deacon; First Past Master, A. Leigh, Past District Grand Director of Ceremonies; Senior Warden, A. W. Bain; Junior Warden, J. Grafton Cass; Treasurer, H. A. Sidford, P. M.; Secretary, F. McQuire; Senior Deacon, B. Nicholls; Junior Deacon, A. Liddell; Director of Ceremonies, C. O. Kopp; Organist, Oct. Johnson; Steward, W. Wilson; Inner Guard, J. Meany; Tyler, C. Killeen.

A NEW HOME FOR POOR BOYS.

THE East Side Boys' Lodging-house and Industrial School, on the corner of East Broadway and Gouverneur Street, was formally opened on Thursday, May 20th, by the Children's Aid Society, to which it belongs. This building has been erected as a substitute for the lodging-house the Society has maintained in Rivington Street for twelve years. The house is old and rickety, and has become too small to accommodate all who seek shelter and food within it. Another reason for abandoning it is the fact that within three or four years fifteen tenement-houses have been erected in its vicinity, and the atmosphere has become impregnated with pernicious gases, inducing malarial fevers among the boys.

Friends of the Society were fortunate enough to obtain for its work the sympathy of Miss Catherine L. Wolfe, of New York City, who contributed $40,000 for the construction of the new building. The Society purchased the site for $24,000. This sum was partly obtained from subscriptions and partly taken from the funds of the Society. The edifice is of Gothic architecture, is built in the most substantial manner, and is five stories high. It will be capable of accommodating 300 boys comfortably. It is 65 feet in length by 40 feet in width, and is built of Philadelphia pressed bricks with Nova Scotia stone trimmings, and an iron roof and staircases. In the basement story is a gymnasium, a boiler-room, water-closets, and a warm room for forcing house-plants and nourishing them until they can be placed in a conservatory on one of the upper floors. When these plants have attained a proper growth they are distributed among the poor. During the past year this Society cultivated and distributed about 25,000 plants. It also distributed 85,000 bouquets, which were sent to it from various parts of this State. A steam wash-room and drying-room, and a bath-room are also on this basement floor. On the first floor is the dining-room, 65 by 40 feet. This room will be used during the day as an infant-class room. Opening out of it is a sick-mission room, in which are to be kept, for indigent children, supplies which will be issued on prescriptions from physicians. The second floor is taken up with an audience-room and a conservatory. The audience-room will seat comfortably 450 people. In it are two platforms, one at each end. Here the names of the boys will be taken every night as they enter to receive checks entitling them to lodgings and meals. A savings bank will be opened for them in this room, and each regular lodger will be allotted one of a number of small closets, built in the room, the key to which he may keep, and in which he can put whatever personal property he has. This room is divided by folding-doors, and will be used as two school-rooms during the day. In the evening it will be a sitting-room, library, and reading-room. The dormitories are on the third and fourth floors. The sum of six cents will be charged for a night's lodging in cases where the boys have the money. When they are destitute they will be fed and lodged free. In order to cultivate a spirit of pride and emulation among the boys, a part of each dormitory is to be provided with single beds and superior accommodations, for which the sum of ten cents will be charged.

THE MERCHANTS' POLICE.

EARLY on the morning of May 17th a boat, with five men on board, rowed silently over Flushing bay towards the schooner Victor, lying at anchor off College Point. Four of the men climbed up its sides and walked towards the cabin, while the fifth remained in the boat. The schooner's crew were asleep in their bunks. Williams, the mate, was roused by the trampling of feet overhead. Believing the visitors to be pirates, he sprang from his berth and ran to meet them, seizing as he did so his own and shipmate's pistol lying near. As he sprang upon the deck he saw the four men standing at the companionway. He shouted to them, leveling both pistols as he spoke. In reply three pistol bullets whistled past his head. The mate discharged both his weapons at the men and ran forward to grapple with the thieves. They retreated, firing as they went, but doing no harm. The sailor, who made a dash at them as they sprang into their boat, reached the side of the vessel just in time to see the boat upset and hear a cry of "Save me! I am drowning." The crew and mate, Williams, lowered the ship's boat and rowed out to where the forms of three men could be seen clinging to the gunwales of the boat. They were taken off one by one and securely bound hand and foot, and were laid on the deck of the Victor. Three hours later the watch on board the schooner Eliza and Rebecca, lying at anchor in the bay half a mile from the Victor, reported a boat adrift with a man clinging to it, and Captain Price at once rowed out after him. He found a young man, hatless and almost exhausted, clinging to the side of the skiff, which was on its keel, but full of water. Near by a hat was picked up, but much too large for the man. He was taken on board the Fiste and lashed to the other three. They admitted that there had been five of them, and that one of them had either lost his grip on the boat and been drowned, or been shot dead.

On the following day the men were arraigned, tried, convicted and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment each, the mate of the schooner receiving the thanks of the Court for his prompt and courageous defense and capture.

Thirty years ago the docks of this city swarmed with thieves of every grade, from the murderous pirate to the young children who supported drunken parents by their pilferings. The ship-owners were at their wits' ends to protect themselves, and watchmen without number were employed to patrol the wharves and arrest suspicious characters; but the ranks of the petty thieves increased rather than diminished. Early in the year 1850 a small, wiry man, who had gone into the watching service independently, attracted the attention of some of the prominent ship-owners by his vigilance, courage and energy. He was a terror to the small fry, and hated by the experts of the thieving fraternity. His name was Pierre D. Van Riesen, the founder of the Merchants' Police Service, an organization at the present day numbering 100 trained men, who are detailed to watch the docks and the shipping.

The organization was formed in June, 1850, and at once received the patronage and co-operation of such old firms as A. A. Low & Co., Grinnell, Minturn & Co., Charles H. Marshall & Co., and others. Their object was to concentrate the watch system into one firm, who would employ trustworthy men, be responsible for all property left in their charge, and who would make good all losses. The firm as then organized grew in importance until the present day, when it is recognized by ship-owners and captains as well systematized and trustworthy in every respect.

At one time dock thieves were about as plentiful as rats, and a thousand times more destructive and dangerous. They were of every grade, and worked their schemes in every conceivable manner; but the hardest of the lot, and the worst to contend with, were the women. In those days, twenty years ago, the women worked what was known as the "molasses racket." A crowd of them, provided with pails and other vessels, would surround a hogshead of syrup, and, watching their opportunity, would remove the bung, tilt the hogshead and fill their pails. The operation would be repeated until their vessels were filled. Another class were known as "borers," who confined their operations to rice, coffee and goods of that description.

They would locate the docks wherever such property was stored, row under them at night, and with an auger bore holes through the dock into the sacks containing the booty. Another favorite scheme of these boatmen was to row alongside of a dock where cotton, wool or other bale goods was stowed; throw up a grapnel, a five-pronged hook, making fast to a bale, which they would tow to their dens. Property of this nature, after being stripped of its coverings, could never be identified, and captures of it were sure to be the harvest for the thieves.

Since Mr. Van Riesen has been in the business he has captured and helped to convict 3,000 thieves, noted and otherwise, and during the time twelve of the men have been killed while in the discharge of their duties.

UNITED STATES PATENT-OFFICE.

THE destruction, in September, 1877, of two of the four model-halls of the Patent Office Building, in Washington, together with their valuable contents, was justly regarded as a public calamity. The Government, however, has been prompt to repair, so far as possible, the mischief done, by adopting the plans of Messrs. Cluss & Schulze, architects, under whose superintendence the work has been practically completed. In the construction of the building absolute fireproof work is believed to have been secured. To obviate the injurious effects of expansion and contraction, experienced with metal roofs of wide span, during the high temperature of a conflagration, the halls have been arranged for a centre nave and two aisles, by two rows of solid piers which are carried up for support of the roofs. These piers are spaced transversely, as well as longitudinally, to suit the points d'appui in the lower stories, and are built of bonded brick-work laid in Portland cement, as the most suitable material for fireproof construction. They form a prominent part in a marked style, the outgrowth of a modern system of construction. The piers are tied, in pairs, by fireproof wrought iron girders stretched across the centre nave; these are surmounted by decorated gables which subdivide the inner skylights rhythmically into compartments, and establish a counterpoise to the pressure exerted on the centre by the inclined planes of the roofs over the aisles. The wide spaces between the piers of each row are subdivided by double-wrought and cast-iron columns, with intermediate fireproof filling; these support the galleries which are constructed of rolled-iron beams with ceilings formed of hollow, fireproof blocks, and floors of huge slabs of slate. In order to retain the entire space between the saddle piers and outside walls for the fireproof model-cases, balconies, or baskets, were designed on the first gallery, which project into the centre nave. By this means the comparatively great height of the centre nave is subdued, and brought in sympathy with the lower masses by its sides. The outlines of these balconies are arranged so as to break the formal monotony of the almost endless repetition of straight architectural lines by the contrast of graceful curves in floors and balustrades.

The interior architecture of the model-rooms is in modern Renaissance, a style which admits of doing full justice to all that is essential for the future occupation of the building, without requiring any concessions to the classical traditions of which this style is an organic reproduction. In the details all unnecessary decoration has been avoided, and a severe but pleasing dignity secured by well-proportioned old masses, superior material, harmony and chaste contrast of colors.

The floors of the centre naves and communicating passages are laid with marble tiles, in panels of white and black, within borders of red and French gray. The ceilings of the galleries are plain, since the model-cases abut against them, and all the spaces between the cases are again relieved by the light wells.

Style is imparted to the piers along both sides of the centre nave by facings of marble cement. Substantial pilasters with raised work are formed of Egyptian and Vert antique marble under the first gallery. Upon the floor of the first gallery a tier of lighter and more elaborate pilasters is raised with pedestals of Vert antique, fluted shafts of polished Sienna marble, and capitals with superincumbent consoles of milk-white (Parian) marble, the effect of which is enhanced by a moderate amount of gilding for the prominent parts. The superior merits of Keene's cement have induced an extensive use of it for plastering and floors under the model-cases.

The ceilings of the halls rest upon coved cornices, and mark the rafter construction of the roof by sunk compartments between molded styles. The whole architecture of the halls, with the exception of the prominent features in polished and plain marble, is kept in gray; the ceilings in shades of cold gray, the side walls and plain parts of piers in greenish grays, and the architecture of windows, doors and galleries in warm grays, all with sparse applications of gold. The balustrades around the galleries on the sides and ends of the lofty middle naves, as well as the railings of the numerous well-holes and stairs, are bronze. The outside window-sash—the only wood in the halls—is of mahogany. It is characteristic of this public work that no carpenter was on the pay-rolls, nor was any carpenters' work furnished under contract up to the time of hanging the sash.

The funds appropriated for this reconstruction amounted to $348,300. Nearly 1,100 tons of iron have been consumed. It required twenty-two tons of copper to cover the roofs; the skylights require about 21,000 square feet of hammered or fluted heavy glass. The galleries are floored with 40,000 square feet of rubbed slate-slabs, and the main floor with 33,000 square feet of rubbed slate-slabs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—THE RECONSTRUCTED UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON.

JAPANESE SINGING GIRLS.

AMONG the queer callings in Japan is that of the "Geysha," or singing and dancing-girl. Geyshas may be hired at a few minutes' notice in all the great towns of the empire. As a rule they are comely, modest damsels, although in obedience to the refined taste of a certain class of foreigners, a school possessing as little of one quality as of the other has sprung up. To the ceremonial feasts of rich men singing and dancing girls are the invariable appendages, and are not unfrequently treated rather as guests than as hired servants. As a rule they perform in pairs; one playing the guitar while the other sings or dances, but quartets and choruses may be had for payment. It is never etiquette to treat them as professionals; the hint for performing should be given incidentally, and on no account is the payment for their services to be made openly, but is to be pushed under their rice-bowl in a piece of paper, so that it is discovered as it were by accident. With the Geyshas proper often come the dancing-girls so-called, although "posturers" would be a more correct expression, inasmuch as Japanese dancing consists entirely of a series of graceful ankle-and-hand-twisting positions, quite independent of any musical accompaniment. Good singing and dancing girls earn large sums of money, and famous ones must be booked beforehand; but in their performances, whether of singing or posturing, there is very little to charm the European sense, and a very few minutes suffices to render the performance a bore.

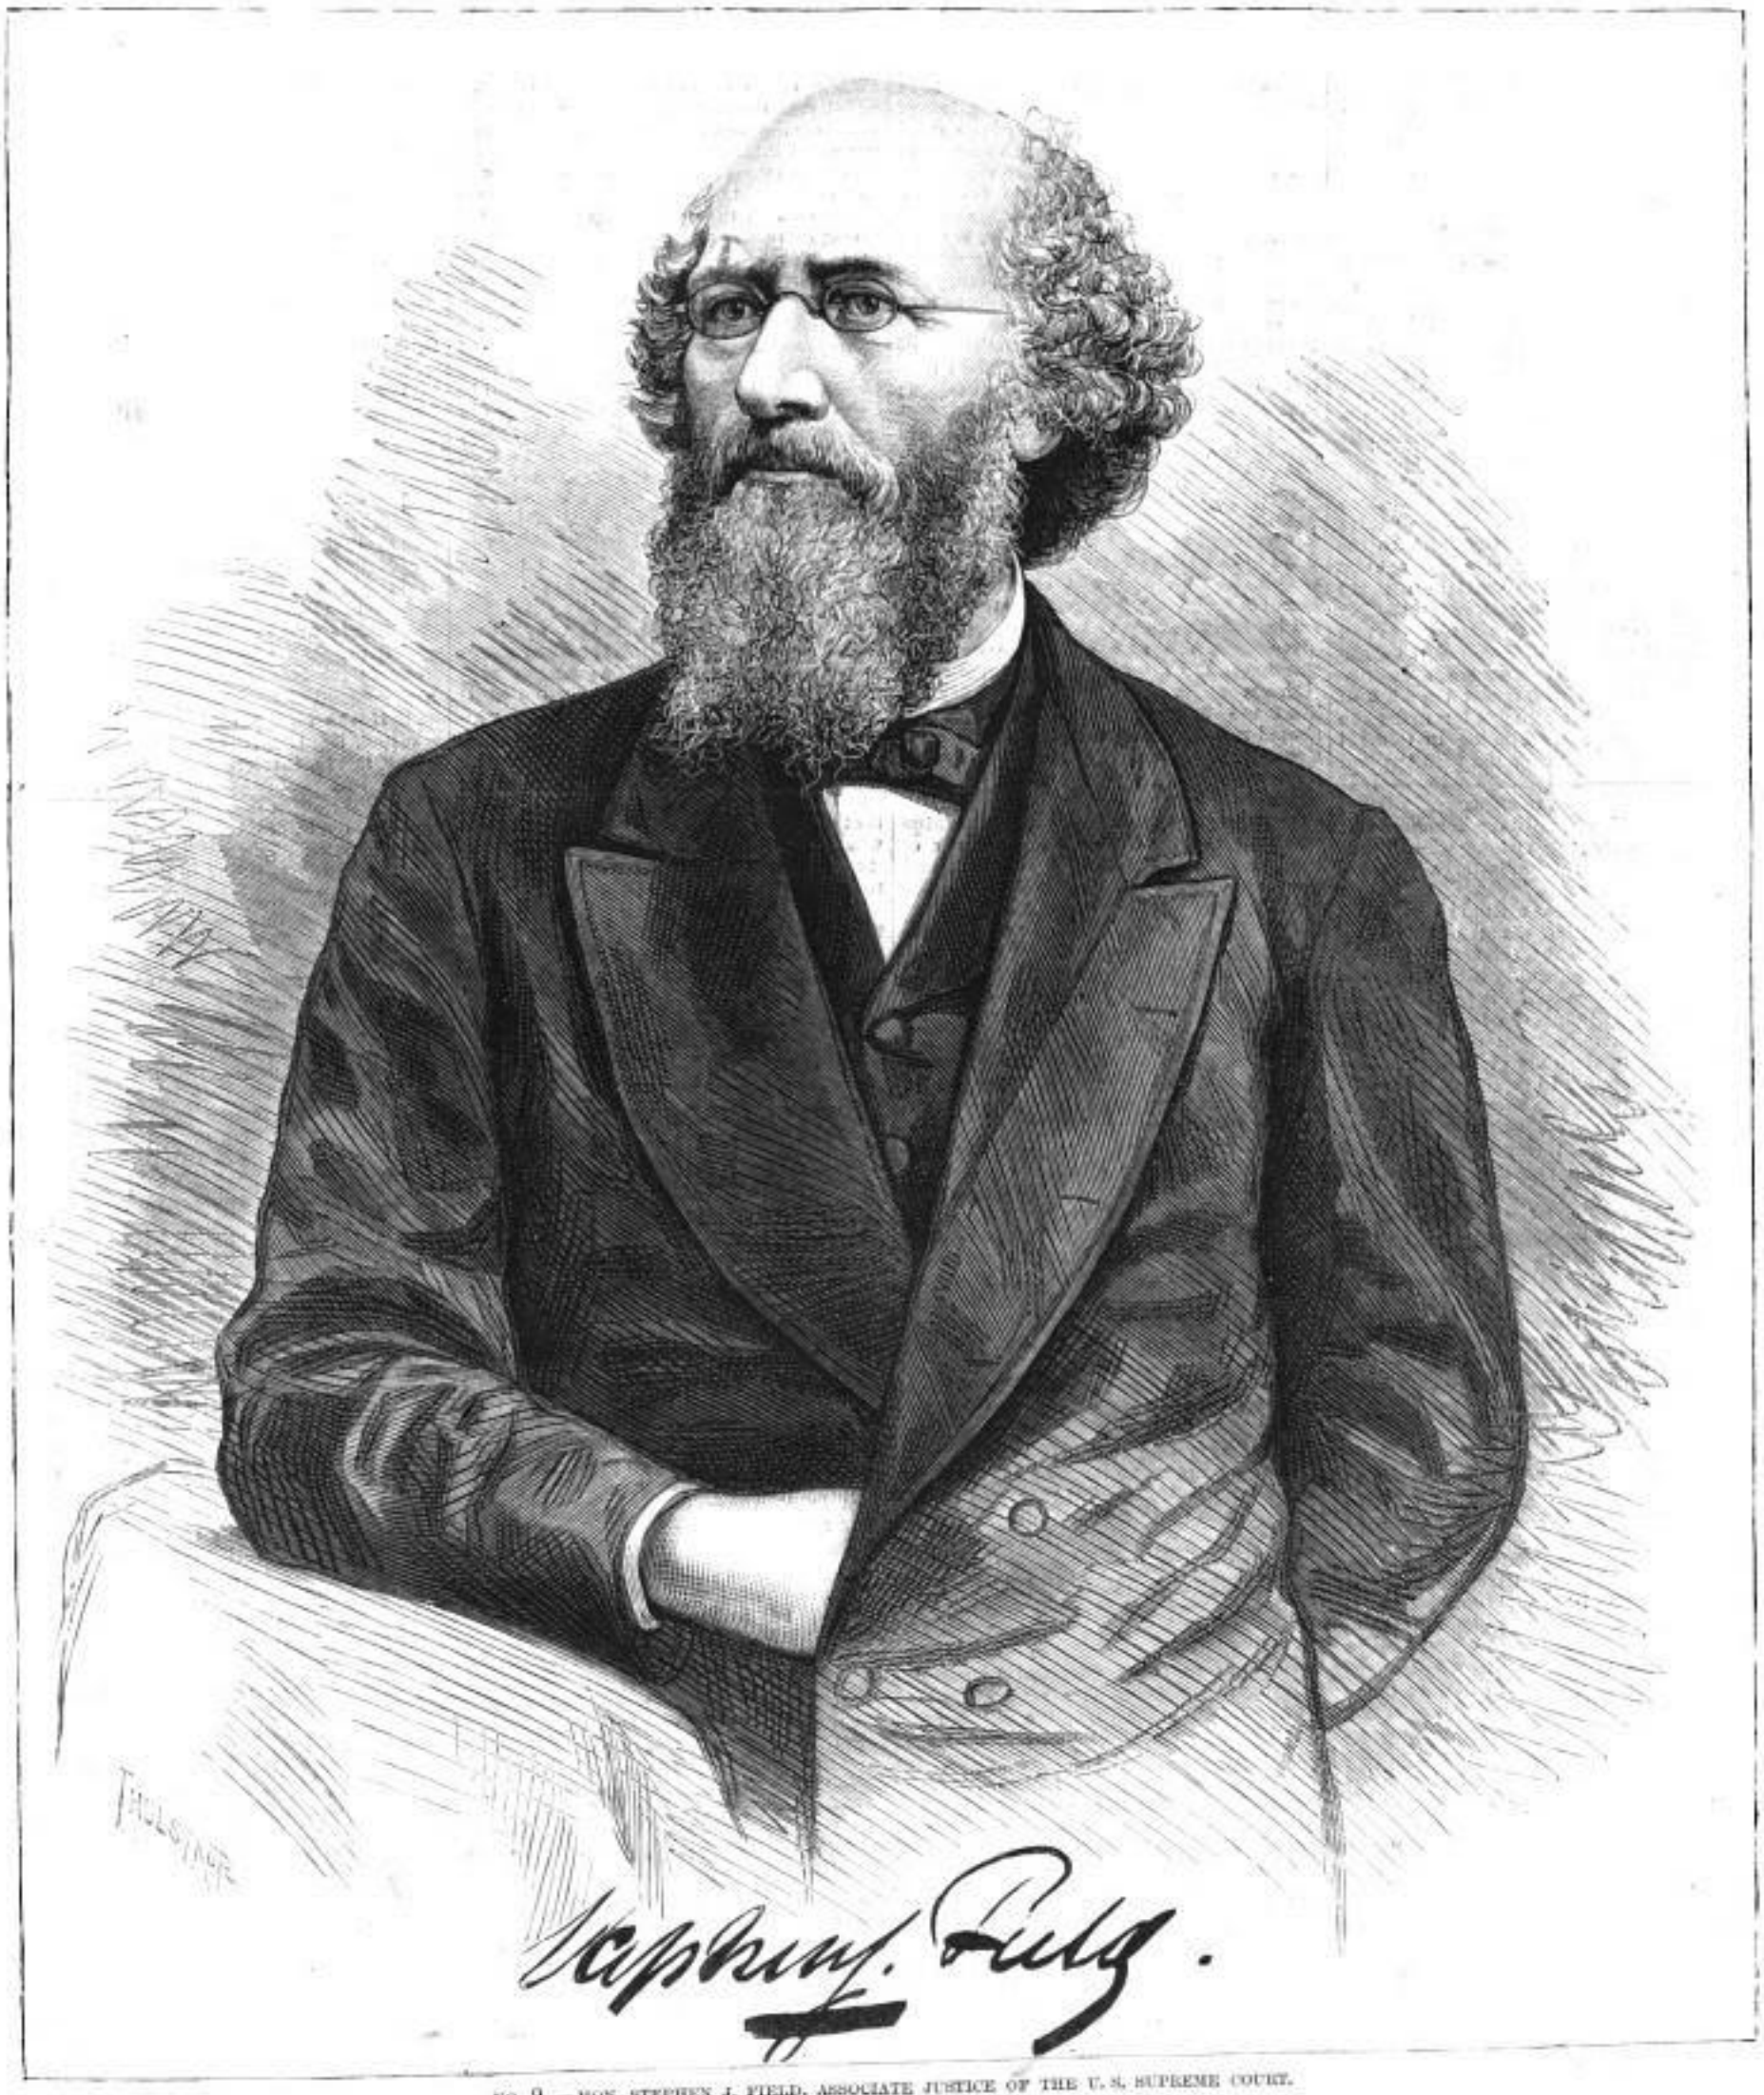
THE COTTON-SPINNING INDUSTRY.

THE cotton-spinning industry, one of the great industries of the world, is continually increasing, especially in this country. The total number of spindles on the globe is, according to the latest returns, 71,250,000, of which Britain has 39,500,000. Switzerland has, contrary to general opinion, more spindles, proportionately to its population, than any other Continental State, ranking in Europe immediately after England. The United States have 10,050,000 spindles; France has 5,000,000; Germany, 4,800,000; Russia, 2,800,000; Switzerland, 1,870,000; Austria, 1,800,000; Spain, 1,775,000; Italy, 900,000; Belgium, 800,000; India, 1,275,000; Sweden and Norway, 310,000; Holland, 220,000; Greece, 36,000, and other countries (including Denmark and Portugal), 44,000 spindles. Britain has, to every 1,000 of its inhabitants, 1,180 spindles; Switzerland, 675; United States, 218; France, 135; Germany, 108; Spain, 103; Holland, 87; Sweden and Norway, 68; Austria, 42; Russia, 30; Italy, 29. Fall River is by large odds the greatest cotton spinning centre in the Republic. It now has 1,364,191 spindles and 32,621 looms; uses 162,475 bales of cotton annually, and manufactures every year about 400,000,000 yards of cloth. All of its fifty mills are now very prosperous, and producing each week 150,000 pieces of printing-cloths, not to speak of sheetings, silesias, white fine goods, fancy cottons, etc. Their operatives number near 16,000, and the weekly pay-roll reaches some $400,000. The corporations have suffered much from dull times, dishonest treasurers, and other causes; but they have come bravely out of their troubles, and their future looks radiant.

A NEW ELECTRIC WONDER.

A FRENCH engineer named Parodi claims to have discovered a method of conveying large quantities of electricity over long distances and distributing it at any number of points on the way, exactly like gas or water. Electricity of sufficient tension is produced in the ordinary manner, but instead of transmitting it by the usual wires or cables, it is conveyed through immense continuous truncated pipes, having the same qualities as Leyden jars. The tension is uniform throughout, and it is thus possible to divert the fluid as may be required at different points for various industrial purposes. The invention dispenses with steam-engines. Steam may be replaced by waterfalls, and great economy in the production of electricity is effected. The inventor believes that Niagara might be utilized and electricity transmitted from the Horse Shoe Falls to New York or Boston.

MOVEMENTS OF JUPITER.



JUPITER is morning star, and by far the most important object for observation among the planets during this month. It cannot be too strongly impressed upon the minds of students of the stars, that the four great planets are all approaching their perihelia, and bring about a condition of planetary affairs that has not occurred for 2,000 years. Jupiter reaches the goal first, arriving at perihelion on the 28th of September. Such is the eccentricity of his orbit that he will then be 46,000,000 of miles, or about half of the whole distance of the earth from the sun, nearer to the great central fire than when furthest away. He is also at that time almost at his nearest point to the earth, coming into opposition with the sun eleven days after perihelion. The earth is then directly between him and the sun; but the earth is furthest from the sun in July, and will be at considerably more than her mean distance in September, when Jupiter is 46,000,000 miles nearer. It may be easily seen that when at opposition the earth is at or near her greatest distance, and Jupiter at his least distance, from the sun, the two planets will be almost as near together as they can be. Such will be the case next October, and the giant of the system will soon give evidence of the fact in his increasing size and brilliancy, being brighter than he has been for nearly twelve years. The difference will not be so marked as in the case of Mars under the same conditions, for nearly 400,000,000 miles of space intervene between the earth and the huge planet even when nearest. Jupiter, therefore, will be a source of intense interest during the coming months as he approaches and recedes from his perihelion and opposition. The great problem of the effect of his approach upon the mysterious spot-period of the sun will be first in importance. Many astronomers scout the idea of such an influence. Many more find nothing improbable in the theory that the approach of a huge mass to the sun should produce disturbance in his blazing elements, evidently in commotion from some cause, while the near correspondence in time between the maximum of the spot-period and the revolution of Jupiter favors the argument. No one doubts that the disturbed condition of the sun will be reflected on the earth in waves of intense heat, severe storms, and auroral displays, or that the same influence will be felt in the same way to the system's remotest bounds. Gigantic Jupiter, as his mighty mass plunges towards the sun, gives evidences of mighty forces at work among the chaotic elements of his cloud-surface. A spot has been seen on his disk for nearly a year, elliptical in form, red in color, and with a diameter of 20,000 miles. No observer understands the cause of this huge rift. It may be an opening in the cloud atmosphere disclosing the more solid matter beneath, and it may be something beyond human ken. About the 22d, it is hoped that the planet will be again in favorable position for the observation of the red spot, and patient investigators will not be wanting to make the best of the opportunity. This beautiful planet may now be seen in the eastern sky, serenely unconscious of the excitement induced by his movements, rising at 3:45; at the end of a month he rises at 2 o'clock, nearly two hours and a half before the sun.

TRUE POLITICAL JOURNALISM.

OUR enterprising contemporary, the New York Herald, announces that it will no longer oppose the third-term candidature of General Grant. Having been, four years ago, the foremost American journal to lift up its voice against the "third term" as a portent of "Cæsarism," and, during the present preliminary canvass for the Republican nomination, having earnestly warned the Republican Party and the country against the perils of such a step, it declares, since the Republican Convention of Illinois has pronounced for the "third term," that it will bow henceforth to the decree of destiny and kick no longer against the pricks. It believes that the drift of Republican sentiment is setting irresistibly towards the ex-President's nomination; and arguing that his nomination will be followed by his probable election, the Herald has already begun to forecast the kind of Administration we may hope for under the third term auspices. Finding in General Grant some traits in common with General Washington, our contemporary hopes that the military savior of the country, in being honored above its military founder, will seek to emulate the virtues which have heretofore given to the latter a peerless fame.

In taking this new attitude the Herald repels the supposition that it is practicing anything like political tergiversation. It is simply acting in conformity with the theory of public journalism which it prescribes for its conduct. It likens the function of the journalist to the function of the photographer. It is the duty of the former, as of the latter, simply to represent the forms and phases of things as they appear for the time being, without seeking to alter, to amend, or to color them. The folio of a wide-awake journal presents itself to the eye of our versatile confrère as a vast sensitized plate, on which "the age and body of the time" are to be depicted in daily editions, each complete in itself, though each may differ from the other in value and in significance.

In so arguing, it seems to us that the Herald falls into a confusion of ideas with regard to two very distinct spheres of political journalism—the sphere in which the journalist deals with facts, and the sphere in which he deals with ideas and with moral forces. In the sphere of facts we agree with our contemporary that the journalist should seek to imitate the fidelity of the photographer, bringing his camera to bear on all the fluctuations in the vast tide of human affairs, and setting before the observer a picture of the living time which shall be at once true, vivid and complete. But these pictures of the living age are in order to the higher purposes which may be subserved by their portrayal. The scheme of human life is a stage of action, not a spectacular drama, and the journal which is true to its highest function cannot degenerate into a flat and idle mirror of the passing times. It has truths to teach and morals to draw, as well as pictures to exhibit. In a world which is governed by ideas, it cannot be without ideas of its own. In a world which is swayed by moral forces, it must make an election among the forces which it holds best adapted to impress a right direction on the progress of the State. Independent in all things, neutral in nothing which concerns the welfare of the people, the enlightened political journalist may be called, in a day of popular giddiness and innovation, to stand in a breach without counting the numerical odds that seem to be against him, with as much of steadiness and intrepidity as Leonidas and his Spartan band standing in the pass of Thermopylæ—because they remembered that they were standing there in defense of their homes, and because they remembered, too, that the best service a man can sometimes render to his country is to die for it. The cause of human liberty would have been weak and pitiable to-day if nobody had ever adventured to fight a losing battle for it; and the wholesome moral forces which to-day give strength and beauty to the pillars of our civil government are forces which have sprung from the souls of men who knew their rights and who had courage enough to maintain them against all comers.

It is true that in our political struggles there is much of simulated virtue and of spurious patriotism. There is much adjuration in behalf of "imperiled rights" and "imperiled liberties" where there is no sense of peril at all. In such panic cries the honest public journalist can take no share, for they tend to defeat the legitimate ends of candid and manly discussion. But between the panic clamors of the man who cries "Wolf!" when there is no wolf, and the delusive speech of the man who cries "peace, when there is no peace," there is nothing to choose in point of either honor or sincerity.

That there are good citizens who have convinced themselves that the elevation of General Grant to the Presidency for a third time may be effected without damage to our public liberties and without detriment to our public interests, we do not for a moment question. We cheerfully concede to them not only the right to hold, but the right to propagate, this opinion by all the resources of fair and open discussion. But there are others among us who believe that his candidature for the third term involves a serious innovation on the traditions of the Republic; that there is no present public exigency calling for such an innovation; that the methods by which his candidature has been engineered smack of "the machine" and involve a direct encroachment on the freedom of political initiative—the most precious of popular rights in a country like ours; that his past record as a civil ruler affords no guarantee that his third term will be better than his second, as his second term was certainly worse than his first; and, finally, that the political leaders foremost in the advocacy of his pretensions are men who have won distinction in the art of "practical politics" rather than in the field of statesmanship. That the men who hold these opinions should resist his nomination and his election is not only a right but a solemn public duty.

And with this right and duty the success or the failure of his aspirations has nothing whatever to do. Cato did not despair of the Roman Republic until it was lost, and even after it had been lost he kept the steadfastness of his faith by declaring that though the conquering cause of the Empire had pleased the gods, it was still the conquered cause of the Republic that was pleasing to Cato. It is not the province of the public journalist to foretell events, but it is his duty to do all that lies in his power to guide the currents of political thought to those issues which may seem best adapted to promote the welfare of the people.

The New York Herald, in predicting the nomination and the election of General Grant, has slightly exceeded its task and function as a photographic newspaper. We believe the photographer confines himself to the images of things that are present and visible, and does not work his camera according to that faith which is the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things not seen. And in thus bringing the weights of prophecy into the quivering scales of the pending Republican nomination, our contemporary has shown by its own practice how little foundation there is in any theory of journalism which would strip the journalist's office of the intellectual dignity and the moral sanctions which give pith and purpose to his pen.

MISPLACED SYMPATHY FOR MURDERERS.

GOVERNOR CORNELL, in granting a respite to the condemned murderer, Chastine Cox, assigns as a reason for his action that his other executive duties prevent him from considering the application for a commutation of sentence until after the day fixed for execution. This undoubtedly would seem to be a sufficient reason for a short respite, but the length of time granted, about two months, may be regarded as unfortunate for several reasons.

The rapidity with which punishment follows crime is an element almost as important as certainty. Delays, especially in capital cases, naturally excite hopes, either well-founded or delusive, in the mind of the criminal of escaping the extreme penalty, which hopes, in mercy as well as in justice, he should not be suffered to entertain. In a few months the revolting circumstances of the crime are almost forgotten; not a thought is given to those who have been bereaved by it; while a host of kind-hearted but weak-minded people indulge in maudlin sentimentality over the hard lot of the murderer, weeping friends swarm around his cell, poets write verses for him, he is petted and pampered like the prodigal son, his Christian virtues are proclaimed by his interviewers, until he comes to be regarded by many as almost a martyr, if not a hero; and the punishment, if inflicted, is deprived of the greater part of its effect as a lesson and a warning.

The way in which they manage executions in France is decidedly the better plan. There the criminal is kept in blissful ignorance of the result of any application for mercy, and even of the time appointed for his execution. At daybreak the executioner enters his cell, generally finds him asleep, rouses him and informs him that his time has come. He is hurriedly dressed, taken quickly to the scaffold, and within a very few minutes from the time of his awakening his head rolls in the basket.

Now, if capital punishment is to be kept up, and if we cannot equal our French neighbors in their swift and orderly methods of inflicting it, let us at least be able to claim that when a brutal murder is committed, is detected, is clearly proved against, and confessed by, the murderer, such a crime cannot escape the extreme penalty of the law. In the case of Cox, it is impossible to imagine a single extenuating circumstance which should entitle him to clemency. His victim was a lady who had befriended him. He entered her house in the dead of the night with the deliberate intent of robbing her. A midnight robber or burglar is always ready and willing to murder if necessary to accomplish his object. Hence those crimes were, up to a comparatively recent period, punishable with death, and in view of the great increase of the so-called "masked burglaries," it may be doubted whether it would not be well to revive that law. The pretense that he did not intend to kill her amounts to nothing, even if true. The law presumes that a man intends what will be the natural consequences of his act, and when a strong man violently presses upon the throat or face of an elderly woman until she gives no sign of life, what intent can be attributed to him except that he intended to kill her?

But this question of intent is not material. The crime of which Cox was convicted does not include the intent to kill as one of its ingredients. The statute makes his offense murder, being perpetrated while engaged in the commission of a felony, "although without any design to effect death." Of the wisdom of this provision there can be no doubt, and such being the law, and Cox having openly confessed his guilt of that offense, it will be interesting to see what mitigating circumstances the ingenuity of his counsel and friends can suggest to the Governor in aid of his application.

Crimes of this character have increased to an alarming extent within a few years, and the Governor will add greatly to the present sense of insecurity as to life and property, now so prevalent throughout the community, if he suffers himself to be cajoled or misled into a mistaken exercise of clemency.

NOTABLE FEATURES IN CURRENT TRADE.

NEXT in importance to the collapse of the "boom" in iron, which some months ago was such an important feature of trade, is the present depression in other articles. Last August, and during all September and October, the transactions in tea in this market reached an enormous aggregate, speculators and dealers vieing with each other in "loading up," in the phraseology of the street, and prices went up even more rapidly than a few years ago, when the proposal in the Committee of Ways and Means to put on a duty of fifteen cents per pound encouraged much reckless speculation. But for the last six months there has been noticeable that inevitable reaction which must follow, as night does the day, a season of undue excitement and feverish inflation of values. The downward movement has been gradual, but none the less certain, and to-day prices in the wholesale market are fully ten cents per pound lower than at the beginning of the year. Next to the falling off in the demand, a steady increase in the importations has most affected prices. Then, again, importers have thrown large quantities on the market at regular auction sales, which, being unreserved, have reflected the actual state of affairs far more accurately than the nominal quotations of the brokers in the lower part of Wall Street. It is, however, a fact that admits of no dispute that the general public has gained very little by the very marked decline. Some of the larger retail establishments on the west side of the city and in Brooklyn have undoubtedly given their patrons the benefit of the reduction to a considerable extent; but the fact remains that most of the small dealers, from whom the masses are apt to secure their supply of that which "cheers but not inebriates," have continued to exact prices about as high as ever. It is, moreover, a fact, not without its humorous side, that the average "green" grocer is invariably voluble on the subject of a "rise" in tea, but preserves the silence of the mute and innocent oyster when prices are on the decline. Or, if it is so, he has yet to hear of it. If one were desirous of buying a large lot of tea from one of the numerous brokers of this city, the quotations—at which jobbers purchase at the present time—would range from 16 to 62 cents per pound for green, the most of the transactions being in the neighborhood of 30 to 35 cents; Japan, 16 to 38 cents; Souchong and Congou, 14 to 45 cents; and Oolong, 13 to 40 cents; and some fancy grades sell above the highest prices given. Considering the enormous quantity consumed annually, a profit of five cents per pound ought to be sufficient; but it is well known that the average retailer is not satisfied with this.

It may not be uninteresting to those unacquainted with the subject to note the magnitude of the tea trade of New York. During the last seven years the importations at this port have approximated 400,000,000 pounds, and the records show a steady increase for several years past. For instance, in 1877 the total was 48,400,000 pounds; in 1878, 52,500,000 pounds, and last year close to 60,000,000 pounds. It is well known that this country takes almost all the Japan tea that is exported, the quantity received here last season being a little under 35,000,000 pounds, Canada during the same time taking 3,800,000 pounds. Considerably more than half of our importations are, therefore, what is known as "uncolored" Japan, the remainder being "Mayune" and "Ping-suey" green, "Formosa" and "Amoy" Oolong, Congou and Souchong. Our English cousins prefer black tea, and will, as a rule, refuse to drink green. This preference is illustrated by the fact that a recent statement of the supply of tea in the warehouses of London placed the quantity of black at 77,180,000 pounds, and of green at about 3,230,000 pounds. New York controls the tea trade of this country, as London does that of Great Britain.

Another notable feature of trade recently was the "corner" in wheat, by which prices for May delivery were advanced twelve cents per bushel within two days. Of course this was ruinous to the unlucky speculators who, imagining that the bottom was out of the market, had gone heavily "short" for May delivery. Mr. James R. Keene is said to be a large holder of wheat, and, if the gossip of the Street is to be credited, has latterly revenged himself for heavy losses, through the almost uninterrupted decline of some months past, by turning like a lion at bay and severely punishing the operators on the "wrong" side of the market. The worst of it is that the May "corner" is likely to be repeated this month unless the "shorts," warned by their last unhappy experience, have already secured sufficient wheat to meet their June contracts.

The coffee trade just now is in rather an anomalous condition, in that prices, notwithstanding that the supplies here have been unusually large for some time past, are an important item higher than at this time last year. It is not very generally known that most of the coffee consumed in this country is "Rio," so named from being shipped from Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Last year the imports of "Rio" coffee into the United States was no less than 2,560,000 bags, averaging 133 pounds each—New York, which has the bulk of the trade, receiving 1,720,000 bags of this enormous total. The present prices are largely the result of speculation in which the Brazilian Government has engaged, it is stated, the proceeds going to help pay the interest on its bonds. "Fair" cargoes of Brazil coffee have recently been quoted at 14¼ cents per pound, against 13 cents at the same time last year; yet it is a fact that at the time of writing the quantity held by importers here closely approximates 200,000 bags, against a total of less than 50,000 bags at this date last year; and there is, moreover, a considerable quantity on the way to our markets. Recently the Brazilian Government had fully 60,000 bags in our warehouses and about 20,000 bags in Baltimore. Most of our Java coffee comes by way of Holland, as that Government controls most of the plantations in Java. Every month there is an auction sale in Amsterdam—and has been from time unmemorial—at which fully 100,000 mats of about 133 pounds each are sold. England controls to a great extent the crop of Ceylon coffee, and the United States purchase the bulk of the Brazil crop; and we also import largely of Maracaibo, Laguayra, Costa Rica, Savanilla, a very little Mocha, and a respectable quantity of Java. The imports of coffee into the United States last year—principally at New York—reached the imposing aggregate of 360,000,000 pounds.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE political atmosphere of Europe is at the moment remarkably calm. Even in France, where there are usually some fermenting influences at work, the only thing to disturb the general serenity is an abortive attempt to hold a communistic meeting. Emboldened by the non-interference of the Government in the celebration of the anniversary of Gustave Flouren's death, the Communists resolved to hold a meeting to celebrate the heroes of the Commune. To have allowed such a celebration would have been a public avowal that the insurgents who fell fighting against the troops of the nation in May, 1870, were justified in their resistance. The prompt action of the Government in arresting the two or three uneasy spirits who attempted to create an excitement by appearing in the Place de la Bastille wearing red scarfs has effectually ended the movement.

The English people had scarcely ceased congratulating themselves upon the appointment of M. Léon Say as Ambassador near the Court of St. James, and upon the renewal of the friendship which was supposed to have been destroyed by the refusal of England to aid the French during the Franco-Prussian War, than the action of the Left in choosing that distinguished politician as President of the Senate obliged him to resign his embassy. His successor will probably be M. Waddington, who, besides his English name, was educated at Cambridge University, and has shown his good taste by choosing an American as his wife. His appointment is merely important as showing the desire of the present French Ministry to cement the renewed bonds of friendship between England and France.

The number of sovereigns who have been turned out of their kingdoms and have taken refuge in Paris is almost a byword, and Dandeh has not exaggerated their number in his "Rois en Exil." The last sprig of royalty to join the ranks is the Princess of Asturias, sister of the young King of Spain. She was married to Count Girgenti, brother of the ex-King of Naples, and is by far the most intelligent of her family. Since King Alfonso came to the throne his sister has ruled supreme, much to the disgust of the Duke of Sesto. But now the confinement of the young Queen of Spain is expected, and the Comtesse Girgenti has thought fit to get out of the way. She has two sisters, and she purposes making a tour through Europe to look for husbands for them.

The King of Italy has opened Parliament with a speech that deals almost entirely with home affairs. He promises to support the other Powers in their efforts to carry out the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin, and to help in the settlement of the Greek boundary question. Garibaldi, who is member for Rome, invited all his political friends to join the party of Nicotera, and only to support candidates in favor of an active and energetic foreign policy. He also stated that he intends to visit Paris and London in order to concert measures with Gambetta, Gladstone and Dilke about Italian affairs! Since then he has written a letter abusing the House of Savoy, recommending the dissolution of the army—a curious way of beginning an energetic foreign policy—and that nothing be given to the priests.

The change of policy at the German Foreign Office since Prince Hohenlohe has taken charge, and which was alluded to in this column last week, will probably lead to a treaty of reciprocity between Germany and Russia. The dispute began last Autumn, when a German shipowner applied to the river authorities for leave to run his steamer on the Russian part of the River Niemen. As there was some hesitation on the part of the Russian Government, the Prussians withdrew the permission they had formerly given to Russian shipowners to ply on the German part of the river. How the wind blows can often be discerned by a straw, and it is not altogether unworthy of attention that a move is made in Russia against the Germans. It has always been customary for the Russian Governors to address the German cities, like Riga in the Russian Baltic provinces, in the German language. Some time ago they ceased to do so, and there was a fierce Teutonic outbreak, the mayor and aldermen refusing to receive any communications which were not in German. The Russian Government, however, now intends to pass a law making it compulsory upon the Baltic Germans not only to receive these communications, but also to reply in in Russ. Meanwhile, Prince Gortschakoff is almost quite recovered from his severe illness. All Russia is delighted at the result of the English elections, and the accession to power of the Liberals is said to be the cause of the Chancellor's recovery.

The conduct of the Prince of Wales, the heir-apparent to the British throne, is giving great satisfaction to the English people. Unlike former Princes of Wales, who gloried in giving as much annoyance as possible to the Ministry for the time being, he has shown himself always ready to accept the politics that commend themselves to the nation. It is a well-known fact that Lord Beaconsfield is more agreeable as a Prime Minister to both the Queen and the Prince of Wales than is Mr. Gladstone. But as soon as the nation declared, by the late overwhelming vote in favor of the Liberal Party, that it was tired of Lord Beaconsfield, the Prince gave his social approval by inviting not only the purely liberal members of the Government, but also such radicals as Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain, to a quiet little dinner at Marlborough House. Such an invitation has not as much significance in England as it would have in other monarchical countries, but it shows how ready His Royal Highness is to adapt himself to the force of circumstances. It was a curious sight to see the Prince taking the oath of allegiance to his mother, himself and his young sons, who, by-the-way, have returned untattooed from their long sea voyage. This occurred lately in the House of Lords, of which the Prince as Duke of Cornwall is a member. This willingness to advance with the times is the cause of much joy in England, and great things are expected of him when, as must soon happen, he ascends the throwne of his ancestors.

Mr. Leopold de Rothschild has been blackballed at the English Jockey Club, and many unpleasant remarks are being made anent it. Mr. Rothschild was proposed by Lord Rosebery, who is well known in this country, and was seconded by Lord Falmouth. The reason of his black-balling is said to be due to the choice of his proposer, for Lord Rosebery had taken an active part in the election of Mr. Gladstone in Midlothian, and the Jockey Club is a very Conservative institution. Whatever the cause may be, the action of the club has been subjected to very severe censure, for Mr. Rothschild is a large owner of racehorses, and the club list contains the names of many far more objectionable members.

THE receipts of internal revenue for the first ten months of the current fiscal year show a large increase as compared with those of a like period last year. From spirits there was an increase of $7,388,846; from tobacco, $1,823,967, and from fermented liquors, $1,612,790. The total aggregate receipts show an increase in favor of the present year of $11,603,471. During April, 1880, there was a total increase from all sources of $2,860,384 over April, 1879.

A PROPOSITION has been started in Congress looking to the pensioning of the surviving widows, and children under sixteen years of age, of such members of the life-saving crews on our coasts as may lose their lives while in the performance of their duty. Such a measure could scarcely fail to command a hearty support, since it would involve only a just and proper recognition of a service which is every year illustrated by examples of the loftiest heroism and self-sacrifice.

WE shall conclude our series of "Possible Presidential Candidates" in the next number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. We have not included in our gallery the portraits of General Grant and Mr. Tilden for the reason that both have repeatedly appeared in our columns, and not at all because we have regarded the nomination of either as impossible. Just now, it looks indeed as if these gentlemen may be the opposing candidates in the great national struggle.

THE majority in the House of Representatives has determined to appropriate a sufficient sum for the payment of United States Marshals and their General Deputies for the fiscal year beginning July 4th, 1880, and to prohibit payment of Special Deputies commissioned under the Federal Election laws to serve during the Presidential election. This will at least put an end to the injustice of refusing to pay public officials for services already performed.

THE Secretary of the Navy has sent a communication to Congress advocating the completion of the four unfinished monitors—the Terror, Amphitrite, Puritan and the Monadnock. To complete the vessels according to the modifications recommended will require $2,847,836 for construction, and $1,251,000 for steam-engineering expenses, a total of $4,098,836. It would be a good deal wiser to expend this sum in encouraging American commerce than to waste it in the manner proposed.

THE Louisiana "carpet-baggers" whom General Grant so greatly befriended during his Administration, have been guilty of conspicuous ingratitude. In the State Convention, last week, to elect delegates to the Chicago Convention, they deliberately sacrificed the interests of their illustrious patron, and permitted Sherman and Blaine to secure a majority of the delegation. The ex-President, however, may felicitate himself upon the pleasing fact that the virtuous Pinchback remained true to his fortunes and engineered a small bolt in his interest.

SOME important modifications in the election laws, looking to more honest elections, were made by the New York Legislature at its recent session. By one Bill all towns abutting upon places having over 16,000 inhabitants are to have their voters registered, as in the cities. This Bill will prevent much double voting in country towns near the great cities. By another law every candidate for office is secured the legal right of having a representative present when the ballots are counted at a polling-place hereafter. By still another law all the ballots are to be of a uniform size, and made of plain white paper. This law is intended to prevent the issue of tissue ballots.

SENATOR DAVID DAVIS has written a letter to a friend in Illinois, in which he gives his views upon public questions at some length. He opposes the third-term idea, favors reform in the civil service, a revision of the tariff, the utmost economy in expenditures, with a view to a rapid extinction of the public debt, the curtailment of corporate power, and the protection of the ballot-box so as to secure absolutely free elections. In a word, the distinguished Senator declares himself in sympathy with the body of doctrine held by the better portion of the Democracy, and the letter was probably written with a view of conciliating the good will of that element in the Cincinnati Convention.

A TABLE published by one of the London journals shows that out of about 2,500,000 electors who had the opportunity of voting in the general election—that is, the constituencies where contests occurred—more than 2,000 000 actually voted, leaving less than half a million who abstained. Of these, over 1,140,000 voted for the Liberals, over 800,000 for the Tories, and over 58,000 for the Home Rulers. Thus the popular majority of Liberals over Tories was about a quarter of a million, on a total vote of over 2,000,000, showing that the present electoral arrangements may magnify considerably the effect of a majority, when they translate it into the number of the representatives. In 1874, however, the paradox was much greater, and in quite the other direction, as on that occasion the popular majority was on the Liberal side, while the large majority of representatives was on the side of the Tories.

IT is intimated that the exportation of gold will begin during the present week, and that during the Summer the balance of coin will be against us. We have been so long accustomed to a balance of trade in our favor that a contrary condition seems surprising. But it cannot be expected that crops will fail in Europe every year, and, now that peace prevails, the granaries of the Old World may be able to furnish food enough for Europe and its dependencies without drawing upon us as heavily as heretofore. The purchase of bonds at the rate of $12,000,000 a month means necessarily gold to England, and, as business is dull during the Summer months, bullion will necessarily go abroad.

THE House of Representatives last week injected into the Sundry Civil Appropriation Bill a provision requiring all the appropriations authorized by the Bill to be paid in silver. These appropriations amount to $21,000,000, equal in weight to 1,000 tons, which, under this provision, are to be distributed over the country in silver dollars. The absurdity of the proposition is only equaled by its stupidity. For, even should the amendment be accepted by the Senate, it would amount to nothing practically, since every dollar of these twenty-one millions, received at one window of the Treasury, would be instantly exchanged at another window for a silver certificate, to redeem which the Treasury would be compelled to retain the silver constantly in its possession.

KALLOCH, the reverend Mayor of San Francisco, is hurling defiance at his clerical critics who recently proposed in the California Baptist Convention to demand an investigation of the charges against his son and himself. He tells them that he means to preach the Gospel; that he cares nothing for "the brutality, ferocity and hideousness of their attacks"; that he defies them, and will never submit to their authority. Here is a sample of the sort of talk in which he indulges from his pulpit:

"They say they are going to try me before an ecclesiastical council; but I want to say now, here, publicly, that no number of Baptist ministers, no long-horned Baptist deacons, are going to try me until I am ready for them. I will plead no statute of limitations, plead no ba by act; I do not care how far back they go or how wide a swath they cut. The people may speculate on me and what I intend to do, but as long as I live nothing will ever deter me from preaching to them the glad tidings of God's salvation."

Truly here is the very excess of impudence. Better the drivel of Ingersoll, hideous as it is, than the gospel of hypocrisy, lust and vindictiveness preached by such a man as Kalloch.

THE vicious system pursued in Congress in the matter of appropriations for the erection of public buildings, was very properly rebuked by Mr. Chittenden, of this State, in the course of a short speech on the Sundry Civil Bill last week. There were then on the calendar of the House forty-five Bills to authorize the commencement of new buildings, at a cost of some $10,000,000. The expenditure of this sum would, of course, commit the Government to continued yearly appropriations for the prosecution of the work until the final completion of the buildings, the aggregate greatly exceeding, no doubt, any present expectation of the real cost. Mr. Chittenden, in his remarks, mentioned that last year a log rolling scheme was brought before the House, by which it was proposed to erect sixteen or eighteen public buildings in one Bill, and added that, as to one of them, it was known by those advocating it that even the site could not be bought for the sum appropriated. But arguments and facts of this sort amount to nothing against a combination of members making common cause in support of such appropriations as they individually desire; and if the present system shall continue, we may justly expect to see millions of dollars wasted every year in providing for public buildings in country towns where they are in no sense needed.

IN the Senate debate, last week, on Mr. Morgan's resolution governing the electoral count, Mr. Edmunds made the point insisted upon by us in a recent article, that each State should be given the power to settle all disputes concerning its electoral votes, and that Congress should have power only formally to count what the States might send to it. The Constitution directed that the vote of every State should be counted. In face of this command it was proposed to exercise the opinion or judgment of Senators and Representatives as to whether the vote of a State should be counted or not. He held this to be a plain violation of the Constitution. The States must decide for themselves who they have voted for. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Edmunds indicated his opinion that the duty of ascertaining what was the official return of a State "was purely ministerial, not judicial in any sense, and, like all ministerial acts, the determination of whoever decided upon that question was not final, any more than the act of a sheriff who had arrested a wrong man, thinking in perfect good faith that he was arresting the man named in his warrant. Discretion must be exercised by somebody, and when exercised by the person competent to decide, the two Houses had no power to go behind that decision." The Senate passed the resolution by a strictly party vote.

SLANDER.

A STEALTHY creeping thing that thrives
In fetid swamps and glooms of thought,
And issues forth to prey on lives
That in some cleanlier way are wrought.

A hybrid vampire, owing birth
To venomed spleen and coward hate;
A pestilence that walks the earth,
In darkness ever laying wait.

It sucks the blood of age and youth;
It seeks to taint the tairest fame;
Sets snares for honor, virtue, truth,
And drags them to the slums of shame.

So all who find it where they tread
(And many know it overwell)
Should plant their feet upon its head
And crush a growth so foul and fell.

JOHN MORAN.

A REGIMENTAL ROMANCE.

CAPTAIN RUTHVEN had put the last careless touches to his toilet, and stood leaning on his elbow and looking at himself in the glass with a handsome and insolent smile.

"I don't know, Ayres; I sometimes wish we had remained in the West. Awful climate! See how they are dying. Facing bullets is one thing; facing Yellow Jack quite another. We shall be ordered to New Orleans next week—mark it."

Lieutenant Ayres stood up and glanced at his watch.

"It is quite nine. Are you ready? The dancing has begun long since."

So the two officers set out for the ball. The lieutenant's conjecture proved correct; the festivities were in full progress, and, as they entered the room, the dancers were whirling through a Strauss waltz.

"Who would imagine the fever only a few hundred miles away!" murmured Ruthven, with his satirical smile, as he watched the scene. "But it is for the benefit of the sufferers."

And he, also, was watched. More than one dark-eyed Southern beauty noted his arrival and thought of the vacancies still on her card. The Fifth was noted for its handsome officers, and not unjustly, as one might see by glancing through the room; but Ruthven was the peer of them all. There was something wild and fierce, almost cruel, in the splendor of his features—proud and sad and sarcastic.

He looks on dreamily, and you would not suppose he cares for the scene or any one figuring in it; but a faint flush has risen to his olive cheek, and his heart has thrilled within him.

The dance ends, and he crosses the room to where sits the famous beauty and heiress of the Ravieres plantation, Miss Douglas, who is fanning herself, a little exhausted. The little dried-up old lady beside her is in a great flutter, and smirks and fans herself violently. It is Madame Noiret, the governess.

Miss Douglas receives the handsome soldier haughtily, and he begins talking about the ball.

"Many more than I thought there would be. The dread is growing, and I do not wonder. How many new cases yesterday?"

"Are you afraid of the fever, captain?" asks Madame Noiret.

"I am—frankly," he laughs. "I can scarcely conceive a more miserable fate. We are expecting to be ordered to New Orleans, and you can fancy my sensations over the prospect."

"I am so accustomed to the fever," says madame, with a shrug, "that I never think of it. This season is no worse than some others I have passed through. You would be much regretted, captain, if anything unfortunate should happen to you. I have heard that you are the favorite of your regiment, and they tell me that one of your men is passionately attached to you. He was pointed out to us on parade this morning—the drill, I believe you call it. A fine fellow, whose life, they tell me, you saved—O'Leary."

"Yes, I did O'Leary a service, and he has been much attached to me ever since; it is quite true. Miss Douglas, may I have this quadrille?"

Miss Douglas danced with Captain Ruthven half a dozen times that evening, and they had several quiet and doubtless romantic talks together in out-of-the-way places. This, however, surprised no one; the beautiful heiress had shown something of a preference weeks before.

Ruthven was in great spirits; and yet was there not an odd sort of turbulence in his gayety, such as people show who would drown a secret care? Now and then he sighed heavily, and more than once glanced stealthily at his watch.

Ayres caught him in the dressing-room leaning on his hand and in a dark reverie, so that he did not even hear the lieutenant as he entered, nor until he had touched him on the shoulder, when he started and flamed up savagely. But it was only the ebullition of a second.

"What are you doing here?"

"Is it you, Ayres? I was just debating whether I should go out and have a smoke," and he got up. "If any one asks for me, make an excuse."

They chatted a little longer—the ball, the ladies, the prospect of these gayeties ending very shortly—and Ayres went away again. Ruthven watched him to the door, and, having made sure that he was really gone, took a note from his pocket and crossed over to the light. The message was written on pretty and perfumed paper, but in a curious scrawl, and began thus:

"DEAREST CAPTAIN RUTHVEN—Meet me to-night before twelve, at the usual place, or you will be sorry. I have made up my mind at last about what I shall do—it is——"

He suddenly crunched the paper in his fingers and thrust it into his pocket, and, with a pale imprecation, murmured:

"She would dare anything—it is the Creole blood. I must see her"—he strode to the door and a fierce and ill-boding frown lit up his dark features—"and have it over." And with this he went out.

It was a lovely Southern night—a brilliant moon and hosts of stars—and the air was heavy with sweet odors. Even in his black and bitter mood, Ruthven felt something of the languor and poetry of the hour and scene. A beautiful world—why should so many hearts in it ache? A bird was singing in the silent canebrake, and he stopped to listen for a minute, and then glided on again; and at length getting off the high-road, entered a clump of timber.

This thicket was darker, and he felt his way more cautiously, and once put his hand within his breast and touched something there, and so got on and on, until at length he re-emerged into the moonlight and found himself beside a stream of dark and sluggish water.

Here he was met—a very handsome creole girl, who had been standing on the bank, in some reverie of her own, turned and seemed doubtful whether to advance. Ruthven stopped short, with a sour and sarcastic smile.

"So, Miss Cora, you see I had your note and have complied with your request."

Her large dark eyes searched his face anxiously; but at the same time there was a sort of defiance in them, and she tapped her little foot nervously.

"You did well to come, sir. I am almost heartbroken, Captain Ruthven, and I wish to know what you are going to do. I am a desperate girl, and that note only said what I meant."

"I sent you word by O'Leary what I meant. I have no idea of being annoyed further. I will give you money, Cora—I have already said so. You can't have been fool enough to think I would marry you. I intend to marry Miss Douglas—and now you know it."

She uttered a little cry and placed her hand to her side.

"Rather than see it I'll do what I wrote in the note," she said, passionately.

And Ruthven instantly stepped towards her.

An hour later the captain was dancing again with Miss Douglas, of Revières, and when the waltz was over he went out and hunted up his orderly, O'Leary, and they rode to the barracks together.

Captain Ruthven was oddly gay; he sang—a sweet and melancholy tenor—and after a while bethought him of the soldier in the rear.

"O'Leary, are you asleep? Come here. Dull work, I dare say, you found it waiting for me. How did you pass the time?"

The man, who had ambled up, muttered something, but so indistinctly that the captain gave a quick, surprised glance at him.

"I see," said Ruthven, gravely, "how you passed the time;" and his high spirits subsided, and he sang and talked no more. His faithful O'Leary was grossly unsober, and could scarcely keep his seat—the first occurrence of the kind in his history.

And now in the next four or five days it got pretty well about that the handsome Captain Ruthven and the beautiful heiress of Ravieres were to be married. It was a great match for the penniless soldier, and he should have been very happy; but he was not. He was distrait and anxious, and the more so as news came of the spread of the fever. And, indeed, the whole regiment had its secret anxiety on this point, no one knowing what minute orders might come for a movement to New Orleans, where people were dying like sheep. The men had been through Western campaigns, but here was another sort of foe, more treacherous than the Indians—an invisible enemy whose very breath was poison and whose touch was certain death. And a little demoralization followed, whisky was smuggled into the barracks, and some of the best men were occasionally fuddled, and, strangest of all, it became pretty well known that the captain's favorite and the regimental paragon, Charley O'Leary, was drunk every day, and cared no longer for himself or for what his comrades thought of him.

Such was the situation when, one evening, Captain Ruthven, walking into the barracks, was stopped by Major Poindexter, an old Regular, with a pink face and snow-white hair and mustache.

"Captain Ruthven, I have been waiting for you," he said, nervously; and some others came up, all with grave looks, and even the sentinel at the gate, forgetting his duty, halted and listened. "There is some bad news. A Creole girl named Cora Vaudray has been foully murdered. Her body was washed ashore last night, and—and—— In fact, sir, lately, people have connected your name with hers. I am sure there can be nothing in the story: but, sir, they say you had an assignation with her on the night of the ball. If it be true, you are ruined, for that was the night she was killed. You did not have a meeting with her, captain?"

Ruthven was pale as death—but only as any man might be on hearing such intelligence. His looks did not falter in the least, as he answered:

"It is, unfortunately, true that I did have a meeting with her on that very night, and a bitter quarrel. The unfortunate creature was infatuated with me, and when I told her of my intended marriage, she reproached me bitterly."

"Great heavens, sir! in that case you will surely be held for murder, and what will you do?"

"I will show that she took her own life," returned Ruthven, with a stern and pallid smile; "and for proof will produce—this!"

He drew forth Cora Vaudrey's last note to him, a part of which the reader has already perused; and the remainder ran thus: "I have made up my mind at last about what I shall do—it is to kill myself; but before I take that last desperate step, I shall have arranged for a revenge most pitiless. Nevertheless, I love you—it is love that is relentless, and not thy poor CORA." The last few words were in French.

"I met her," pursued Ruthven, "and she upbraided me bitterly. I asked her what revenge she meditated. She said that she would inform Miss Douglas of our intimacy; I replied that I had already done so. She felt then that she was powerless, I suppose; I offered her money, which she refused, and we parted. I do not feel myself to blame. She was infatuated with me to the point of insanity; but I did not encourage it."

The inquest followed, and the same testimony. Cora Vaudray had been well known; also something of the extravagance of her passion for the handsome captain; and, considering all things, an end of this sort was quite in keeping with her previous history.

Ruthven appeared on parade next morning, looking pale and moody. A far larger crowd than usual had assembled to see the soldiers go through their drill, and every eye was fixed on the captain as the regiment drew up, his company at the head.

It was a brilliant and stirring scene—the waspish rattle of the drums, the shrill melody of the fife, the stern cries of command, the shifting evolutions of the ranks. But in a very few moments it became apparent that, as the foremost lines marched, wheeled and countermarched, something disordered the harmony of their movements. Ruthven issued his orders in a sharp and savage undertone, chafing with impatience; and those who followed the lurid gleam of his eye saw that it took always the one course, and suddenly the cry of "Halt!" rang out and passed down the lines, and an instant stoppage and stillness followed. Something was wrong—what was it? Ruthven, pale as death, and with wild and savage rage, with his drawn sword quivering in his angry clutch, thrust himself among his men and struck one of them two or three times across the head with its broad blade. The soldier fell back a few steps—it was O'Leary, red-faced and unsober. But the next instant his powerful arm lunged forth, and he struck Captain Ruthven in the face, cutting his cheek open and staggering him.

The man was seized, but not before he had made an attempt to shoot himself with a revolver which he had about him.

A great deal of surmise and comment, of course, followed. O'Leary had been noted for his dog-like attachment to Ruthven, who had saved his life once in the West at the risk of his own. The only plausible explanation was that the man must have been insane from drink.

O'Leary's fate was already settled, the penalty being death, and in this case there was no mitigation. The sentinel on guard over him reported that he had not spoken, but sat crying violently. A great hush hung over the barracks, and the men lounging about their quarters talked in undertones, uttering a short laugh at some sally, as people will do under the gravest circumstances, but growing still as death, and a little paler, when an officer passed.

And about four o'clock that afternoon Captain Ruthven visited the prisoner. As he entered the guardhouse he closed the door behind him, and when O'Leary heard the footsteps he turned round. It was the saddest face that Ruthven had ever looked upon. The two watched each other in silence for about a moment, and then said the officer:

"O'Leary, what has been the matter with you lately?"

"You know, sir. I followed ye that night, Captain Ruthven, and saw all that passed. Something told me, when you went from the ballroom, where it was you were going, and, as you stood by the water and spoke to her in the moonlight, I was watchin' and listenin' and heard every word. Oh, I loved her dearly, Captain Ruthven!" and he clasped his hands in wild agony. "And I loved you, sir, and to have saved you the crime o' that night it would have been happiness to die. I saw her pitiful face turned up from the water to the sky, and you a-standin' over her wid no look o' mercy in yours. Oh, sir, I've been mad ever since, and ye cannot blame me."

"Hush!" said Ruthven, awfully white, and shaking like a man with the ague as the dreadful scene was again conjured up. "You had no business to strike me, O'Leary; there is not a hope for you."

"There is one, captain, dear," and he lowered his voice; "ye can bring me that as will make the court-martial unnecessary, and no one would suspect you. Jist a little vial, sir, and in a few minutes all's done and troubles over."

"I could not do it, O'Leary. I have enough on my soul already," and Ruthven shuddered and threw a haggard glance at the door, outside which the sentinel was mechanically pacing.

"What matters it, captain, dear? At the court-martial you must appear agin me, and it will be your words that will sind me to my death. Sorry I am I raised my hand agin ye, sir; but I was mad when you disgraced me before them all, knowin' about you what I did. I wish to heaven you had run me through;" and the wretched man leaned with his face to the wall and wept bitterly.

Ruthven looked at him a moment or two with a dismal gaze, the beauty of his countenance taking strange and weird lights from the tragedy of the situation; on his exquisitely-molded features the intermingled tints of pride and remorse, fury and despair—a fallen angel.

"I will do what I can, O'Leary," he said at last, his voice more saddened and subdued; and, turning suddenly, he went out.

That evening he appeared as usual at the Ravieres Plantation. The parlors were crowded and Miss Douglas radiant. The affair of the morning was discussed a little, and then some one mentioned the rumors, current to-day, on apparently better authority than ever, that the regiment must move to New Orleans.

"Are you sure of this?" said Ruthven, sharply, from his place at the piano, and bending a rather stern and anxious gaze on young Delaney, who had promulgated the report.

"One is never sure of a rumor; but this arose, I believe, from a remark dropped by the colonel of your regiment, Captain Ruthven."

Ruthven turned away with a troubled expression, and some of the people in the room smiled and exchanged glances. Ruthven's dread of the fever was well-known.

After a while he was missed from the room, but no one remembered seeing him go out.

About ten he returned, and, music being in progress, no inquiries were made; and when the song was over, Lieutenant Ayres appeared and was warmly greeted.

"It is hail and farewell, ladies and gentlemen," said the lieutenant, laughing, "for marching orders have been received. The colonel announced the fact publicly to-night."

"Where do we go, Rogers?" asked Ruthven.

"To New Orleans—or, rather, to the grave, most of us, I fear. The telegraph declares a startling increase of mortality since the last two days."

Ruthven dropped into his seat with a singular gesture, noticed by every one.

Miss Douglas flushed and trifled nervously with her fan.

"I suppose you do not fear the fever, Captain Ruthven, although one might prefer not to die of it."

He looked up with a pallid smile.

"It does not matter much to me where the regiment goes," he said; "because this afternoon I resigned my position."

"Resigned!" murmured all, thunderstruck.

"I resigned undoubtedly, and my letter is in the colonel's hands."

Miss Douglas was transfixed.

"I suppose you are jesting, captain. No soldier was ever known to resign on the eve of battle," and she laughed a musical but nervous little roulade.

"I am afraid of the yellow fever," he said, with a sort of dogged defiance of shame itself, "and I confess it. It has been my resolution from the first not to go to New Orleans. My courage has been tested in battle, but this—this is a foe against whom one has no chance."

Miss Douglas turned away, almost fainting. Little Madame Noiret sprang up and ran to her, and caught her arm. Amid a breathless and dismal silence they left the room.

Ruthven looked round awkwardly, with a shamefaced laugh, but Ayres and the others turned their backs on him. He walked to the door, and there paused and looked round again. His face was ghastly white—the apotheosis of misery; and so he went out, and no one there ever saw him again from that night.

About four or five weeks after this a strange nurse at Granada, who had been remarkable for his devotion to the sick, was taken ill and at once pronounced a hopeless case. No one knew anything about him except that his name was Bennett, and that he had been sent to Granada by the Howards. He said that he had had the fever before, but the physicians who examined him after he was taken down pronounced it impossible. Even in that dreadful season of excitement and despair, Bennett's extraordinary beauty was noticed, as well as his fearless devotion to duty. He was very gentle and patient with the sick, but had a stern way and a sharp tone of command with the nurses when they grew negligent which seemed to show a man accustomed to be obeyed at a word. His erect and soldierly bearing was also remarked, and many conjectured that he had seen long service in the civil war.

He died delirious; but the Sister of Mercy found a package in his bosom, which she carefully fumigated and then transmitted to the United States War Department.

Outside certain persons in authority at the seat of government, no one ever learned what was in this package; but some time afterward, Private O'Leary, of the Fifth Regiment, United States Regulars, who had been condemned to death for striking his superior officer, had his sentence commuted to imprisonment.

If the vanished Captain Ruthven had any other motive for resigning, on the eve of the departure for New Orleans, than a fear of taking the yellow fever there, his comrades never learned the fact. Although his testimony at the court-martial of O'Leary was missed, that of the other witnesses was quite sufficient to insure the condemnation which followed. Why the sentence was commuted is one of the many secrets of the War Department.

POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

JUDGE STEPHEN J. FIELD, OF THE SUPREME COURT.

STEPHEN J. FIELD comes of Revolutionary stock, and belongs to a family which has achieved a conspicuous place in American annals. His father was an eminent Congregational divine of New England, and his grandfather was a captain in the war of the Revolution. His brothers, David Dudley Field, Cyrus W. Field and Henry M. Field, have all made their mark on the literature, law and scientific record of their time.

The subject of this sketch was born in Haddam, Connecticut, November 4th, 1816, and, after attending a country school, at the age of thirteen years went to Asia Minor with his sister and her husband, Rev. Jonah Brewer, who visited that country in a missionary capacity, locating in Smyrna. After a stay of two years in the East, during which he acquired the Turkish, Greek, Italian and French languages, young Field returned to this country in 1833, and entered Williams College. He took the highest honors in the junior and senior classes, delivering the Greek oration and the valedictory, and graduated in 1837. Soon after he commenced the study of law in this city, and in 1841 was admitted to the Bar and became the partner of his brother, David Dudley Field.

In 1848 Mr. Field made a second visit to Europe, and, upon his return, being caught by the gold excitement, he went to California, sharing the rough experiences of the adventurers of that period of discovery and transition in the history of the Golden State. Remaining a short time in San Francisco, he next proceeded to Nye's Ranche, then the theatre of a good deal of excitement. Here he was soon elected alcalde, or mayor, and by the influence of cool judgment and a natural sense of justice taught that wild camp of desperate men the necessities and advantages of law and order. The city was christened Marysville, in honor of Madame Covilland, the only lady in the corporation, and the mayor continued to develop its civilization and respectability until superseded by the State authorities, meanwhile acquiring a modest fortune from the emoluments of his office, which, however, he soon after lost in the mutations of a speculative career.

In 1850 he became a candidate for the Legislature from Yuba County, and was elected after a vigorous canvass. As Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee he drew up and secured the passage of a Bill creating eleven judicial districts in the State, and defining the judicial powers of every officer from Supreme Judge to Justice of the Peace. Most of the provisions of this Act are still retained in the code. He also prepared and introduced Bills to regulate proceedings in civil and criminal cases. These Bills were remodeled from the proposed codes of New York as reported by the Commissioners of that State. But it was in the development of his ideas of pure justice in the conflicts between land claimants, whose Mexican grants and Government rights to mining property opposed the rights of the settlers, that Mr. Field chiefly displayed the bold, practical character and clear intellect that have characterized him as politician and jurist. He cleared away the chaos of legal rubbish with the assertion of the principle that "usage and customs which necessity had established must be law, except when in conflict with the Constitution of the State;" and this became the corner-stone of the new system.

On returning to Marysville, Mr. Field renewed the practice of the law, and soon had all the business he could possibly desire. In 1857 he was elected Judge of the Supreme Court of California, by 20,000 majority. The term for which he was chosen began in January, 1858. Meantime a vacancy occurred, and he was appointed, by a Governor politically opposed to him, to fill it. He took his seat in October, 1857. On September 13th, 1859, David C. Broderick was killed in a duel by David S. Terry, who had resigned the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court before the meeting. Mr. Field succeeded him as Chief Justice.

When Mr. Field came to the bench the calendar was crowded with cases involving immense interests, the most important questions, and various and peculiar litigation. The State was developing her multiform physical resources. The Judges were as much the pioneers of law as the people of settlement. Something had been done, but much had yet to be done, and something had to be undone which had been done in the anomalous period that was passing. There was no general or common source of jurisprudence. Law was to be administered almost without a standard. The treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo bound the United States to recognize Mexican titles, by which immense tracts of land were held against the claims of settlers, and the courts had held that the gold in the earth belonged to the State. Judge Field reversed this in 1861 with the assertion that neither the sovereignty of the State nor of the United States extended to the minerals of the country. Another decision established the principle that rights to mining and water privileges and the like must come from the first possessor, who is supposed to have a grant from the Government by right of his occupation of the land. His opinions in regard to mortgages are held as decisive of true principles in all the courts of the country, and his definitions of the obligations of corporations and the rules by which they are bound are equally orthodox. To his character and ability as the Chief Justice of California, as much as to his fealty to the Union, he owed his appointment to the Supreme Bench of the United States and the unanimous approval of the Senate in 1863.

When, in 1861, the Southern Rebellion was instituted, the Secessionists in California almost equaled the Unionists in number, and were peculiarly aggressive. Judge Field warmly espoused the Union cause, and the Union League, of which he was a leading member, decided the policy of the State by dexterously getting possession of the Government arms that were stored at Benicia. Mr. Field and the League kept themselves in constant communication with President Lincoln by post riders on the Plains. They asked that an officer of unquestioned loyalty should be placed in command on the Pacific Coast. General Albert Sidney Johnson was relieved from the command of the United States forces, and General E. V. Sumner put in his place. Judge Field had been a crescant Democrat, and now, upon the delicate line between his belief in State's Rights and his devotion to the Union, he maintained himself with the courage and consistency that made him a model War Democrat, who never voted the Republican ticket, but received from President Lincoln the highest compliment due to patriotism. At the resignation, in 1863, of Judge McAllister, the Special United States Justice assigned to the Pacific Coast, Judge Field was about to be appointed to the vacancy, when Mr. Lincoln, to use his own words, "made a real Judge of the Supreme Court out of Stephen."

As to his career upon the Bench, one who has studied it closely writes: "It has been said that the most dangerous assaults on liberty have been by a partisan Bench, and its greatest defenders pure and brave judges. After the war, the test oath in Missouri debarred from all privileges of office all who had ever felt a symptom of sympathy with the Rebellion, and in 1865 the iron-clad oath of 1862 was extended to embrace lawyers practicing in the United States Courts. In the cases of Father Cummings and of Garland, now Senator from Arkansas, Justice Field set up a barrier against the political persecution of these acts, and in the confiscation cases was equally courageous in asserting the principle that proof of treason was as necessary as proof of any other crime before penalty could be inflicted. In the famous legal-tender cases his dissenting opinions concluded with the simple and expressive sentence: 'The only loyalty which I can admit consists in obedience to the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance of it.' In the New Orleans slaughter-house case, involving the construction of the Fourteenth Amendment, he held that Congress could not punish a State officer for the manner in which he discharged duties imposed on him by the State, nor make the exercise of its punitive power dependent on State legislation."

Judge Field is now named in connection with the Democratic nomination for President. It is not impossible that he may be the party standard bearer in the coming national conflict. That he would lead the party worthily, and command the hearty support of all its members, there can be no doubt whatever.

THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

THE preparations for the Republican National Convention at Chicago were completed last week by the National Republican Sub-committee. It had been originally intended to decorate the Exposition building in which the convention is held on an extensive scale, but this design was abandoned, owing to the expense involved in the construction of the merely necessary alterations in the building. Still, it compares favorably with any hall in which a great National Convention was ever held. The roof of the building, which has been painted in white and blue, forms a covering for the hall, and one that admits of easy decoration. An immense canvas, made of stripes and colors, to represent the national flag, is stretched from over the speaker's stand to the rear of the hall, and draped down to the back of the rear seats. Around the sides of the building, suspended between the arches of the roof and surrounded with flags and evergreens, are all the State coats-of-arms. Between every third arch north of the speaker and on each side of the hall are oil-paintings of prominent Republicans. On the speaker's right, at the south end, the portraits are hung in the following order: Dix, Lovejoy, Giddings, Chase and Sumner; on his left, Morton, Wade, Andrews, Yates, Fessenden and Seward. In the rear, against the wall, is a portrait of Lincoln, and the motto from his Gettysburg speech, "Government of the people, by the people, for the people." Hanging from the centre arches, in the middle of the hall, is a double portrait of Washington. The only other large picture is one of the late Senator Chandler. This is suspended over the speaker's stand and draped in mourning. The others are wound with the national flags. It is 10 by 8 feet in size, and all the others are 9 by 6.

The building has a capacity of 10,400 persons. The seats are numbered, with tickets to correspond. The delegates and alternates will occupy seats in the main auditorium, and ample provision is made for the accommodation of the Press.

Delegates arrived in the city as early as Tuesday of last week, all the candidates being represented by confidential managers. The Grant headquarters were located at the Palmer House, where the National Committee also had rooms. Mr. Blaine's supporters rallied at the Grand Pacific, the Matteson and the Burdick Houses. Secretary Sherman's friends also concentrated at the Grand Pacific. General Grant's interests were in special charge of General Logan, Senator Cameron and others. Ex-Congressman Hale of Maine, Senator Hamlin and William E. Chandler represented Mr. Blaine. Secretary Sherman is represented by ex-Governor Dennison, Governor Foster, General Warner M. Bateman, of Ohio; Thomas M. Nichol, Secretary of the National Hard Money League, and some others. The delegation of New York Republicans who oppose the nomination of General Grant have quarters at the Palmer House. The National Republican League sends twenty delegates under instructions to oppose Grant's nomination. At last accounts the contest had become very bitter, and a stormy convention was anticipated.

FLOWERS FOR DECORATION DAY.

THE great demand for flowers occasioned by the annual tribute to the memory of the dead of the rebellion taxes the hot-houses and nurseries of the florists to their utmost. Although the extreme hot weather in the neighborhood of New York has been severe upon budding and blooming plants, the skill of the gardener is now so scientifically displayed that he is able to provide against the usual run of adverse circumstances.

New York florists obtain their supplies almost entirely from New Jersey and Long Island. The sales of growing plants are practically crowded into the few weeks of Spring and early Summer. The centre of one branch of this trade is Clinton Market, and since the warm days have come, nearly a hundred loaded wagons can be seen every morning near the small park at the foot of Canal Street, and when the season is at its best, one hundred and fifty wagons will empty their floral treasures upon the sidewalk. The stock brought here is sold to grocers and small city dealers, who in turn dispose of them to chance customers; or lots of considerable size are taken to country towns near by, and occasionally gentlemen load a truck full and carry them off to their private grounds. The plants here are all brought into flower, so that they can advertise themselves, and are delivered in large pots. The masses of lilies, calias, geraniums, fuchsias, pansies, double daisies, polyanthus, and, as the weather warrants it, of asters, balsams, nasturtiums and other bedding-plants, make up a wealth of bloom which cannot be equaled in any market in the world, except, perhaps at Covent Garden, when the season is at its best. From $3,000 to $6,000 are realized here every day by the wholesale dealers.

The headquarters of another and entirely distinct branch of the trade are in Cortlandt Street, where plants in quantity are sold at auction every Tuesday and Friday. These auctions were first established thirty-five years ago for the sale of foreign roses, and to this day European dealers have frequent sales of imported nursery and plant stock. Occasionally, too, is seen some large collection of lily bulbs from Japan, of orchids gathered in the tropics, or of agaves from Mexico and the West Indies. The sales mainly consist, however, of plants grown at the large establishments near the city, and, as a matter of fact, the entire treasures of the greenhouse are brought here, ready packed for removal in such quantities and of such selections as buyers demand.

The following are the average prices charged by florists for the various kinds of bedding plants: Verbenas, in baskets containing a dozen each, 60 cents; bovardias, 25 cents to 40 cents apiece; cantanea, $1 to $1.50 per dozen, according to size; geranis, $1.25 to $2 per dozen; heliotrope, $1.50 per dozen; rose geranis, $1.50 per dozen; petunia, $1.25 per dozen; coleus, $1 to $1.50 per dozen; lemon verbenas, $1.50 to $2.50 per dozen; Lady Washingtons, 30 cents to 50 cents apiece; good calla lilies, 50 cents apiece; fuschsias, 30 to 40 cents each; spirea Japonica, 40 cents to 75 cents apiece. Bleeding hearts have nearly done flowering. Small quantities may still be had, however, from many dealers at prices ranging from 25 cents to 30 cents each. The dentata gracilis has also arrived near the end of its blooming period, and the few specimens still to be had sold at from 25 cents to 50 cents each. Some florists still have a few Siberian lilies (Lilium tryfolium) in bloom, but they cost from $1 to $1.25 apiece. Phlox sells at $1.50 a dozen and oxalis 20 cents each. Lobelia compacta may be had for $1.25 a dozen, while mignionettes are sold for $1.50 a dozen. The artillery plant, a handsome creeper, of purplish-green hue, may be had for $1.50 a dozen; as also the centaurea candida, the most beautiful white foliage plant. Pansies sell for from 75 cents to $1 a dozen. Roses range from 35 cents to 50 cents apiece.

DECORATION DAY IN NEW YORK.

A PARTICULAR zest was given the impressive ceremonies of Decoration Day this year by the appearance of the various posts of the Grand Army of the Republic in their new parade uniform. According to the custom observed since the institution of the memorial ceremonies, there was a parade of the State militia, local and visiting posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, and battalions of the Fire Department. The military stations were decorated with flowers, the graves of the dead soldiers and sailors in the city cemeteries were appropriately honored, and detachments of the veteran organizations visited the suburban cemeteries, and rendered the annual tribute to the commanders and comrades long since laid away.

The early procession of the active and veteran soldiery on Monday, May 31st, deserved the hearty commendation it received. In the right of the column were placed the Old Guard of New York City, between the Citizens' Corps of Troy and the famous State Fencibles of Philadelphia. As Decoration Day was celebrated in Philadelphia on Sunday, the Philadelphia soldiers accepted invitations to participate in the parade here on the 31st. The uniforms of these bodies displayed the colors red, white and blue. After the Chief Marshal and his aides came the Division Commander of the G. A. R., with his staff, and, following, the drum corps of Post No. 2 of Philadelphia. Between the drummers and the post were the colors of No. 2, while in the midst of the veterans were borne the twenty-two old battle-flags under which the comrades had fought. After Dahlgren Post of New York and Rose Post No. 94 was a fine representation of the National Guard of Pennsylvania, the First Regiment of Philadelphia, consisting of seventy ranks of sixteen men each.

The First and Second battalions of the Fire Department participated in the parade. The former battalion was under command of Chief of Battalion Rhodes, the latter under Chief of Battalion Reilly, and Assistant Chief of Department Charles Shay directed the movements of the entire force. The First battalion consisted of engine companies Nos. 4, 9, 17 and 33, and hook-and-ladder company No. 3; the second battalion was composed of engine companies Nos. 14, 19, 27 and 35, and hook-and-ladder company No. 13.

Brief services were held at the principal monuments; the flag on the red fort in Central Park was hoisted at sunrise by Adjutant Warner of the veterans of 1812; Trinity's chimes rang out upon the clear air their appropriate salutes to the dead and the day; while in the evening the visiting posts and troops from Philadelphia were entertained by their respective hosts.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Benedictine Millenary at Monserrat, Spain.

Though the Benedictines are not what they once were in Europe, they still linger in some abbeys of almost fabulous date. Among these is Monserrat, in the Spanish province of Catalonia, a shrine where centuries ago the founder of the Jesuits hung up his sword on renouncing the career of arms. The anniversary of St. Benedict was this year the occasion of an immense pilgrimage to this shrine in the rugged mountains. One of the great features of the day was the processional transfer of a famous statue of the Madonna from a cave where it was found to the great church. At night there were illuminations and music by the band of the Engineer Regiment. On Sunday, April 25th, there were Mass-es in the Cave of Juan Garea, and in the Abbey Church, where the papal nuncio, Monsignor Bianchin, fiunited, assisted by the Bishops of Barcelona, Gerona, Lerida, Vich, Tortosa, Minorca and Urgel. The festival attracted no fewer than 25,000 pilgrims to the bare, steep cliffs of Monserrat.

The Carrousel at Mantua.

This brilliant display took place on Sunday, April 18th, at Mantua, in the old gardens extending from the great Atrio di Davide to the Viale di Cerese. It was attended by at least 8,000 persons, and opened with a grand equestrian entrée, the riders attired in blue, red and violet. Then followed combats on horseback, two against two; then two against one. Riding at the ring by red knights was succeeded by the Carrousel, properly so called, a kind of contre dance of intricate figures, which reminded one of the lancers. Riding at heads, which were of paper full of red dust, excited much merriment, and, after the blues had shown their skill at the bar, the ceremonies concluded with the salute to Mantua. Those engaged belonged to the Fourteenth Alessandria Cavalry, now stationed at Mantua, and the proceeds, 14,000 lire, were given to charitable institutions.

The Benedictine Centenary at Monte Cassino.

Monte Cassino is in some sort the cradle of the ancient Order of Benedict monks, who in the old time bore Christianity to Saxon England, and to Germany and the north of Europe. In April this year they celebrated the thirteen hundredth anniversary of their founder's passage to a better life, and all was conducted with the greatest pomp. Benedictine abbots and bishops who had risen from their Order went from America, Austria, England, Germany and France to gather at Monte Cassino, between Rome and Naples, where St. Benedict founded an abbey in 529 on the site of a temple of Apollo. The interior of the church surpasses in elegance and costly decoration every other church in Italy, except St. Peter's, while its library and archives are rich in manuscript treasures. It was at this ancient shrine that thousands of pilgrims gathered to receive, at the close of the ceremonies, the papal benediction at the hands of the Prince Archbishop of Salzburg, the moment taken by the artist for his illustration.

Tobogganing at Cabul.

Englishmen are proverbial for carrying their own sports with them to every quarter of the globe in which they may be residing, and moreover are particularly fond of learning the sports of other nations, and imparting them into whatever countries their line of life may lead them. Thus old Indians have brought polo and tent-pegging into fashion in England, and that exhilarating pastime of "Tobogganing," in which the Canadians in common with the Russians are such proficients, would doubtless have long ago become a popular sport in England were it not for the fact that the snow is not deep or hard enough for the purpose on their Gulf Stream warmed shores. At Cabul, however, where so many British troops have been spending the past Winter, the snows which lay on the hills inspired the idea of attempting the sport there, and, as our picture depicts, tobogganing speedily became a favorite institution in camp.

A New Sea Messenger.

Besides the shipping disasters of which intelligence is received, either because they take place within sight of land, or because some persons escape to tell the tale, there are every year a number of ships which, together with their inmates, disappear as utterly as if they had vanished into space. Shipwrecked men, on the brink of eternity, have often in the last extremity cast overboard bottles containing some hastily scrawled record of their desperate condition. Sometimes these missives are found and read, more often they are dashed against rocks, or the water gets in and sinks them. Besides, silly and mischievous persons throw sham messages into the sea, and it is difficult to distinguish between the false and the true, and hence much anxiety and misery has been caused. The newly invented Sea Messenger is free from the defects of the improvised bottle. Its appearance is so conspicuous that it would be visible at a considerable distance; and the list of persons on board, etc., would be placed in it before beginning the voyage in case of emergency. As it is capable of carrying sixty pounds weight, valuables could be inclosed in it, and thus money, jewels, etc., could be preserved for the friends of those wrecked, instead of being irreparably sunk at the bottom of the sea. In each messenger a printed sheet is inclosed, giving instructions (in seven languages) to the finders; and at foot, as on a telegraph form, is a space for the final message to be written.

Relief Stores for Ireland.

Ships-of-war have so often crossed stormy seas and encountered all kinds of perils for the sake of carrying death and destruction, that it is quite a pleasure, by way of contrast, to watch the proceedings of H.M.S. Garnet. She goes to fire broadsides at those Western islanders; but the broadsides consist of potatoes and clothing, shipped from the United States, so that the inhabitants are content to be shot at as often as possible, and, instead of keeping out of range of fire, they crowd round the Garnet in their boats. These outlying people are especially to be pitied at a time of scarcity, as they lie so far from the main track of affairs, and, but for the visits of vessels laden with such welcome ammunition as this, they would run great risk of perishing from famine.

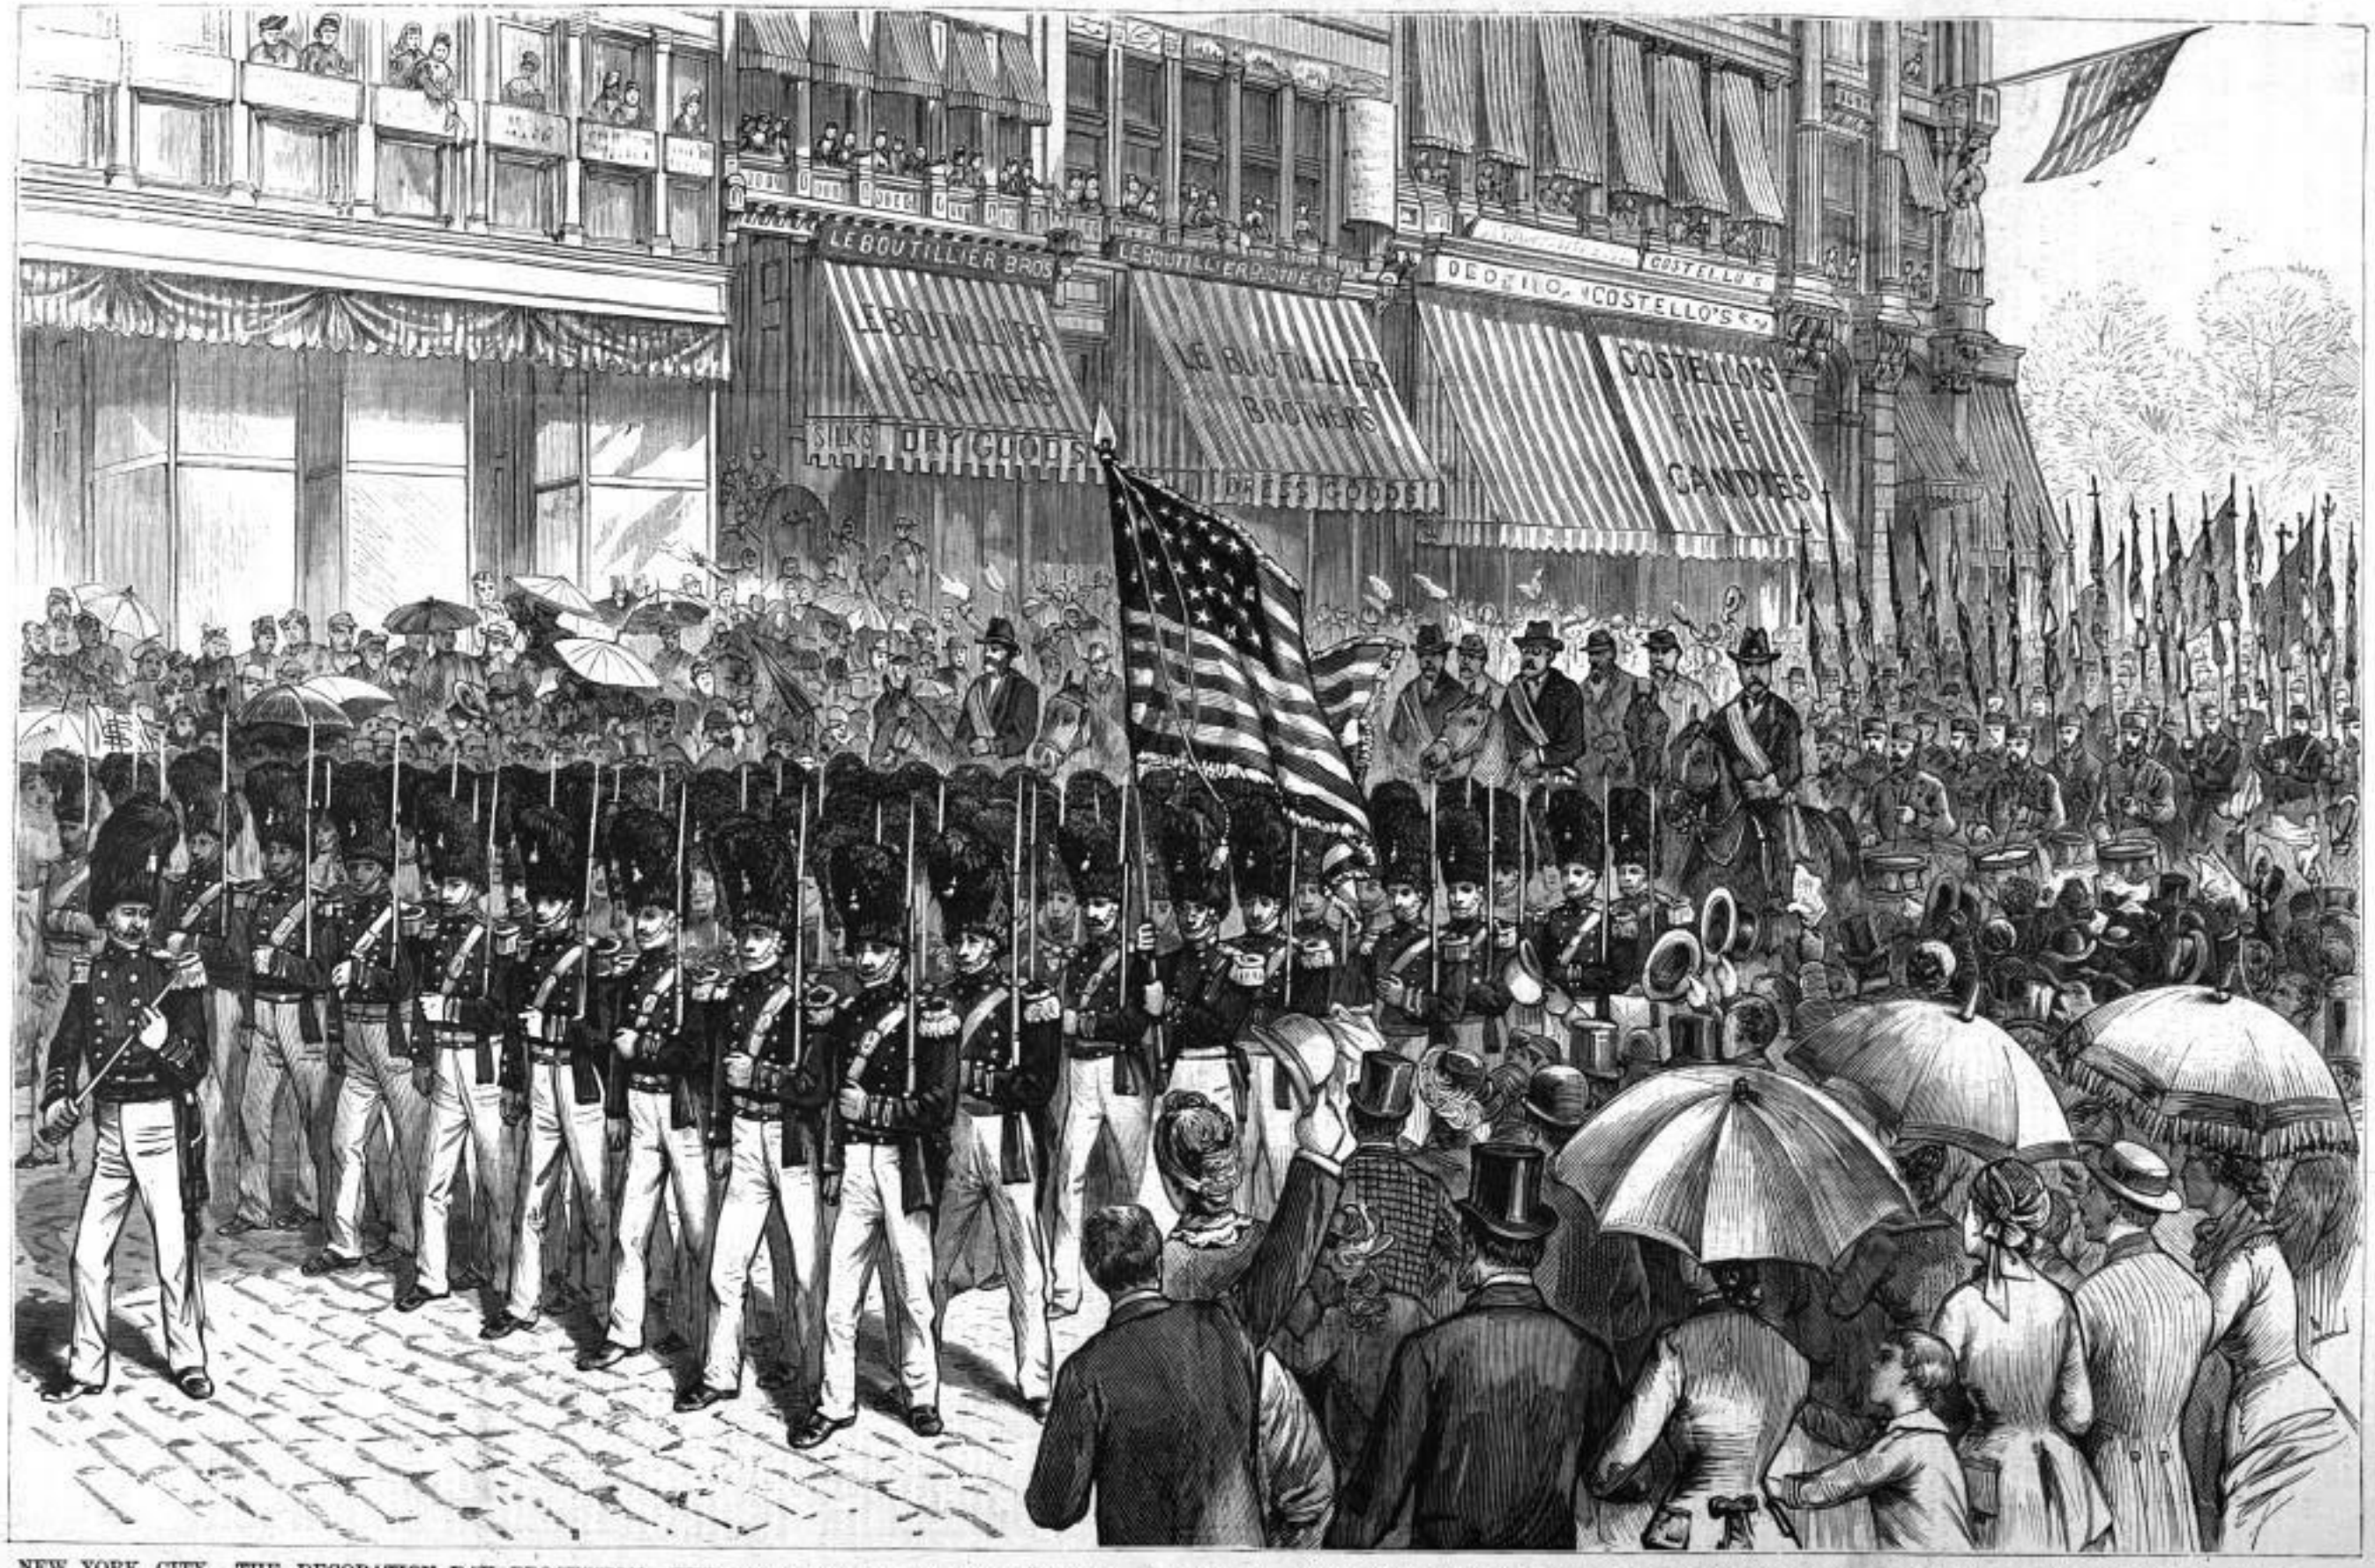
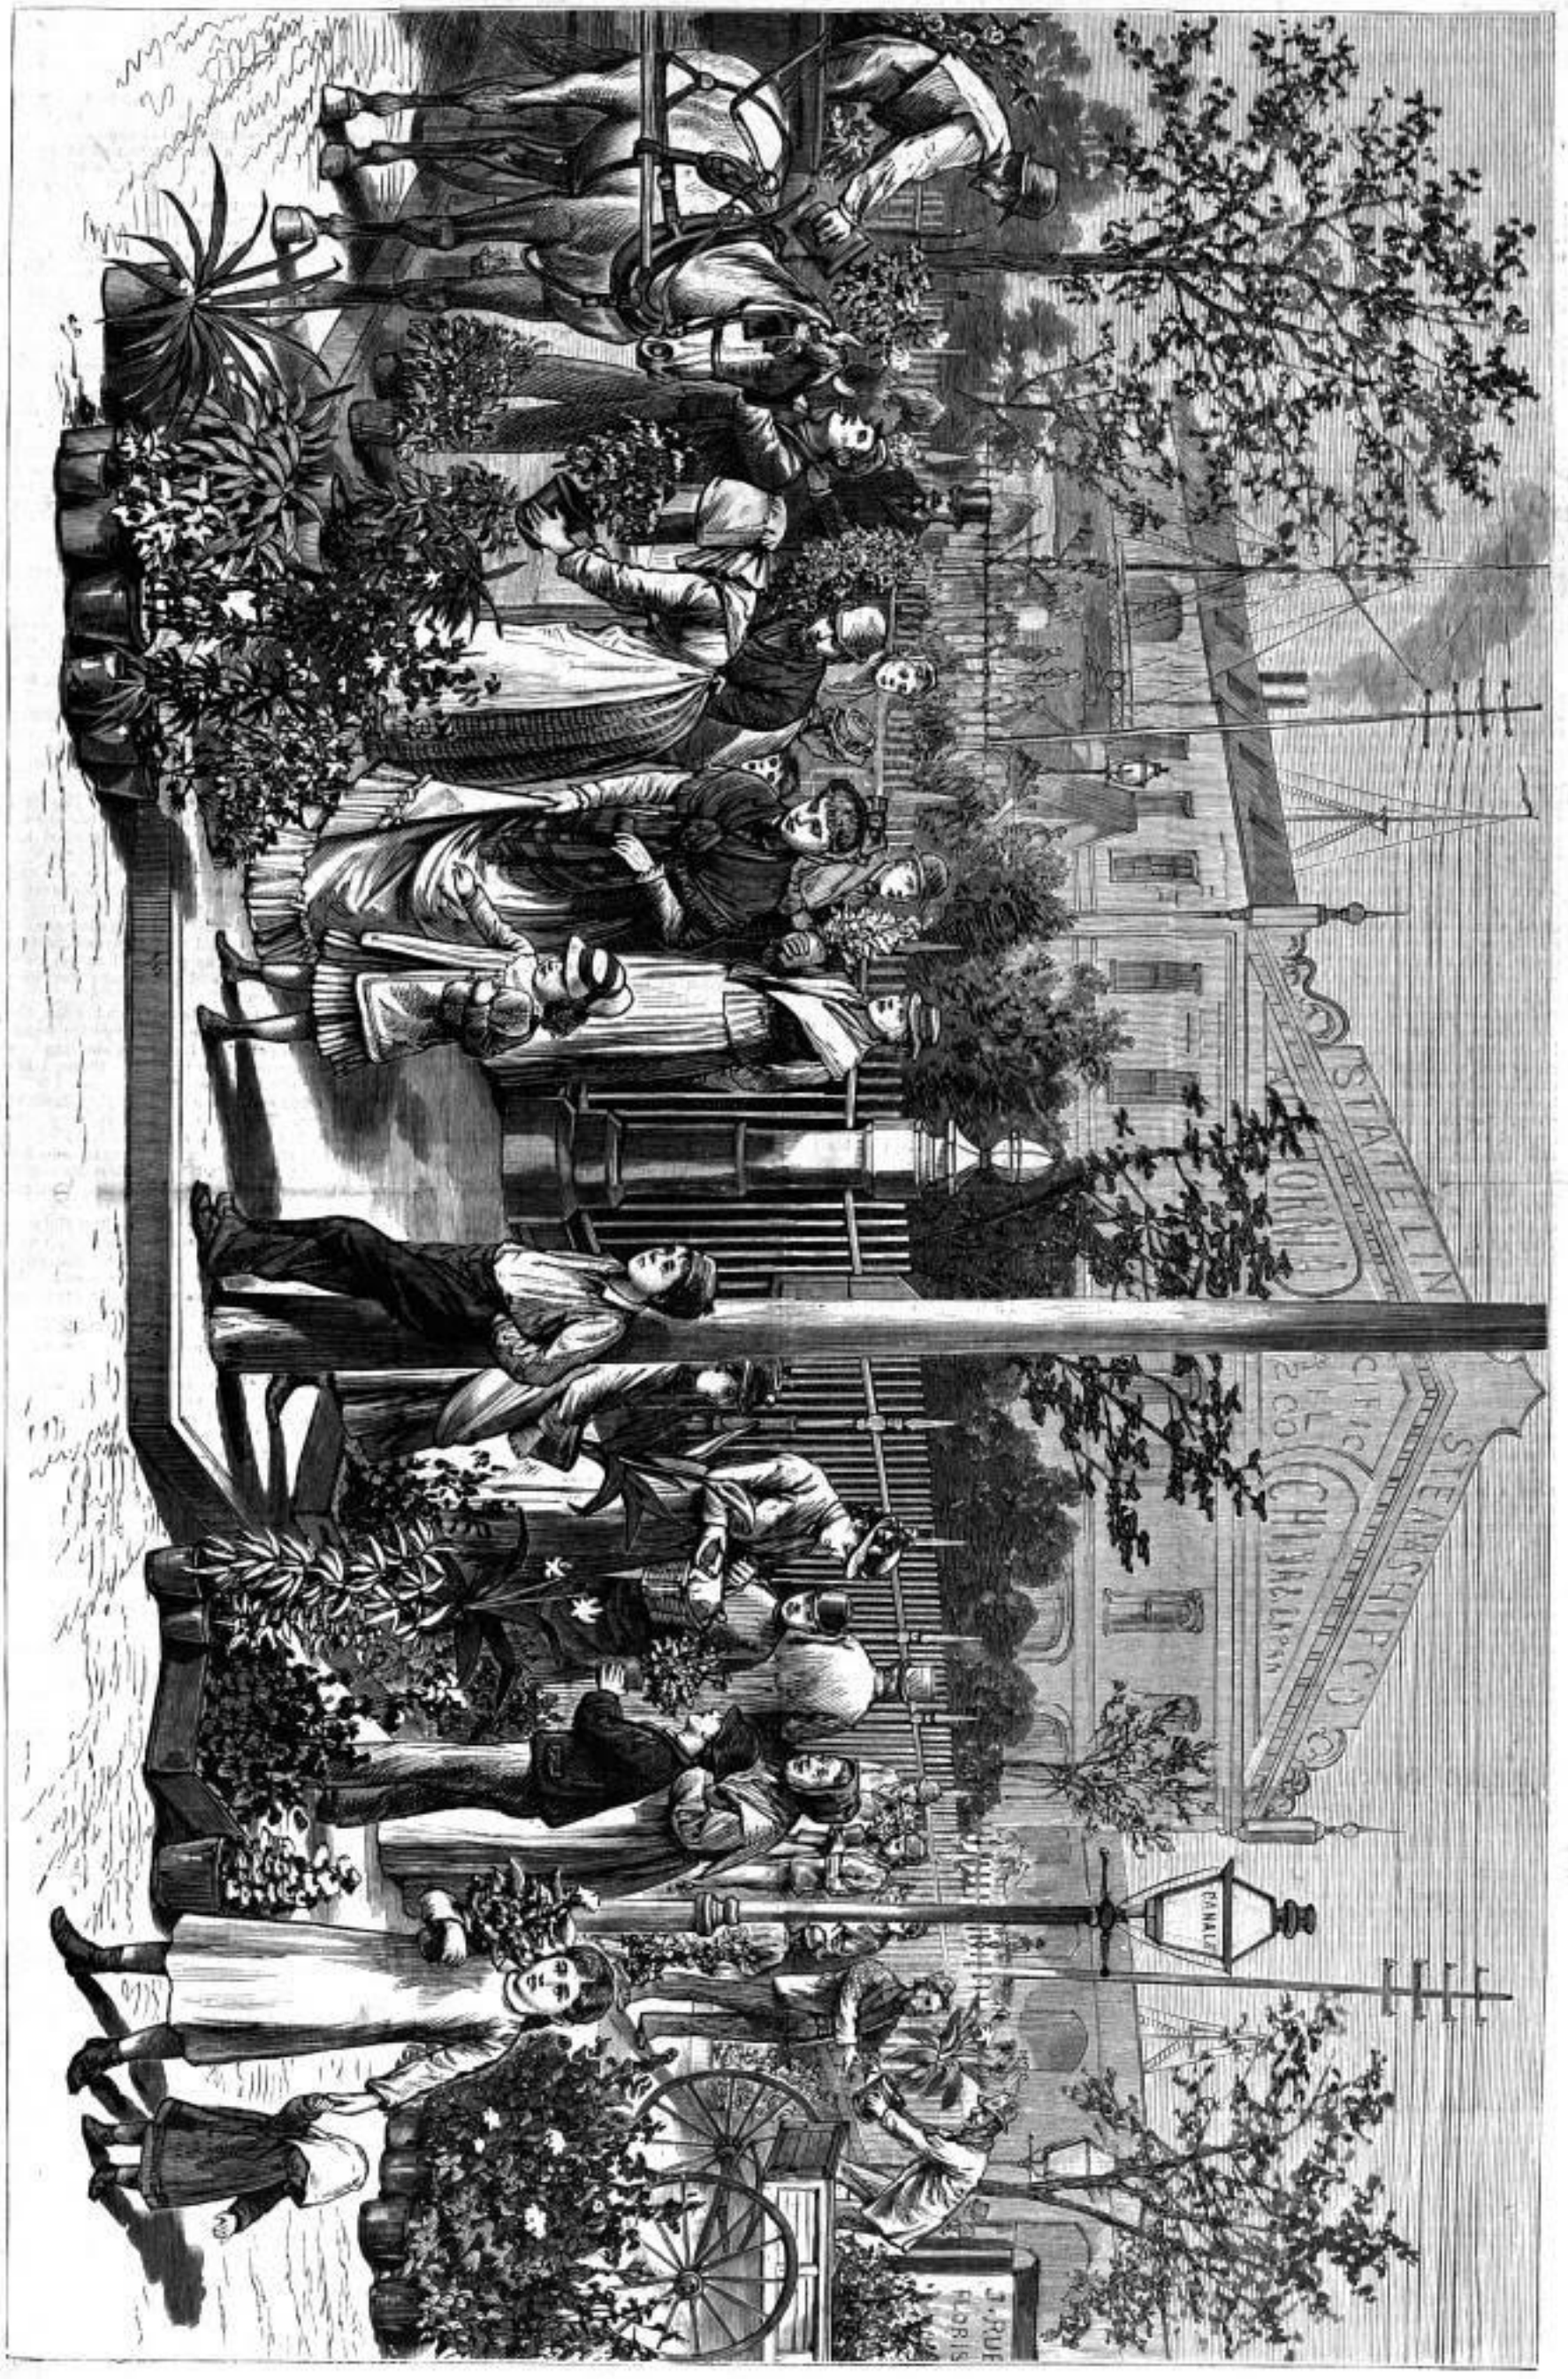
—IN a recent communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, Assistant-Treasurer Hillhouse stated that the silver dollars now in the vaults of the Sub-Treasury in this city weigh over 500 tons. If the coinage of silver shall continue at the rate of $2,000,000 a month, the question as to how it can be disposed of with the present facilities will be a serious one.



—IT is asserted that Cardinal Jacobini has been instructed by the Curia to inform Prussia that the Pope disapproves the permissive system in the bill amending the May laws, and withdraws the concession made in the brief to the Archbishop of Cologne, regarding the notification to be made to the Prussian Government of the appointment of priests, declaring it void.

—SEMI-OFFICIAL reports from Black Sea coast districts of Bulgaria give accounts of the recent outbreak in the Balkan villages bordering on the above-mentioned territory. A dozen villages were destroyed by the Bulgarians. The depredating forces numbered 2,000 men, composed of police, gymnastic societies, militia, armed villagers, and brigands of all nationalities.

—A PANAMA paper says that a contract has been made between Mr. A. G. Menocal, on the part of an American company, and the Government of Nicaragua, for the construction of a canal across Nicaraguan territory. It awaits only the approval of the Legislative Congress, which has been convened for that purpose, to become a law of the land. The terms of the contract have not been made public, but it is said that they are extremely liberal on the part of the Government.



—THE New England Woman Suffrage Association, in annual session last week, adopted a series of resolutions, declaring that the disfranchisement of one-half the people on account of sex is a grevious political injustice; that agitation is the only way by which to awaken the people to a proper appreciation of the fact; that a Suffrage Convention shall be held in each New England State during the ensuing year; and that the granting of school suffrage to women is a concession of the whole principle of woman suffrage.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,
AUTHOR OF "IN THE MARSES," ETC.

CHAPTER V.—TOBOSKIE RECEIVES A LETTER.

"SEEMS to me, Toboskie, you have been seized with a sudden and violent friendship for the Ashhursts. How often a day do you visit them?" Chetewood looks suspiciously at his friend, whom he has collared with a desperate grip as he was about to ascend the grand staircase of the hotel.

"My visits do not exceed one in twenty-four hours, and will not average that," replies the Russian, calmly.

"'Pon my soul! never would have believed it." Chetewood's laugh is immoderate, but a trifle bitter, though he has assumed a miraculous air of enjoyment. "Oh, come, now, Toboskie"—his manner is even more facetious—"have the grace to confess your weakness; the two weeks I gave you are not yet up, and you——" Toboskie looks straight at his friend with a dangerous glitter in his eyes.

"Well, proceed, and you——"

"Are in love with Jack Ashhurst's wife."

Count Toboskie's hands clinch, and a dark flush slowly mounts upwards to the very roots of his hair. It is a savage impulse that first seizes him; but he notices the dry, unnatural glitter of Chetewood's eyes, the haggard face, the air altogether miserable that characterizes him. Suddenly all that fierce, desperate wrath dies out, and he lays his hand, with the tenderness of a woman, upon Dredmond's shoulder.

"Chetewood," he says—and his tones hold a sweetness that few women have ever heard—for between these men is a friendship firm and true—"Chetewood, I don't mind this from you, but if any other man had said it, it would have gone ill with him. For, however my morals may degenerate, I will never love another man's wife." A painful flush stains the frank Saxon face of the English peer. "Mind you," continues Toboskie, "I am speaking strictly of myself, and with not the slightest insinuation for any one else. I would never love another man's wife, for the simple reason that when I love, the woman must be mine, and I would not sink any woman to trouble and degradation. But if Clair Ashhurst were single, I don't mind telling you that never in my weakest moment could she wield the slightest power over me. Love her I never could, if she were the last woman upon earth."

Chetewood so far forgets himself as to allow his face to become irradiated with a bright glow, and, with the quick, graceful impulse that Toboskie remembers so well of his youth, he seizes the hand of his friend in a warm clasp. Now, what there is in the very proper avowal of the Russian to cause the eyes of this foolish young man to brighten, and his whole appearance to be indicative of insane delight is altogether a mystery. Certain it is, he wrings the hand he has grasped, as if quite of the determination to rid his friend of that very useful appendage, and his words are hasty and somewhat incoherent.

"Thanks, awfully," he murmurs, rapturously, and with vague gratitude; "you always were so good to me, Raoul; I am sure it is very kind of you——?"

Toboskie stares.

"My dear fellow, don't you think you are a little mad?" he says.

Chetewood passes his hand before his eyes with a weary, wrathful gesture; but it is noticeable that his appearance of insanity lessens.

"Yes," he says, lowly, and a dreary bitterness is in his tones, "I think I am. But on one point I am quite sane: I owe you much for your forbearance."

"Don't mention it," replies Toboskie, gently. "Between you and me let no woman ever step. After all, friendship is more faithful and of more value than love." He speaks carelessly; but there comes a time in the future when his words return to both in bitter significance.

"I confess," he resumes after a silence, "I am interested in the child; she is a very remarkable one. And as I happened to rescue her from the flames, they are kind enough to think it entitles me to unusual consideration and all that, though honor compels me to acknowledge that Maize shows anything but an inclination for my society. Then, too, I like Jack Ashhurst; there is about him a candor and nobility that I have observed but in few men, and this is how our intimacy has come about. Now you have the whole facts of the case."

Still Chetewood's madness clings to him.

"And yet Gypsy is not by any means so indifferent to you," he speaks, absently, and forgets the insinuation his words cast upon the lady of his thoughts.

Again Raoul flushes—that dark, swarthy flush—and, as before, he lays his hand upon the arm of his friend, and glances hastily around before speaking.

"Dredmond," he says, oh, so gravely—for there is a native chivalry in this man's soul, despite the lust and excesses of a worldly career—"Dredmond, remember you are speaking of a lady. You are not quite yourself, else you would not be so reckless of any woman's honor, much less a woman whom, be it said to your shame, you love. No, no, my friend," as Dredmond starts violently and clinches his hands, "between you and me, for to-day, at least, hard words shall not come. I have spoken plainly, because I think the years of our friendship give me the title. Chetewood, not even your father has your good more at heart than I, and none so well as I know that you are too noble to be made the victim of a woman's caprice."

A hard, white look gathers about the sensitively shaped mouth of Lord Chetewood, and his lips move stiffly.

"I forgot where I was and what I was saying. No one would sooner protect Lady Ashhurst's honor than I; yet my carelessness—unpardonable as it is—is safe with you, Toboskie."

"Perfectly." Count Toboskie sees that Chetewood ignores the latter part of his rebuke, and is quick to take the hint. "But before dropping this subject, I must say a word in vindication of Lady Ashhurst and myself." Again that painful flush suffuses his dark visage; there is just enough truth in Chetewood's remark about the partiality of Gypsy, to make him feel uncomfortable, and he steadies himself before speaking. "I think you have grossly misunderstood the lady's position towards me. For two weeks, owing to the kindness of society, we have been constantly thrown together, and when I have not met her in the world, it has been in her husband's house; and I hope you do not think after that—after all the hospitality shown me by Jack Ashhurst—I would make love to his wife." The flush has died away now, and a grand pride and indignation stamp the straight, dark features. "Being thrown so much together, and knowing her husband's partiality for me, it is quite natural that Lady's Ashhurst should consider me in the light of a friend, and, following her husband's example, testify her friendship for me."

Chetewood, suddenly struggling upwards from his gloomy despair, now comes to the front with valiant cheerfulness:

"All right, old fellow, and thanks, awfully, for the homily. But I've made an appointment with De Monague, which will prevent me from listening to the 'secondly.' Thank you, kindly, all the same. See you to-night at the French Ambassador's. By-by."

When Toboskie enters the parlors of his friends, the radiant smile with which Gypsy greets him is not conducive to restoring his equanimity.

Jack and his wife gather around him. Valentine—or Mrs. Gabaudie—recognizes his presence by a quiet bow. At a distant window sits Maize, her arm bound up in a sling.

They have not yet got thoroughly launched in their conversation when Toboskie's servant knocks at the door, with his master's mail, upon a portion of which is written, "Important."

Being granted permission by his hostess, he speedily tears open this letter, and commences its perusal. Then, to the surprise of all, a hoarse exclamation breaks from him, and the sheet drops to the floor. Excessively vexed at betraying his emotion, he gathers up the letter and resumes his reading; but Gypsy, glancing furtively at him, sees that a heavy frown crosses his brow, and that his face wears a positive scowl.

"Bad news?" asks Jack, in something like a roar, and offensively cheerful.

"Very," says Toboskie, briefly, and his lips are shut tightly.

Instantly Jack's handsome, ruddy visage assumes a properly forlorn expression, and he looks askance at his guest.

"Dear fathers! and that race was coming off to-morrow," again mutters Lord Ashhurst under his breath, as the ambassador is silent.

"My friends," and at last Toboskie speaks, but his tones sound a trifle unnatural, "I have received the worst possible news."

Lord Jack looks at his wife, somewhat dubious as to what is demanded of him under the circumstances, and altogether uncomfortable. It is well known that Lord Jack has a nervous horror of trouble.

"I am so sorry; and, of course, we can in no way comfort you." This, it is needless to say, from Gypsy.

"No, madame," says Toboskie, mournfully, "no one can comfort me; yet I thank you for your sympathy." Jack, with lively signs of evident depression, shuffles from one foot to the other. Both Valentine and Maize regard the foreigner, curiously. "But I will tell you my trouble, and to do that you will pardon me if I go back a little in the past," he says—and now his voice is clear and steady. "You must know that, although lenient in the extreme in some matters, my country is very rigid in maintaining its political discipline; and among its most rigorously enforced laws is that no language but Russian shall be spoken in the palace of the Czar, or in dealing in political matters, save by foreign ambassadors. I have a friend—my dearest friend on earth, save one—who is confidential secretary to the Czar. He comes of an old and noble family—a family that has given Russia her truest patriots. But, like all such, doomed—for I sometimes think it is more a curse than a blessing—like all doomed to distinction and prosperity, my friend has his enemies, who, through the means of anonymous communications, were constantly insinuating things derogatory to his fidelity to his country. One year ago, suspicion was rife against him in St. Petersburg—— But surely, madame," turning to Gypsy, "the history of my unfortunate friend can be of no interest to you?"

"Pray go on?" cries Gypsy, breathlessly—"about a year ago in St. Petersburg suspicion——"

"Well, at the time I mention, as I say, suspicion was strong against him. At that fatal epoch the Czarina had a Polish visitor of great rank. The Empress, being wholly ignorant of the language of her guest, sent for the secretary to interpret. News spread soon. When my friend left the chamber of the Czarina, at the expiration of the visit, he was seized and put under arrest as a traitor."

"Great heavens!" ejaculates Gypsy.

"He sent for me immediately. I could not think that anything serious would amount from it, relying upon the favor always shown him by his sovereign. Besides, it was such a trifling offense, and one under the circumstances unavoidable, unless, indeed, he had refused to obey the Empress. But his enemies fastened upon him like vultures, and every action of his life was perverted and misconstrued. He was accused of having intercourse with Polish enemies, and of being a renegade to his country. The Czar, though fond of the accused, dare not go contrary to the most powerful portion of this court, with whom, through jealousy, my friend had become unpopular. His statesmen held him to the letter and not the spirit of the law. It is, perhaps, unnecessary for me to say that I have done all in my power for the unfortunate man. During the most critical part of his trial I was suddenly dispatched here as ambassador, and you can, I think, imagine, my distress at leaving my oldest friend in such exigency as this. But a mutual friend has advised me regularly of the progress of the case; and to-day the final intelligence has arrived."

"Oh, what is it?" gasps Gypsy, while Jack's wide eyes bespeak his breathless interest.

"As bad as possible. He, a royal count, with heart and soul as noble as a god's and an intellect to govern nations, he is exiled for life! My friend, Lagors, has just written it." Slowly as he speaks Toboskie tears the fatal sheet into fragments and scatters them absently on the floor, while his eyes are fierce with rage and pain.

With a snort like a war-horse Jack springs to his feet, his honest face flushed with wrath.

"What an infamous law, what an execrable country!" he shouts. "Such rulers are a disgrace to the name and deserve extinction. By Jove, sir, before I would claim such a country as mine I would shoot myself, I would, by gad! I beg your pardon if you don't like it, but—to exile him for life! I——"

"Jack," says Gypsy, blandly, though her eyes are suspiciously pink. "Jack, we are none of us deaf!"

Thus recalled to himself, Jack, perspiring copiously, and a trifle ashamed of his vehemence, sinks in a chair still muttering invectives against the Russian Government.

"I never want to go to Russia," says Gypsy, decisively. "Jack, if we lose our money we will revel in our poverty and safety, and stay in England. I wouldn't go to Russia if Maize had a thousand fortunes."

But Toboskie's attention is riveted, and has been for some time, upon the child. During the recital she has drawn nearer and nearer as if influenced by some irresistible attraction, and her eyes blaze with contending emotions. Now they flash up at his in fierce scorn and indignation, and her lips are pale and drawn. He sees that she wishes to speak.

"Well?" he says, encouragingly.

"Did you say he was as noble as a god?" she speaks slowly, and they are the first civil words that she has ever addressed him.

"A nobler man never lived."

"And he is innocent?"

"Innocent as you or I."

It seems as if the wrath of an avenging and outraged God is flashing in the blazing eyes of the child; her hands clinch fiercely.

"I would rather be him than they!" she says, passionately. "God will avenge him."

Her head is thrown backwards, and the small Greek face gleams white under the burning passion. She has listened with no thought that the turbulent ocean of life may toss her across the wrecked, shattered existence of this ruined noble; that to that life, smitten in its grandeur and supremacy, stricken to the core, she may be sent its heaviest cross and fiercest agony, an agony compared with which the weary travail of the exile, the exhausted torture of endless years, will be as ease.

The sunlight gleams in the apartment; side by side stand the woman, lovely in her radiant youth, and the child, with her future splendor dawning in her face; and Toboskie looks at them—this woman who loves him, and Maize, type of the womanhood he shall some day adore. Still no presentiment of the tragedy of the future has touched him. He sees the eyes of the child deepen in their haunting, shadowy splendor, and to his fancy they hold the cry of a great supplication—sad, distant and yearning; that is all!

CHAPTER VI.—LAGORS.

THE parlor is deserted. Jack and Toboskie have gone out, while Gypsy and Maize have repaired to the former's chamber.

Valentine Gabaudie sits alone by a distant window. In the events of the past hour she has been comparatively unnoticed. She sits now as motionless as stone, and over her face a gray shadow has stolen: in her eye gleams a peculiar expression, not the look of old—that powerful flash of magnetism—but a shrinking, fearful light, like a hunted beast's, and as if she had been struck a fierce blow. Her straight black brows are contracted as though in severe bodily pain, and a quiver, almost piteous in its mute anguish, convulses her thin lips; also a spasmodic twitching occasionally seizes her delicate shoulders. Her beautiful hands are locked firmly in her lap.

She looks struck with lightning—that same dazed light of the eyes, that rigid, corpse-like look about the face, that sharp, still outline of figure. She sits there for an hour as rigid and motionless as stone. Then a child's voice floats up to her from the street below. Turning slowly, stiffly, as if every motion costs her torture, she looks out of the window and sees Maize walking with her home.

Catching a glimpse of a figure in the window of their rooms, the child throws far back her head and looks upwards. Her eyes, ever varying in their expression, are gay, dazzling, and sensuously beautiful.

A sharp, gasping cry breaks from the working lips of Valentine, and a swift convulsion of agony breaks up the stony, frozen misery of her face.

After that her stupor is entirely vanished. She rises and crosses the room to the table; at its feet are strewn the fragments of Toboskie's letter; these she picks up slowly, carefully, while her wax-like fingers quiver piteously as she touches each small fragment. When she has collected all of the pieces and placed them in her handkerchief, she goes to her room and locks herself in.

Going to a window, she kneels before a chair, and, emptying the fragments of the torn letter in her lap, commences her arduous work.

To any one but a woman instigated by a desperate purpose, this would be a hopeless task. But in Valentine's manner there are no indications of weariness or despair. With slow, accurate calculation, and a sleuth-hound's perseverance, her chiseled hands flit over the torn paper, while her swift, star-like eyes measure and study the shapes and sizes.

Hours pass; still she never falters in her weary task, and is at last rewarded. Before her, reduced to their original shape, though pieced together with infinitesimal fragments, and crossed with many zig-zag lines, are the two first lines of Toboskie's letter.

Judging by the time it has taken her to accomplish this, she has fully a night's work before her ere she completes the whole. Yet she never wavers, never even pauses to read the words, but works on, her eyes cool and steady, her face still gray, but holding a sullen, icy determination. Only once she rises from her position, and that is to procure a light, as the gray dusk settles in the chamber and the night comes speedily on.

All night long she toils on, with her entire being centred in her work; and as the first streaks of dawn appear in the east, she picks up from the few remaining pieces a square bit, and her hands tremble more violently. Turning it over she sees written upon it a single letter—L. At last she is nearing her goal.

A feverish flush stains the swarthy hue of her countenance, and afar back in her eyes gathers a red scintillating glow, while the pupils expand and protrude. Still she works on firmly and patiently.

At last her work is through! The final corner has been placed, and before her are six letters—the half dozen carelessly penned letters that she has toiled so hard to procure.

She struggles to her feet. She is stiff and sore in every joint, and the weary, exhausted weakness of mental and bodily suffering is heavy upon her. In the past hours her nerves have sustained a trial that was sufficient to madden an intellect as powerful as her own. Her eyes are dry and glittering; her face pallid as the dead.

She looks at the sheet spread upon the chair. Every one of the closely-written words represents a pang; and, even as she stands, a deadly, exquisite torture shoots through her brain and blinds her with agony.

When her eyes clear she is staring down at the letter. The fresh light of the new day steals in her chamber, and a full flood of the rising sun streams upon that name that she has traced out in travail and bitterness. Still brighter and brighter grows the glow until the word seems written in gold.

"Lagors"—she sees the name glitter and scintillate in the morning sun; the letters flash with a light unearthly; they catch all the pure, sweet glow of heaven, and dazzle and blind her weary, aching eyes with their great and wondrous glory.

She gazes at it as if confronted by a phantom, while down through the hoary vistas of the past stalk spectres of her lost youth to torture and madden her, and all the while deepens that soft, unearthly lustre.

"Oh, my God! what a mockery—what a mockery!" The words break from her in a low, hoarse whisper, and in her eyes gathers a great horror. "Light, light on that name! Oh, gracious heaven!" her face is a mass of moving muscles, and holds an agony appalling, her hands clinch and straighten alternately. "Written by his hand!" and again her lips move with a stiff, frozen action and no volition of her own. "By his hand, and I thought him dead! Oh, my God, avenge us!" She looks across the room either with intention or accident to a painting of Gypsy, and all the time in her eyes gathers a great misery. But the royal loveliness, the laughing eyes of Jack Ashhurst's wife smile down at her unmoved.

With a gasping, choking cry Valentine flings up her arms and drops downwards to the floor.

PROGRESS IN MILLING.

SIMPSON & GAULT'S EXHIBIT AT CINCINNATI.

OF the recent rapid advancements in milling, nothing will give a better idea than the international exhibition elsewhere referred to. Since Oliver Evans, nearly a century ago, built the old Brandywine Mills, some of which are still in existence, there was scarcely any improvement in milling until, within the past ten years, the wide extensions of our agricultural interests compelled inventors and millwrights to meet the heavy demand for milling machinery to grind the vast grain crops of the West and Northwest; and to-day, though Oliver Evans is still honored as a pioneer in American milling, his plans of mills have been entirely superseded by the new processes. In the presence of the giant mills of to-day, there is a curious interest in recalling the growth of human inventive genius. The primitive methods of the ancients seem now almost a part of the history of prehistoric man. We have some knowledge of the mills employed by the ancients, and from the hollow stone used, with another stone as a pestle, by Sarah, Abraham's wife, in grinding wheat that she might "prepare quickly three measures of fine meal for the strangers," we can trace the gradual advancement down to the wonderful machines of to-day. The first step from Sarah's mill was to the round, hollow stone, with an inside revolving stone—the latter supplied with upright handles, and turned by two women, who passed the upright handle one to the other. Then followed the "quern" made of flat stones, the lower one stationary, the other revolving on an upright spindle, and turned by men as they walked around like sailors around a capstan. The progress of invention towards the gradual use of animal power, wind-power, water-power and finally steam-power, is part of the history of the human race.

For our illustrations of the processes of the modern millwright, we are indebted to Messrs. Simpson & Gault, whose factory, at the corner of Front and John Streets, Cincinnati, is said to be one of the most complete in the world. The firm claims to manufacture the largest possible line of milling machinery, and its works consequently afford our artist an excellent opportunity for illustrating the latest methods of the millwright. The firm is the successor of Isaac Straub & Co., the Straub Mill Company and the Peerless Wringer Company, and its career, dating back nearly forty years, covers the entire period of the recent improvements. The factories occupy six floors, each 40 by 80 feet, at the corner of John and Front streets; two floors, each 40 by 200 feet, on John Street, and additional buildings, Nos. 57, 59 and 61 Elm Street, of four floors 40 by 80 feet each. Besides the main offices at Front and John streets, Cincinnati, the firm has offices at 8 Place Vendôme, Paris; No. 7 Poultry, London, and No. 79 Chambers Street, New York. Of the two members of the firm, Messrs. Robert Simpson and George E. Gault, the former has been actively interested in the company for the past fifteen years, while Mr. Gault, now President of the Millers' Exhibition, has also been in the business during the same length of time, first as employé and now as a member of the firm.

In the illustrations, the centre-piece shows the very handsome exhibit of the firm at the Millers' International Exhibition, the firm taking pride in the claim that the display will be the finest ever made in the world in the way of flour-mill machinery. The exhibit is a remarkably complete one, showing the entire process from the grain to the bread, the firm having placed its own baking-stove to give the public a taste of its product. The exhibit has four mill-runs, with a six-reel bolting-chest, and all the minor machinery needed for the work that has been laid out. The cost of putting up the exhibit was $6,000.

The other four views in the engraving show the finishing-shop, where the iron-work is put into shape for the various machines made by the firm; the millwright shop, where the woodwork is made for the machines; the burr-shop, where the burr-stones are taken in the rough, just as imported from the French quarries, and formed into mill-stones of different sizes; and, finally, the Elm Street factory, where the wheat-cleaning machinery is made. Many of the men employed in the factory have been with the concern fifteen or twenty years. In the line of hardware specialties, the firm manufactures clothes-wringers, fluting-machines, and the standard automatic scale, for weighing grain, flour, bran, etc., in transit. The factory is said to be the only one in the world which manufactures every machine used in a flour-mill.

POLITICAL NOTES.

THE Colorado delegates to the Chicago Convention favor the nomination of Grant.

THE Delaware Democratic Convention has instructed its delegates to vote for Bayard for President.

THERE is a strong feeling among Kentucky Democrats in favor of Judge Field's nomination for President.

THE Kansas and Mississippi Democrats have elected uninstructed delegations to the Cincinnati Convention.

THE West Virginia Greenbackers have nominated a full State ticket, composed mainly of Democratic-Greenbackers.

THE Louisiana Republican Convention last week elected 7 Grant and 7 Sherman delegates. A small Grant faction bolted and elected a solid Grant delegation.

THE Wisconsin and Minnesota Greenbackers have elected delegates to the National Greenback Convention, some of whom favor Solon Chase, of Maine, for President.

IN the Eighth Illinois District Mr. L. E. Payson has been nominated for Congress by the Republicans, in place of Representative Fort, who declined a renomination.

THE Republicans of Louisiana have nominated Congressmen as follows: Third District, Taylor Beattie; Fourth, George Williamson; Fifth, James S. Mathews; Sixth, Charles E. Anderson.

THE Missouri delegation to the National Democratic Convention, though uninstructed, stands 18 against Mr. Tilden and 12 for him. The resolutions in his favor were killed in the committee.

A MEETING of Democratic members of Congress from the Southern States was held last week to promote the claims of W. R. Morrison, of Illinois, for the Presidential nomination at Cincinnati.

The Moss Industry in Louisiana.

THE Louisiana moss industry is one of the important industries of New Orleans. In common with all Southern manufacturing interests, it has its days of flush and its days of gloom in business. At present, however, the depression seems about over, and the trade is attaining its former respectable proportions. The history of the manipulation of moss is very simple. It is gathered mostly by negroes, who devote a spare hour of the day to such work. After a tree is stripped it is allowed to rest for seven years, during which period of time the moss renews itself. Cypress moss is preferred, as it is the longest and most tenacious of all the varieties. After the moss is gathered, it is placed on a sunny spot, and left a month to the action of wind and weather. At the end of that time the grayish bark peels off, leaving the hair almost clean. Some of the moss requires no manipulation, while other accruments are, in weight, more than half dirt. After being thus dried, the material is sold to the plantation storekeeper or to the cross-roads grocery-man, and the gatherer receives from one to two cents a pound for it, according to its quality. The stuff is baled and taken to New Orleans for manufacture. After the moss reaches the factory it is subjected to the action of the washer, which is a large cylindrical arrangement with a wheel inside, which pulls the moss hither and thither, and dashes it through a vat of boiling water and soap, until the stuff is cleaned. Then it is hung out upon the racks to dry. This done, it is put into the duster, a fan mill, which entirely removes all the dust that may have survived the washing process. As a result, the moss comes into the factory yellow in color and goes out inky black. The article is then made up into bales according to quality, and lettered with single, double, treble and quadruple X's. The highest grade, XXXX, can scarcely be distinguished from the finest and choicest horse-hair. The other grades are consumed mostly in Louisiana.

The Condition of Russia.

THERE can be scarcely a doubt that Russia is gradually drifting into a condition fraught with the gravest danger to the stability of the existing régime. For several years past nothing has been done by the Government to ameliorate the internal condition of the country, and in the meanwhile a number of evils have cropped up, enhancing the peril already existing before them. We refer especially to the misery produced among the masses by the repeated failure of harvests, the ravages of the cattle plague, the rampant condition of many epidemic diseases, and the unsettled character of the land question, together with the evils inflicted by the corruption of Government officials, the dishonesty of municipal, local and commercial functionaries, and an inflated system of foreign trade. At this moment hundreds of peasants are dying of hunger in the district bordering upon the mouth of the Volga, and epidemic diseases are carrying off thousands of victims in Pultowa, Saratoff and Koursk. It was known during the Winter that a scarcity existed in the South Volga provinces, but nothing was done to dispatch food to the afflicted districts, and now that the roads are broken up by the thawing of the snow, it is impossible to convey succor to the starving peasantry. Within recent years the death rate in many villages in Russia has been higher than at Sierra Leone, owing to the enormous spread of diphtheria and typhus, and the scarcity of doctors, brought about by the dispatch of so many medical men to the seat of war and the exiling of discontented students. As to the cattle plague, its ravages have been such that in many provinces scarcely a village has remained unvisited by it, and the annual loss sustained by the peasants is calculated to reach many millions.

During the last decade bad harvests have become a permanent feature in South Russia, and although it is known that they are partly due to the reckless destruction of forests in the North, and the exhaustive system—or want of system—of farming in vogue among the peasants, nothing has been done to check either the one or the other evil. The corruption of the officials is nothing new, it may be asserted; but it is certainly fresh that the Emperor, by his want of determination in dealing with army frauds in Bulgaria, has stimulated Government functionaries to greater boldness; while the leniency with which the Administration treats dishonest bank-directors and financial swindlers is rotting the commercial fabric of Russia to the very core. A not unimportant factor in mercantile fraud is the existing subsidy system for promoting native manufactures and trade. Every week sees some fresh mushroom company springing into existence, whose only object is to fill the pockets of the directors—mostly public officials—with the rubles of gullible shareholders and the subsidies of the State.

The World's Coffee Production.

IT is estimated that the total production of coffee throughout the world in 1878 amounted to about 1,080,075,000 pounds, the proportion yielded by the principal coffee-growing countries being as follows: Brazil, 490,100,000 pounds; the Dutch Indies, 201,090,560 pounds; Ceylon and British India, 117,529,280 pounds; West Indies, 91,960,000 pounds; South Africa, 79,178,000 pounds; Central America, 71,500,000 pounds; West Africa, 8,8 0,000 pounds; the Philippines, 7,472,960 pounds; Arabia, 6,114,000 pounds; South Sea Islands, 330,000 pounds. The greatest consumption of coffee is believed to take place in Holland, where nearly 18 pounds per head of the population are consumed every year. Belgium comes next, taking 9 pounds per head per annum; Norway consumes 8½ pounds; the United States, 8¼ pounds; France, 6¼; Germany, 5, and England only 1 pound.

Manners of German Officers.

GERMAN officers are undoubtedly the most highly educated in the world. They can only get promotion by assiduous study, and they take a professional pride in a culture which places them immeasurably above their men. In this respect they truly form an aristocracy. Again, they have a strict code of honor which is kept in force by dueling, and which lays upon them the necessity of being very correct in their behavior not only towards each other but towards civilians. A German officer can only fight a duel with a man who is socially his equal, and he is expected to fight whenever he is insulted, so that if he gets dragged into a disreputable brawl with an inferior, he finds himself in a dilemma from which there is no escape except by throwing up his commission. Some years ago a Prussian officer had his face slapped in the streets of Coblentz by a baker: he drew out his sword and cut down his aggressor like a dog, there and then. Public opinion took his side, for, had he let the affront pass, he must have left the army; as it was, he got tried by court-martial, and was sentenced to a month's imprisonment—not for killing a baker, but for having a street quarrel with such a person.

Lord Dufferin's Strange Uniform.

I CANNOT resist going a long way out of my "beat" to reproduce a capital and most characteristic story told of Lord Dufferin in a St. Petersburg letter which I have before me. His lordship, it seems, has made himself a great favorite in the Russian capital by the charm of his manner, by his good humor, and especially by his droll originality, which is not at all in keeping with the ideas that have hitherto obtained in Russia relative to the stiffness of high diplomacy. At the fête of the regiments of the guard the other day, which the Emperor, the Czarowitz and the members of the imperial family always attend, and to which most of the political notabilities and all the diplomatic body were invited this year, the British Ambassador appeared in a uniform that attracted general attention, for nothing so singular had ever before been seen in St. Petersburg. The writer says, indeed, that his Excellency's arrival created a "sensation." He wore a thick cloth jerkin confined at the waist by a belt, and on his head a helmet in polished leather, his appearance being half Chinese mandarin, half London policeman. Everybody was asking his neighbor to what peculiar corps in the British army such paraphernalia could possibly belong; and, at last, after considerable circumlocution, a high official personage ventured to ask his lordship for a solution of the delicate question that had created so much curiosity among all the old generals and military men present. To the utter amazement of his interlocutor, Lord Dufferin replied, with his usual smile, that he thought it would be appropriate if he donned his uniform as honorary member of the Quebec Fire Brigade for the occasion; and from that moment forth the proceedings which, until then had been rather dull, were the gayest possible. The fun of the idea put everybody in good humor.

Exiles in Siberia.

THE popular idea of the fate of prisoners sentenced to hard labor in the mines of Siberia is a somewhat exaggerated one. It is generally believed that a man condemned to work in the Siberian mines is virtually condemned to death; that when he descends into his mine he says good-by to the light of heaven for ever, being kept underground until he dies; and that living as he thus does, amid unhealthy fumes, death is not long in coming. The correspondent of the London Times, having heard these statements before he went to Siberia, appears to have taken some trouble to ascertain whether they are true or not, and, after many inquiries, "Common fairness," he writes, "compels me to say that every one denied that there was any foundation for them. Even," he continues, "the few Poles who spoke so bitterly of the Government, did not bring this to their charge; nor did I meet any of the convicts who said as much." On the contrary the silver mines were, so far as he could learn, worked on the twelve-and sometimes even on the eight-hour system; while in the gold mines, which he himself visited, the men worked in Summer from six in the morning till seven at night, with intervals of rest for meals. In the coal mines also the men only work for twelve hours a day, and an officer informed the writer that the amount of work alloted to each man per day ought to be got through by an energetic workman in about two hours. On the other hand, it appears that flogging is not infrequently inflicted in a barbarous manner in Siberia. At three stations, but apparently at three stations only—at Kara, Nicolaievsk and Saghalien—an instrument called the "troichatka," or plait, is used. From twenty to fifty stripes are usually administered, though the number may be made a hundred; and the writer adds that "when the heavy numbers are inflicted, the punishment must be little short of an execution. Sometimes, in fact, the convicts do not recover from its effects."

A Valuable Gem.

THE Berlin Börsen Zeitung says that the Prussian capital has long contained a jewel of quite fabulous value, the news of whose existence was first made known to the general public by the reports of the last session of the Polytechnic Society. This noble stone is a sapphire, and is the property of one of the members of that learned body. It weighs "12½ loth"—a little more than six ounces. The jury of the Polytechnic Society, on grounds stated in full at their discussion, have settled its value at the frightful sum of 64,000,000 of marks, or £3,200,000 of English money. It need scarcely be said that such a treasure is not very likely to find a purchaser at such a price.

It is contended by some of the adepts that the stone is not perfectly pure, so that its price may, perhaps, be reduced; but it can never be so far lowered as to tempt the richest and most eccentric collector in the world to give anything like the sum which must be asked for it. In the year 1872 a Berlin mineralogist offered to go as far as 67,500 marks, but in vain, as the unique jewel had already been refused in 1860 to a German Prince who had offered a far larger price. Its present possessor has placed his treasure in State custody for the sake of his heir, as the Börsen Zeitung says; though we imagine that its future owner will not find it easy to realize anything more solid than distinction out of this very exceptional piece of property. All the experts who have scrutinized the sapphire agree that it is a genuine corundum. The "sappir" of the books of Exodus and Ezekiel, like the "sapphires" of Pliny, were probably our lapis-lazuli.

Professor Henry Tanner, F.C.S., Senior Member of the Royal Agricultural College, and Examiner in the Principles of Agriculture under the Government Department of Science, has been appointed Professor of the Principles of Agriculture in the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester.

The Phylloxera has made its appearance in the vineyards on Vesuvius and the opposite part of the Gulf at Portici and Pianura. Much alarm prevails. Precautionary measures are being taken. In Sicily the phylloxera, till now confined to Catania, is likewise reported near Messina.

A Large and influential committee of shipbuilders and marine engineers has been formed in Glasgow for the purpose of promoting an exhibition of naval and marine engineering models in Glasgow. It is proposed that the exhibition shall be opened in the Corporation Galleries in November and remain open for six months.

The Municipal Council of Paris have visited the peninsula of Gennevilliers, to ascertain the results of irrigation with the discharge from the sewers. These have been found splendid, and the agricultural population of the district is very well satisfied with them. Other lands are to be found for utilizing the remaining part of the sewage of Paris. The city engineers proposed to irrigate land in the vicinity of the forest of St. Germain, but the inhabitants have sent petitions against the project, and deputations have met the Municipal Council. At all events, it is supposed the opposition will be overruled by the city authorities, unless Parliament vetoes the further extension of sewage irrigation.

The German Paper-makers have found another use for paper. They manufacture stoves of that material, in which the fire blazes cheerfully without inflicting the slightest damage to the paper that incases it. Paper blankets are made that are as warm as their woolen prototypes and very much cheaper, but, of course, not durable. They are peculiarly adapted to the use of hospitals in regions smitten with infectious diseases, because of the facility with which they can be destroyed, and thus avoid the spread of contagion. Poor people intrusted with the task of destroying infected bed clothing prefer to preserve them by washing, and thus propagate disease. Pasteboard shutters, in imitation of wood, are another novelty. The varied uses to which paper is now applied, from car-wheels to water-buckets and flour-barrels, may account in a measure for the advance in price that presses so hard upon newspaper publishers.

Dr. Nils Johann Andersson, the celebrated Swedish botanist and traveler, died after long suffering on March 27th at Stockholm. Andersson was born on February 20th, 1821, studied at Upsal, graduated as Doctor of Philosophy in 1845, and resided at the University as Assistant Professor of Botany. Afterwards he took part in the expedition of the frigate Eugénie round the world, 1851-1853, the result of which he published in several treatises, which were translated into various foreign languages. In 1855 he became Demonstrator of Botany at Lund, and in the following year was appointed permanent Professor of Botany, Director of the Bergianska Trädgården and Superintendent of the botanical division of the Royal Museum. There he worked with great success till the beginning of 1873. From here Andersson undertook numerous journeys in the cause of science to Lapland, Norway, Germany, France, England, etc. He also acquired scientific renown through his various treatises, books of travel and text-books.

THE South Carolina Legislature has appropriated $15,000 for a bronze statue of General Daniel Morgan, the hero of Cowpens. The committee of arrangements are anxious that Mr. J. Q. A. Ward should do the work.

THEODORE THOMAS sailed for Europe, May 26th, on a pleasure trip of three or four months. On the same day Capoul, Angèle, Paola Marié, and the other members of Maurice Grau's French Opera Troupe, left our shores.

MR. HENRY WINKLER, of Philadelphia, has recently sent a check for $20,000 to be added to the permanent fund of Dartmouth College. A short time ago he also sent the sum of $5,000 to the Daniel Webster professorship of that institution.

THE President and Mrs. Hayes will remain at the White House until the last of next month, and will then go out as usual to the Soldiers' Home. Mrs. Hayes has isolated herself in a great measure since her brother's death, receiving only intimate friends.

LADY COWPER, the wife of the new Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, is described as an accomplished sportswoman, few men being able to throw a trout or salmon fly with more dexterity; and, Henry rifle in hand, she has proved herself an excellent huntress.

GENERAL SIR GARNET WOLSELEY and staff have arrived in England from South Africa. Sir Bartle Frere has not been recalled from South Africa because he is engaged in arranging a scheme of colonial confederation which must be given a fair chance.

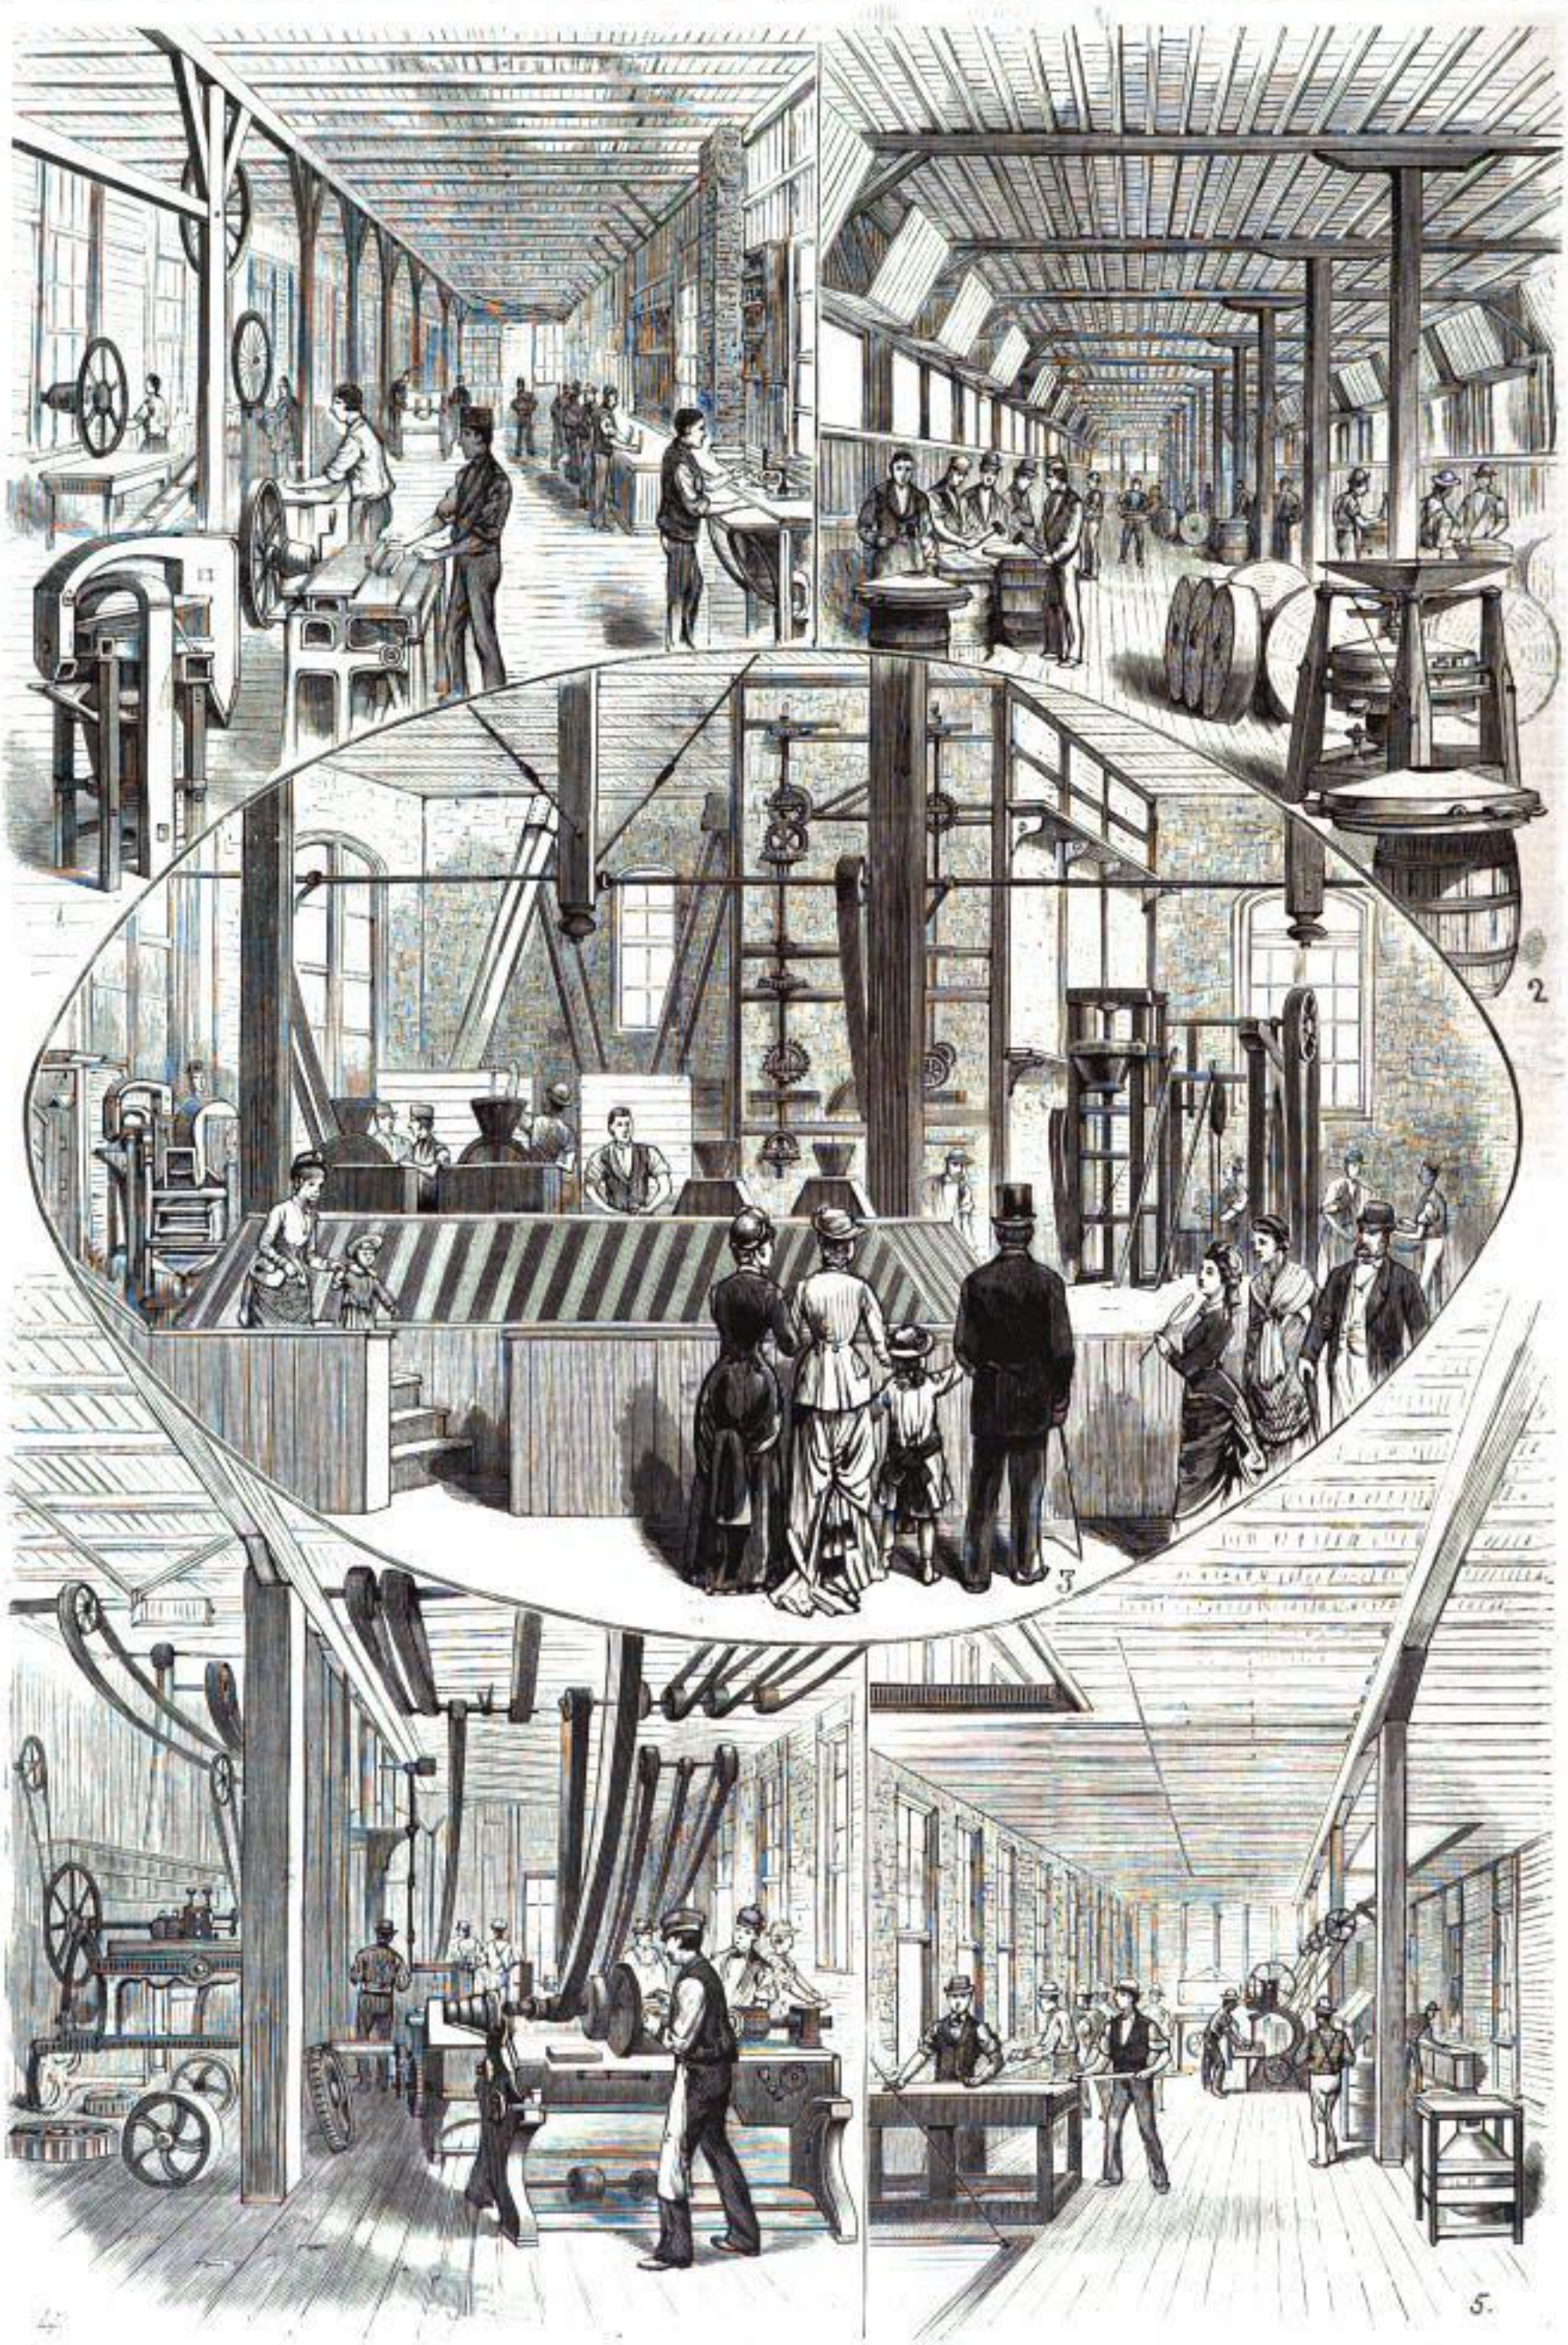
MRS. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT lives in a large and pretty house in South Kensington, within a few doors of Mme. Albani. It is surrounded by trees and flowers, and furnished with the modern art draperies and quantities of pictures and old China.

PROFESSOR PROCTOR delivered 136 lectures from the time he arrived in the United States, last October, to the date of his sailing from San Francisco to Australia, the 12th of May. The gross receipts were $10,000, with a clear profit to Proctor of some $15,000.

MRS. TYLER, the widow of the ex-President, lives at Sherwood Forest, the Tyler estate on the James River, not having retired, as was reported, to a convent, nor to the Louise Home. Her daughter, her little granddaughter and herself have all been received into the Catholic Church.

MR. CHARLES READE, since his reported conversion to Congregationalism, is said to be a most diligent student of the Bible, the whole bent of his mind being now towards attaining Christian knowledge and doing Christian work. It is said, further, that he is meditating upon a delineation of Scripture characters and events.

MR. JAMES D. PUTNAM, of Buffalo, N. Y., who was last week nominated for Minister to Belgium in place of R. C. Goodloe, resigned, has been a life-long friend of Secretary Evarts. He was formerly a member of the New York Senate. He is a lawyer by profession, but has of late years devoted his attention mainly to classical works.



THE father of the House of Commons has again been returned to it in the person of Mr. Mansel-Talbot, who has sat for Glamorganshire since 1830. The fact that a man of seventy-seven should have refused a peerage and sought re-election is significant of the fascinations which the House, reputed "the pleasantest club in London," exercises over its members.

CAPTAIN HOWGATE, the Arctic explorer, has just given a quaint water party near Washington. He engaged a packet of the Chesapeake and Cumberland Canal, and with three horses attached he conveyed his guests through some of the most romantic scenery in the country. Striped awnings protected them from the glare, and a table full of good things helped to brighten the novel expedition to the Great Falls of the Potomac.

THE death is noted of James H. Fyfe, the Scottish journalist; Andrew Findley, Jr., a prominent member of the New York Stock Exchange and the Union League Club; John Curwen, the English writer on music and promoter of singing in Sunday schools; James Booth, C.B., the veteran English statesman; Giuseppe Mazzoni, Senator of the Italian Kingdom, Grand Master of Italian Freemasons, and formerly Triumvir in Tuscany; John Murphy, the veteran Catholic publisher of Baltimore.

MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS, at a magnificent dinner-party given in honor of her birthday in one of the finest mansions of this city, announced herself as seventy years of age. This would place her among the oldest lady authors of the country, and might well entitle her to retirement from a long and prosperous literary career; but this thought does not seem to present itself to her mind—her popularity is rooted too deep for change. She never wrote more or better than she does now, never commanded higher prices, or gave more promise of professional usefulness. Socially Mrs. Stephens has been for years a feature in our metropolitan society, and those who have enjoyed her hospitality in the pretty bijou of a house which she occupies with her daughter, up-town, find her full of rare conversational brilliancy, of energy and cheerfulness, and surrounded by pictures, books and rare objets d'art collected during her foreign travels, and enjoying, to the utmost, all that is artistic and beautiful in life. Those who meet Mrs. Stephens almost daily in her drive to the Park, accompanied by her daughter, in her well appointed brougham, will find it difficult to realize that she has not claimed fifteen or twenty years more than really belong to her.

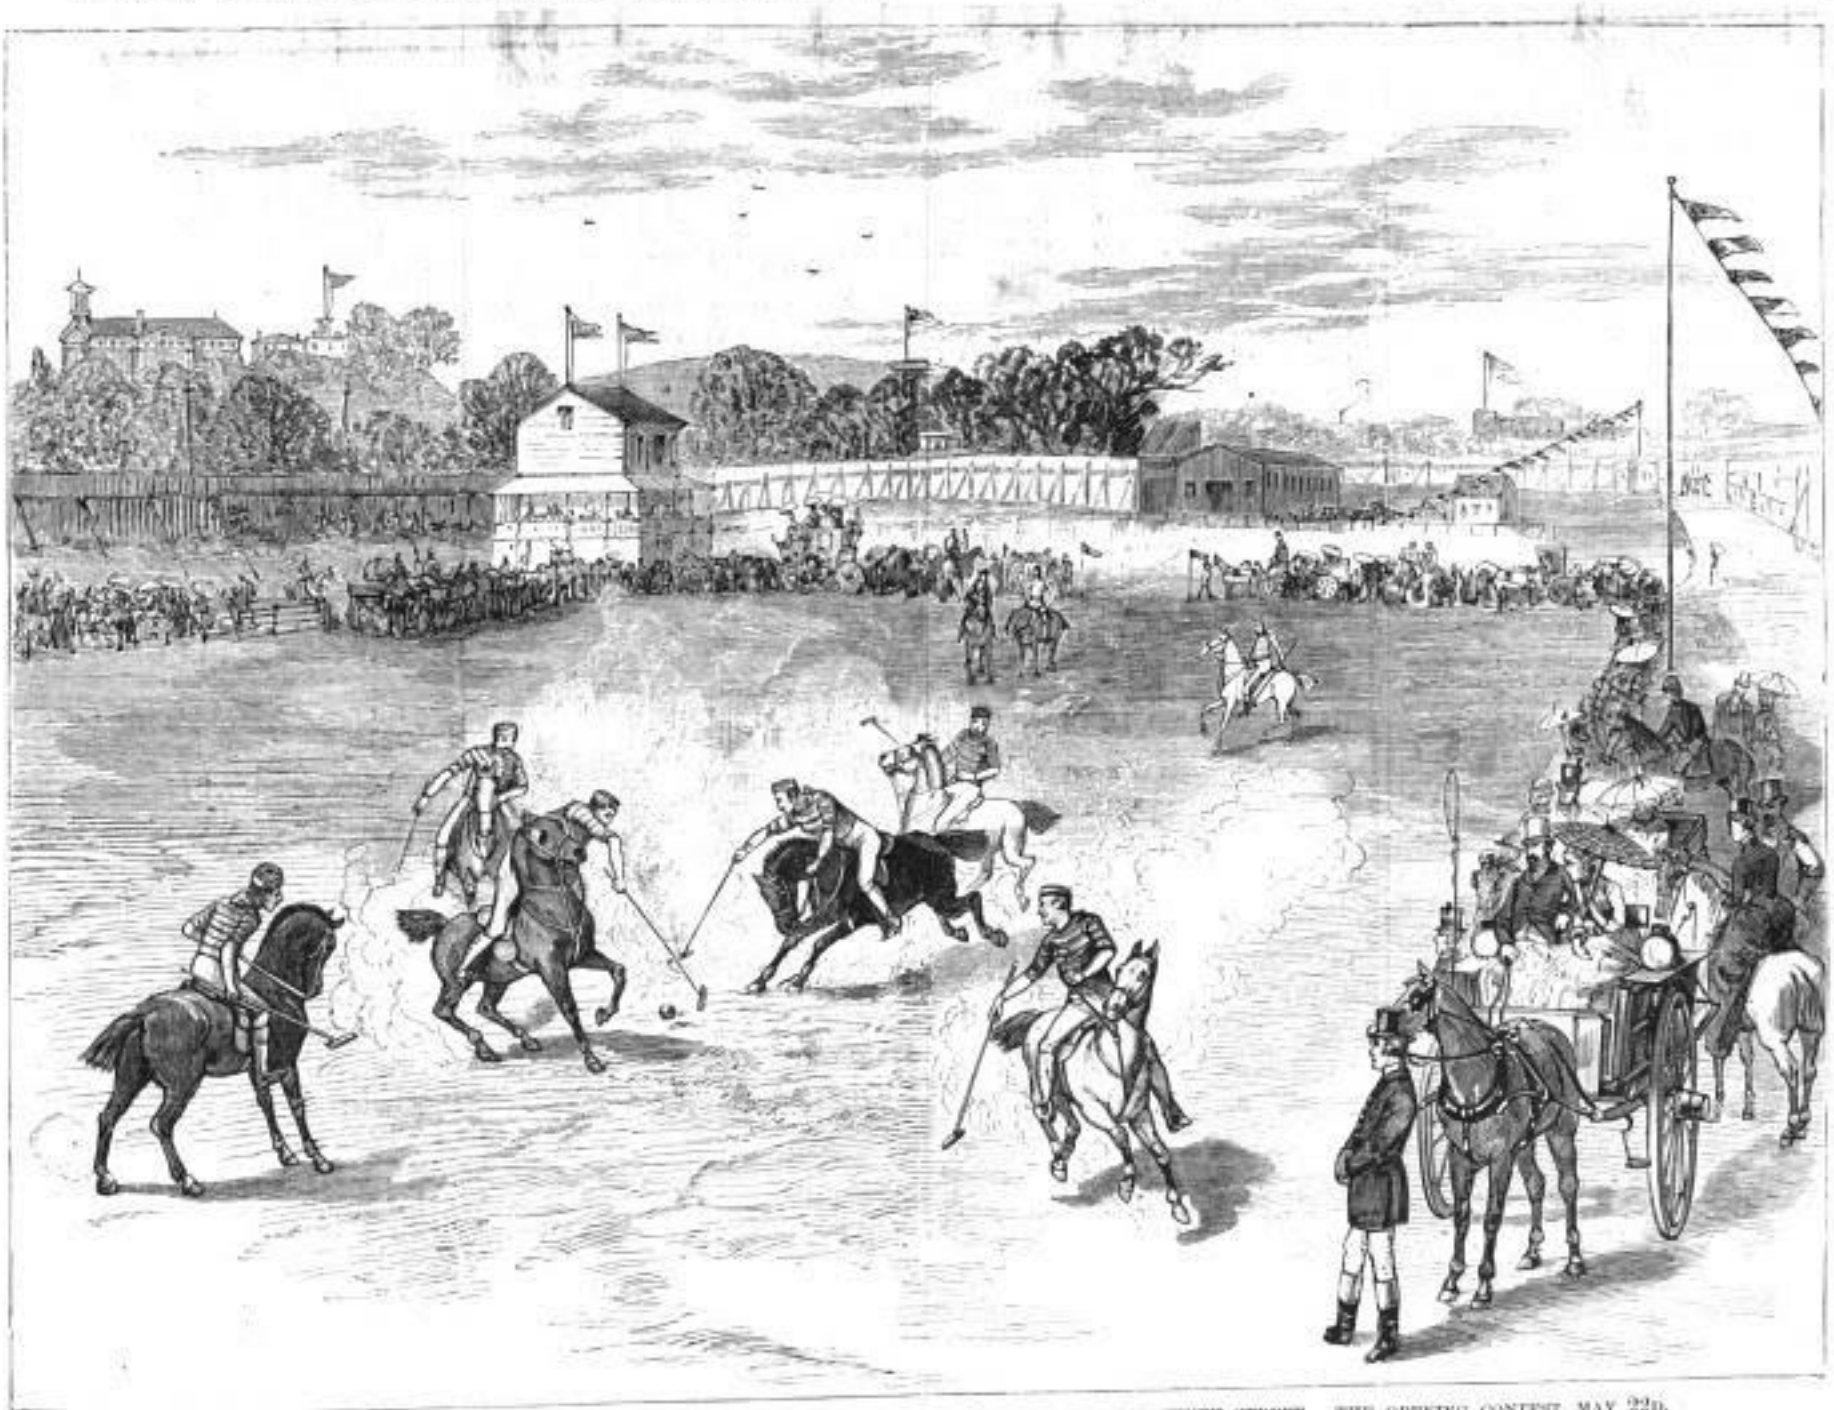
WISCONSIN.—NEW BUILDING OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AT MILWAUKEE.

NEW CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

THE new building for the Chamber of Commerce, now in process of erection in Milwaukee, Wis., will rank, when completed, with the most beautiful structures ever put up in the interests of commerce. Conspicuously it stands at the corner of Broadway and Michigan Street. Its style is the modern conventional Italian, devoid of excessive ornamentation, the grandest effect being given by bold handling of the parts, substantiality of material, and thoroughness of structural detail. It will cover half the block. The principal façade is on Michigan Street, the most striking feature of the building being the grand entrance and a campanile rising above it to the height of 160 feet. The new structure is expected to cost in the neighborhood of $500,000.

The St. Louis Merchants' Exchange Building is said to be larger, cost $2,000,000, and is of classic design of great elegance. With this exception, possibly, there is not a similar structure in any American city that will compare in size and beauty with the Milwaukee Chamber. It is expected that the building will be ready for occupation by October 1st. We are indebted to E. P. Bacon & Co. for the view from which our engraving is made.

MR. GEORGE E. GAULT.



MR. GEORGE E. GAULT, who was elected President of the Millers' International Exhibition by the joint committees appointed by the Board of Trade and Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati to conduct the business of the Exposition, is of the firm of Simpson & Gault, manufacturers of milling machinery. The choice was a happy one, as, by his long experience with the branch of industry which forms the nucleus of the exhibition, Mr. Gault has been enabled to bring to bear a positive knowledge of the needs of such an exhibition, and to foresee, in a large measure, its results. Mr. Gault's wide business acquaintance, too, has done much towards insuring the success of the Exhibition now in progress, and especially in securing representations from abroad.

THE NEW POLO GROUNDS.

THE new grounds of the Manhattan Polo Association, between One Hundred and Tenth and One Hundred and Twelfth Streets and Fifth and Sixth Avenues, were opened on Saturday, May 22d, in handsome style, although the ground had been hastily put in condition for the inaugural contest. The polo ground runs east and west, and on the south and west sides are graveled walks and flower-beds. An unfinished club-house stands in the southwest corner of the grounds, and some distance to the north of it are the stables for the ponies. To the south of the centre of the field is the "garden," a reserved inclosure grassed over and filled with campstools. Here Grafulla's Seventh Regiment Band was placed during the afternoon, and furnished enjoyable music before and during the games.

The game on Saturday as well as that on the Wednesday following was witnessed by a large and appreciative company, and the new venture may be said to be a success from the start. Even to those not specially interested in polo these games offer attractions as a pleasant way of passing a few hours after a day's business down-town. By taking the elevated train to One Hundred and Sixteenth Street, and thence a cab (for which five cents fare will be charged) to the grounds, a sight may be had of the field, the players and the visitors, while listening to a good concert led by Grafulla, for the nominal admission fee of twenty-five cents, a sum much less than that charged by any similar association. The admission fee has been fixed at a low figure in order to place within the means of every one a visit to these and to all games that may be contested on the polo grounds.

A REVITALIZER.

THIS you will find in the new "COMPOUND OXYGEN TREATMENT," which is now attracting such universal attention. It is especially valuable where from any cause there exists great physical and nervous exhaustion. All convalescents will find in it just the help they need for full and quick recovery, because it acts as a revitalizer. A Treatise on "COMPOUND OXYGEN," containing a large number of testimonials to most remarkable cures, will be sent free by mail. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard St., Phila., Pa.

PROFESSOR—"Which is the more delicate of the senses?" Sophomore—"The touch." Professor—"Prove it." Sophomore—"When you sit on a tack. You can't hear it; you can't see it; you don't taste it; you can't smell it; but it's there."

PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT.

FAULT-FINDING is so seldom indulged in by those who use the medicines manufactured by the World's Dispensary Medical Association, that the President of that corporation, the Hon. R. V. Pierce, M.D., has issued a special request or proclamation to any and all persons, if there be any such, who may have taken or shall hereafter use any of the family medicines now made and sold by the said Association, in all the countries of the world, and who have not derived full benefit from said medicines, that if they will write the said Association a description of their maladies, the Faculty of the Dispensary will advise them with respect to the successful treatment of their diseases. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is guaranteed to cure all humors, from the common blotch, pimple or eruption to the worst scrofula or king's evil, and those virulent poisons that lurk in the system as a sequel or secondary affection resulting from badly treated or neglected primary diseases. It also cures bronchial, throat and lung diseases. Favorite Prescription is guaranteed to cure female weaknesses and kindred affections. Extract of Smart-Weed cures bowel affections, colds, and all painful, rheumatic and neuralgic affections. Dr. Pierce's Pellets (little sugar-coated pills) are the little giant cathartic. Address, World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y., or Great Russell Street Buildings, London, Eng.

BEATTY'S PIANOS AND ORGANS.

WE are reliably informed that the sales of Mayor Beatty's Pianos and Organs were never larger than now. He is receiving thousands of testimonials in favor of his celebrated instruments, and we take pleasure in publishing the following:

F. M. Webster, Esq., Attorney-at-Law, Newport, Ky., after purchasing three of Beatty's celebrated Pianos, writes as follows: "I deem it perhaps due to you to say that the Beatty Piano I purchased from you last Summer has greatly improved in tone, and we are highly pleased with it. The two Pianos I purchased previously for my daughters continue to give entire satisfaction."

Rev. Chas. Wheeler Dennison, Washington, D. C., and husband of the famous authoress, Mrs. M. A. Dennison, writes: "I have great pleasure in informing you that the Beatty Piano and Organ have been received, and that they both give us the highest satisfaction. Allow me to refer you to the accompanying note from Mrs. Dennison, which, I will add for your information, is entirely a voluntary testimony on her part. Anything further I can do to serve you shall be cheerfully and promptly done by your obedient servant,

"CHARLES WHEELER DENNISON.

AWARDS AT SYDNEY, N. S. W.,

TO PHILADELPHIA BOOK PUBLISHERS.

AS INCOMPLETE lists of the awards to American exhibitors at the International Exhibition held at Sydney, N. S. W., have been published in some papers, we take pleasure in saying that the Official Book of Awards has just come to hand, and that PORTER & COATES, the well-known publishers, have received a first award for "Books with splendidly-engraved pictures, especially the 'Fireside Encyclopædia of Poetry,' and the pictures of 'American Industries' show a high standard of artistic merit."

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE should be taken when suffering with headache.

A QUARTER of a dollar can scarcely be more wisely expended than in a year's subscription to the American Garden, by B. K. Bliss & Sons, of this city. Every line of its handsome pages is of substantial value to the intelligent gardener who desires to make the most of his land and labor.

LOOK out for falling bricks, runaway teams, careless people, etc., and insure in THE TRAVELERS.

"THE FOOL'S ERRAND" is the most conspicuous success of the day in books, and the political campaign now opening will greatly increase its sale and popularity. Its studies and character-sketches of Southern life and politics are at once accurate and masterly, commanding universal attention as the most truthful portrayal ever given of some of the gravest political and social problems of the times.

A COMBINED LAWN, Beach and Boat Canopy called the "Oriental Sunshade" is for sale and manufactured by Messrs. PECK & SNYDER of this city. It makes a perfect shield from the sun's rays for ten persons. Can be adjusted in a few minutes and tilted to any pitch. It is well worth five dollars.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE.—Best relish in use for family use. Preferable to all others.

"WHERE shall I stop?" is the query frequently put by the visitor to New York. This question can easily be settled in favor of the ST. NICHOLAS hotel, now, as ever, the leader among metropolitan hostelries. Its furniture, fittings, apartments, conveniences and table are, beyond comparison, the most suited to please the fastidious taste. Rates only $3.50 a day, the safe-below price.

IN this number will be found the advertisement of the STOCKTON HOTEL, Cape May, N. J. This house, which accommodates one thousand guests, is under the management of Col. Charles Duffy, of the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia, and is justly celebrated for its order and comfort. At no seaside resort can a more agreeable home be found, and no one need fear that he will not be well taken care of and handsomely entertained by "mine host," Col. Duffy.

A FOOL'S ERRAND.

From Maine to Texas the new mode of salutation has come to be: "Have you read that book?" "What book?" "The one written by 'One of the Fools,' and dedicated 'to other members of the family.' You must get that; everybody is reading it!"

Your best friend suggests it as the most enjoyable thing he knows: the chance acquaintance and the stranger refer to it at once as the uppermost topic. For months the newspaper correspondent has doped his nimble pen into every possible item of gossip about the author and his book. The great dailies devoted two, three, and four columns to extracts from it, and comments on its power and popularity. It even aroused the sober monthlies and quarterlies. The "International Review" says:

"It is nothing less than an extraordinary work. In matter, it is intensely interesting; in manner, it is forcible and vivid to a rare degree. English literature contains no similar picture.

It is only about once in a generation that a book appears which is at once and universally accepted as a marked element in life and literature. About thirty years ago Mrs Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" aroused the world with indignation over the wrongs of a race. And now this "FOOL'S ERRAND," by One of the Fools has seized upon the popular imagination, and for six solid months has been running through edition after edition as fast as it could be printed.

IT IS THE MARKED BOOK OF THIS GENERATION.

So great has been the demand for it that the publishers have had duplicate sets of plates made, and now it is kept printing simultaneously in New York and in Boston.

The public verdict Confirms the Cincinnati Commercial's remark of last November.

"IT IS A THRILLING BOOK, INDEED."

Sold at all Bookstores, and at all the Elevated R. R. News-stands. Price, One Dollar.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines—the Louis and the Baden Baden—covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

REAL COMFORT.

Every one should own a good Hammock. There is no other one article that will give one-half so much enjoyment in warm weather as a hammock stretched in the shade, and any one who does not own one misses much of the pleasure to be obtained in the summer months. If you are going on a vacation into the woods or to the seashore, take a Hammock with you; it will repay its cost hundreds of times. The most common Hammock in the country is the imported Mexican Grass Hammock; this is made of vegetable fibre and soon rots and unravels. The Hammock we offer is the Gossamer Interwove Hammock, made of doubled and twisted cotton cord, knotted at every mesh. It can be cut almost to pieces, yet it will not unravel, and it will never rot, lasting for years, and out-wearing a dozen Imported Hammocks. They weigh almost nothing, and can be carried in the pocket. They are handsomely trimmed, and woven in beautiful fast colors, with Patent Swivel Nickel Rings. The regular price is $2.50; we will send a Gossamer Hammock to any address, by express, for $2.00; by mail, post-paid, 25 cents extra.

THE NASHVILLE CENTENNIAL.

UNVAILING THE STATUE OF JACKSON.

THE crowning event of the Nashville Centennial was the unveiling, March 30th, of the equestrian statue of General Jackson, erected by the people of Tennessee on the beautiful grounds surrounding the Capitol. The day was a delightful one, and the city was crowded with visitors, at least 30,000 persons witnessing the ceremonies, while perhaps 50,000 more thronged the streets. The city was dressed in holiday attire, flags and bunting streaming from every building. The display of the Stars and Stripes—the flag of the nation—was conspicuously remarkable. The principal streets were spanned by beautiful arches handsomely decorated with evergreen. Tributes of the floral kingdom were in profusion on every side, and every window and balcony was adorned with belles of handsome women.

The procession included military companies from New Orleans, Atlanta, Memphis, Nashville, and other cities, and was headed by carriages containing the Governors of Tennessee and Kentucky, Generals Joseph E. Johnston, Buell, E. Kirby Smith, and many other distinguished guests. Five veterans of Jackson's campaigns also rode in the line. The procession was everywhere greeted with cheers, and as a spectacular display fairly deserved the applause which it received. On Capitol Hill, to which the procession made its way, the formal ceremonies were opened by music, followed by an address of welcome from DR. T. A. Atchison, President of the Centennial Board of Directors. Prayer was then offered, after which the oration of the day was delivered by Hon. John F. House, who ably reviewed the life and exploits of the grand old patriot whose achievements contributed so largely to make our country what it is. Mr. House's portraiture of his courage and fidelity to conscience was especially admirable: "He was as near the master of every situation of danger and responsibility in which he was placed as any man who was ever called upon to face the one or assume the other. He never lost the courage of his convictions in any presence. The supreme hour, the crucial test, always found him self-poised, like the magnificent war-horse on which the genius of the sculptor has mounted his martial form to ride through the future ages. The mingled blood of two races ran through his veins and imparted to his nature some of the best characteristics of both. When aroused he was as terrible as a tornado, but in the social circle with his friends as mild and gentle as a woman. His devotion and fidelity to his wife comes out as a rainbow, to span with its beauty and promise every storm cloud that rises on the horizon of his life. He was a man of strong passions, and when acting under their impulse not, perhaps, always just—no man is. But it was not in his nature to do conscious or intentional injustice to any one.

In concluding his address, Mr. House closed with these words, which elicited loud applause: "Tennessee has no future, no aspirations, no hopes save in a restored Union, and to-day, within the shadow of Jackson's statue, without mental reservation or purpose of evasion, but in sincerity and truth, she can repeat to her sister States the immortal words of her immortal son—'The Federal Union, it must be preserved!'"

Mr. Clark Mills, the sculptor, briefly explained the incidents connected with the origin of the statue, which was followed by the singing of an ode written for the occasion by Rev. F. W. Peschau. At its conclusion, Mr. Enoch Jones, an old soldier under Jackson, drew the cord and the canvas fell on either side, displaying the statue and a member from each military company present, who added, with their bright uniforms, greatly to the beauty of the scene presented. As the statue was thus unveiled, the vast multitude broke into shouts of applause, which was taken up and echoed by the rapid discharge of cannon by the Burns Tennessee Light Artillery. The military companies then moved out from the plazza, around which they had taken position, and a dense throng collected about the statue to give it a close inspection. All were enthusiastic in praise of the great work of art.

The temporary pedestal of the statue, although made of wood, is of unique pattern and does credit to the good taste of General G. P. Thurston, who drew the design and saw it executed. It is painted a stone-color and is weather-proof. On the western and eastern sides appears the words "Jackson." The statue fronts to the northward, with the head of the horse turned towards the Capitol.

In the afternoon of the day there was a grand review of the military in the fair grounds by Governor Marks, Governor Hendricks, General Joseph E. Johnston, General G. Pennypacker, U.S.A.; General Don Carlos Buell, Major Generals Behan, Bate, Cheatham, Anderson, Palmer, Kirby Smith, and other distinguished gentlemen, in the presence of 20,000 persons. On the previous day there had been a competitive artillery and military drill of the visiting companies, and after the review the first prize ($1,000) was awarded to the Chickasaw Guards, of Memphis, and the second ($500) to Company K, St. Louis National Guards. The Porter Rifles, of Nashville, was the third. In conferring the prizes General Wheless, chairman of the Military Committee, tied upon the arm of the commander of the St. Louis Battery the blue ribbon, the signal of victory. Then Governor Marks, standing in front of the infantry, addressed them in a few words, saying that, while the highest competition had been from abroad, yet he was glad to see that Tennessee had remembered the event of her centennial year, and had determined to retain the military honor it had so often won. He concluded, after speaking of the manly and soldierly bearing of the troops, and the remarkable excellence of the drill, and walking to the front of the Chickasaw Guards, tied the blue ribbon upon the arm of Captain Caruss. The prizes for the infantry drill were $1,000 for the first and $500 for the second.

After the award of prizes the line was broken into a marching column, and, under the command of General Squires, began the march of review past the carriage containing General Johnston and the other distinguished gentlemen. As the venerable soldier arose from his seat, raised his hat, and exchanged salutes with the troops, the whole amphitheatre of people rose to their feet and cheered him en masse, with hats off and waving. And so ended a military pageant which will long be remembered by the people of Tennessee.

The festival was marked throughout by extraordinary good order; indeed, the absence of all confusion and tumult elicited special remark from all visitors. It may be said, with entire truth, that the centennial celebration has been carried out, from first to last, with the strictest fidelity to the programme announced, and upon a scale of enterprise which no other city has equaled. The Exposition proper has proved in every way a great success, and must result in largely promoting the industrial interests of the city and State. An exhibit of fifteen hundred specimens of fruits, vegetables, cereals, sugars, syrups, building stones of the finest quality, marbles and useful woods, as well as the soils in which the articles are grown, from Texas, attract especial attention. The Nashville Banner says, with perfect truth: "The attractions are all first-class, while the general display is without a rival in the entire South. We have had several expositions before, and the management seem to have profited by their experience, for this present one far surpasses all previous efforts. We are satisfied that, so far as it goes, the Philadelphia Exposition was in no respect superior to this. Of course, that was far more extensive and embraced a greater range of articles, but those now exhibited here are as good as any of the same class there. Nashville may justly be proud at the developments of her products."

THE MILLERS' FIRST INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT CINCINNATI.

THE fame which Cincinnati has already won by such successful enterprises as her May Musical Festivals and her Industrial Exhibitions will be augmented by one of the most unique displays ever made—the Millers' First International Exhibition, which opened May 31st. The name of the display is at first deceptive, but the public will arrive at a true knowledge of the interesting character of the enterprise by the illustrations we give of it in this number. While it is under the auspices of the Millers' National Association, represented at Cincinnati by a local Board of Commissioners, appointed by the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Trade of that city, it will yet go beyond the interests of milling, as it promises to be a complete exhibition of all the processes by which the berry of the grain is converted into bread. It is not millers alone, therefore, who will find attractions at the Exhibition, but every one who uses machinery of any description, and, more than that, every consumer of bread, cakes and pastry, and that class is as large as the world itself.

Our illustrations cover all of the processes, showing the various departments—from the grain-room to the bakers' ovens. The large Exposition buildings erected at Cincinnati by the munificence of Reuben E. Springer and other wealthy citizens, are by this time well known to the people of the country. The main building, or the Music Hall proper, will be used during the Exhibition for the meetings of the Millers' Association, and later by the Democratic National Convention. The machinery, displays and ovens are in the Exposition buildings, north and south of the main building.

The grain displays are on the second floor of the south hall, the apartment being set aside for that purpose exclusively. There are State displays from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota, Kansas, Missouri and Iowa, each State showing samples of its best grain and flour products. The importance of this grain exhibition is indicated by the fact that the occasion has been chosen for the annual meeting of the National Grain Congress, to which from five to ten delegates will be sent by each of the large cities of this country and the Dominion, delegates having already been chosen by Toronto, Detroit, New York, Rochester, Nashville, New Orleans, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Memphis, San Francisco, Leavenworth, Chicago, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Peoria, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Boston. So widespread has been the attention bestowed on this grain display, that it will unquestionably be one of the completest ever made in the world. In the line of the grain exhibit comes the display of grain and flour scales of all kinds.

Passing from the grain-room to the first process, that of grinding the grain into flour, the visitor will enter the north building, known as Power Hall. In addition to the shafting of the Industrial Exposition, the Milling Commissioners have put in two new lines of shafting to supply the increased demand for steam-power. The power is supplied by six automatic cut-off engines, of which five are entered for competition—the Harris Corliss, the Reynolds Corliss, the Buckeye, the Wheelock and the Brown. This test of the Corliss type of engines will be of considerable interest to the engineering world, as never before has there been so complete an expert test. The Paris Exhibition had but one of these engines, and the Centennial Exhibition but three, and these all of varied powers. At the Millers' Exhibition all the engines are of two hundred horse-power, and each will, in turn, be employed in running the gearing, under the supervision of Mr. John W. Hill, the engineering expert who is to make the test, the cost of the testing apparatus being $5,000. The report of the test will be printed, and will, it is estimated, make a pamphlet of two hundred pages, which will supersede the report of Mr. Hill's former test, now used as a text-book in Harvard and other colleges. Indeed, while ten thousand copies of that report have been printed, the demand has been such that, while requests for copies continue to come in, none of the requests can be met, the edition having been exhausted, largely by the foreign demand. This new test, therefore, needs no further recommendation than that statement of fact. To run the machinery, E. F. Bradford & Co. have gratuitously supplied the necessary 1,500 feet of belting.

Of mills, technically known as "mill jobs," there will be ten complete sets on the ground floor of Power Hall. Of these, half a dozen are shown by American firms, all of them stone runs. One American firm shows roller mills. But Europe comes in courageously to give the exhibition a truly international character. A Liverpool firm displays a complete set of roller mills, of which there will also be sets from North and South Germany, Austria, Hungary and Switzerland. These foreign exhibits will be of surpassing interest on account of the rapid development in milling machinery during the past decade, America and Europe having been swift competitors in the manifold improvements.

The grinding of the grain, of course, presupposes the divers apparatus for scouring and cleaning the wheat, as also the giant machines for purifying middlings under the new process, and the machinery for dressing millstones. All of these details are shown in the operations of Power Hall and its adjacent apartments. One of these apartments is devoted to what has been called a "passive" display, including the milling machinery used in special processes and not here in active operation. One firm decorates the entire Power Hall with curious designs and forms of flour-sacks.

Having ground the grain into flour, the exhibition carries the visitor to a practical acquaintance with flour, of which there are samples not only from all parts of the United States, but also from Canada and Europe. In the lot there will be samples of the famous brands of Buda-Pest and full lines of English flour. The flour entered for competition will be used for baking in the bakers' department of the exhibition, the premiums covering all the kinds of patent, straight and clear flour from the divers kinds of Winter and Spring wheat.

The baking department, which will have universal attraction for the general public, is in the south hall, on the ground floor. The Vienna Bakery has ovens erected, at a cost of $3,500, which will be fired but twice during the exhibition, each fire giving the oven-walls heat sufficient to bake for eighteen days continuously, so that two firings will suffice for the month. The bakers have been brought from Vienna by the same firm which had charge of that department at the Centennial, and the baking will in every respect follow the Vienna methods in bread, cake and pastry. There will also be a large number of American bake-ovens, and every kind of fine breads, biscuits and cakes will be furnished hot to the public.

In the hall where the baking will be done the esthetic additions to the exhibition are placed. Music is furnished by the Cincinnati Orchestra; there is a cascade, with an antiquated overshot watermill; and there will be frequent flower displays, the floral designs being such as millstones, hoppers, flour-barrels, and other things touching milling. In different parts of the halls there are also antique mills, going back as far as the rude attempts of the patriarchs.

How Germany used the French War Indemnity.

TEN years having elapsed since peace was definitively concluded between France and Germany, the Imperial Chancery has submitted to the Federal Council of the German Empire a final report upon the manner in which the French war indemnity has been disposed of. The total sum exacted from France by her conquerors as the price of peace amounted, as will be remembered, to considerably more than $1,000,000,000, every penny of which had been expended, distributed to the several German States or invested in newly created imperial institutions by its official administrators before the conclusion of the financial year 1877-8. It would appear from the report in question that nearly the whole of this vast treasure—above fourfold the national debt of Prussia—has been devoted to purposes directly or indirectly connected with the development of Germany's military defenses. The imperial share of the indemnity is set down at about $257,500,000, $30,000,000 of which, in coined gold, lie deposited in the Julius Tower, at Spandau, and constitute a fund wherewith the preliminary expenses of Germany's next war may be paid in hard cash. "Other $140,000,000 have been employed in founding the imperial military invalid fund, while the remaining $83,000,000 odd were spent in strengthening the defenses of Elsass-Lothringen, and in remedying the damage done to property in those Provinces during the war of 1870-71. The balance of the indemnity, between $800,000,000 and $850,000,000 was divided, in exact proportion to the respective numbers of their several populations, among the German States which had participated in the Franco-German struggle, namely, the former North German Confederation, Bavaria, Wirtemberg, Baden, and Hesse. The portion allotted to the North German Confederation was dedicated by Act of Parliament, July 8th, 1873, to the liquidation of the war loans, the re-armament of the imperial forces, and the augmentation of the latter's numerical strength and fighting capacity. Similar dispositions of their shares in the mighty spoil were made by the minor German States. Prussia spent her surplus in constructing strategical railways and in fortifying her eastern frontier. Thus the colossal sums wrung from France in the hour of defeat and humiliation may be said to have been entirely absorbed by warlike preparations and to have increased, rather than diminished, the burden of military harness hitherto so manfully and patiently borne by the long-suffering German people.

Whitewashed Babies.

A MISSIONARY stationed at one of the South Sea Islands determined to give his residence a coat of whitewash. To obtain this in the absence of lime coral was reduced to powder by burning. The natives watched the process of burning with interest, believing that the coral was being cooked for them to eat. Next morning they beheld the missionary's cottage glittering in the rising sun white as snow. They danced, they sang, they screamed with joy. The whole island was in commotion. Whitewash became the rage. Happy was the coquette who could enhance her charms by a dash of the white brush. Contentions arose. One party urged their superior rank; another obtained possession of the brush, and valiantly held it against all comers; a third tried to upset the tub to obtain some of the precious cosmetic. To quiet the hubbub, more whitewash was made, and in a week not a hut, a domestic utensil, a war-club, or a garment but was as white as snow; not an inhabitant but had a skin painted with grotesque figures; not a pig that was not whitened, and even mothers might be seen in every direction capering joyously, and yelling with delight at the superior beauty of their whitewashed babies.

The Trade of Japan.

THE trade of Japan has increased wonderfully within the last ten years. In 1870 the number of steamers in Japan was thirty-five, with a tonnage of 13,642,970 kokus (4·27 of a ton), and of sailing vessels 10, with a tonnage of 2,059,610 kokus. In 1878 the number of steamers had increased to 188, with a tonnage of 56,391,120, and of sailing vessels to 143, with a tonnage of 30,734,310 kokus. Of these, 97 sailing vessels and 33 steamers were of native build. In addition to the above list of sailing vessels and steamers there were 10,416 junks with a tonnage exceeding 50 kokus each, besides a large number of smaller junks.

The first railroad opened in Japan was that from Yokohama to Tokio, completed in 1875. Since then this railroad has been extended from Hiogo to Osaka, from Osaka to Kioto, and from Kioto to Otsu. Another railroad from Tokio to Myabasi will soon be opened. Telegraph lines run along the railroads, and cables connect the several islands of which the empire is composed. There is now in process of construction a cable to the Island of Loo-Choo, the island the ownership of which is disputed between China and Japan.

Progress in Japan.

IN a recent address to the governors of the several provinces, the Emperor of Japan spoke of the political future of the country as follows: "Reforms prudently introduced, either in the Government or its administration, lead us surely towards improvement, and I trust I may soon be enabled to grant to my people the benefit of a constitutional rule. But much needs yet to be done; the people, disturbed by internal disorders, have had but seldom the opportunity to enjoy the advantages of peace. The nobility is becoming instructed, but its members are mostly poor, and even the wealthy are for the most part, to the great misfortune of the country, still ignorant. I wish to see this deplorable condition improved, and I hope that my officers will assist me with all their intellect and power to accomplish that difficult task. You, the governors of the provinces, are well aware of the needs and wants of your districts, and I wish that you should apply yourself to follow my instructions, and to carry out my schemes for the benefit of the whole country. If there are in your localities some noblemen, well instructed but without the means to take advantage of their knowledge, you will have to assist them; and, if required, appoint them to suitable offices. Those who are wanting in knowledge you will persuade to take advantage of the various means of instruction at their disposal."

How the Russians Keep Warm.

THE Russians have a great knack of making their Winters pleasant. You feel nothing of the cold in those tightly-built houses where all the doors and windows are double, and where the rooms are kept warm by big stoves hidden in the walls. There is no damp in a Russian house, and the inmates may dress indoors in the lightest of garbs, which contrast oddly with the mass of furs and wraps which they don when going out. A Russian can afford to run no risks of exposure when he leaves his house for a walk or drive. He covers his head and ears with a fur bonnet, his feet and legs with felt boots, lined with wool or fur, which are drawn on over the ordinary boots and trousers and reach up to the knees.

He next cloaks himself in an ample top-coat with fur collar, lining and cuffs, and he buries his hands in a pair of fingerless gloves of seal or bear-skin. Thus equipped, and with the collar of his coat raised all around so that it muffles him up to the eyes, the Russian exposes only his nose to the cold air, and he takes care frequently to give that organ a little rub to keep the circulation going. A stranger, who is apt to forget that precaution, would often get his nose frozen, if it were not for the courtesy of the Russian, who will always warn him if they see his nose "whitening," and will, unbidden, help him to chafe it vigorously with snow. In Russian cities walking is just possible for men during Winter, but scarcely so for ladies. The women of the lower order wear knee-boots; those of the shop-keeping classes seldom venture out at all; those of the aristocracy go out in sleighs. These sleighs are by no means pleasant vehicles for nervous people, for the Kalmuck coachmen drive them at such a terrific pace that they frequently capsize; but persons not destitute of pluck and their motion most enjoyable.

Methodist Receipts.

THE Conference in the Methodist Church which makes the largest contribution to the general church fund is that of Philadelphia, which contributed last year $34,135 against $28,232 by the New York Conference, $24,063 by the New York East, $21,934 by the Baltimore, and $13,099 by the Illinois. The Philadelphia Conference gave a larger sum in 1878 than in 1879, its total being $44,484 for that year. In 1877 its contributions made a still larger sum—$45,000. The total of all the Conferences last year was $480,428 against $478,021 for 1878, and $566,765 for 1877. The total for the four years since the last Conference met is $2,038,810.

The First Public Hospital.

THE first hospital of celebrity was established at Cæsarea by the Emperor Valens between 370 and 380. St. Ephraim, who died in 381, or St. Fabiola, in 400, is the reputed founder of infirmaries supported by voluntary contributions. It is related in the life of St. Ephraim that in the year 380 a terrible famine occurred in the city of Edessa and that hundreds died of starvation. St. Ephraim left his cell in the mountains and betook himself to the afflicted city, where he publicly upbraided the wealthy for permitting the poor to die for want of food. They replied that though they were inclined to assist the sufferers, yet they had no person in whom they might place confidence sufficient to intrust with the work. St. Ephraim undertook the task, and by means of the assistance furnished him, he erected 300 beds in a public gallery and transported to it for care and treatment the many sufferers. This is claimed to have been the first infirmary extant. Ancient Rome had no houses for the care of the sick; diseased persons were carried to the temple of Æsculapius for cure. Grecian history records the same thing and states that it was customary to carry the sick to a certain temple where Hippocrates would examine them and prescribe for their recovery. The first infirmaries or hospitals were built close to cathedrals and monasteries.

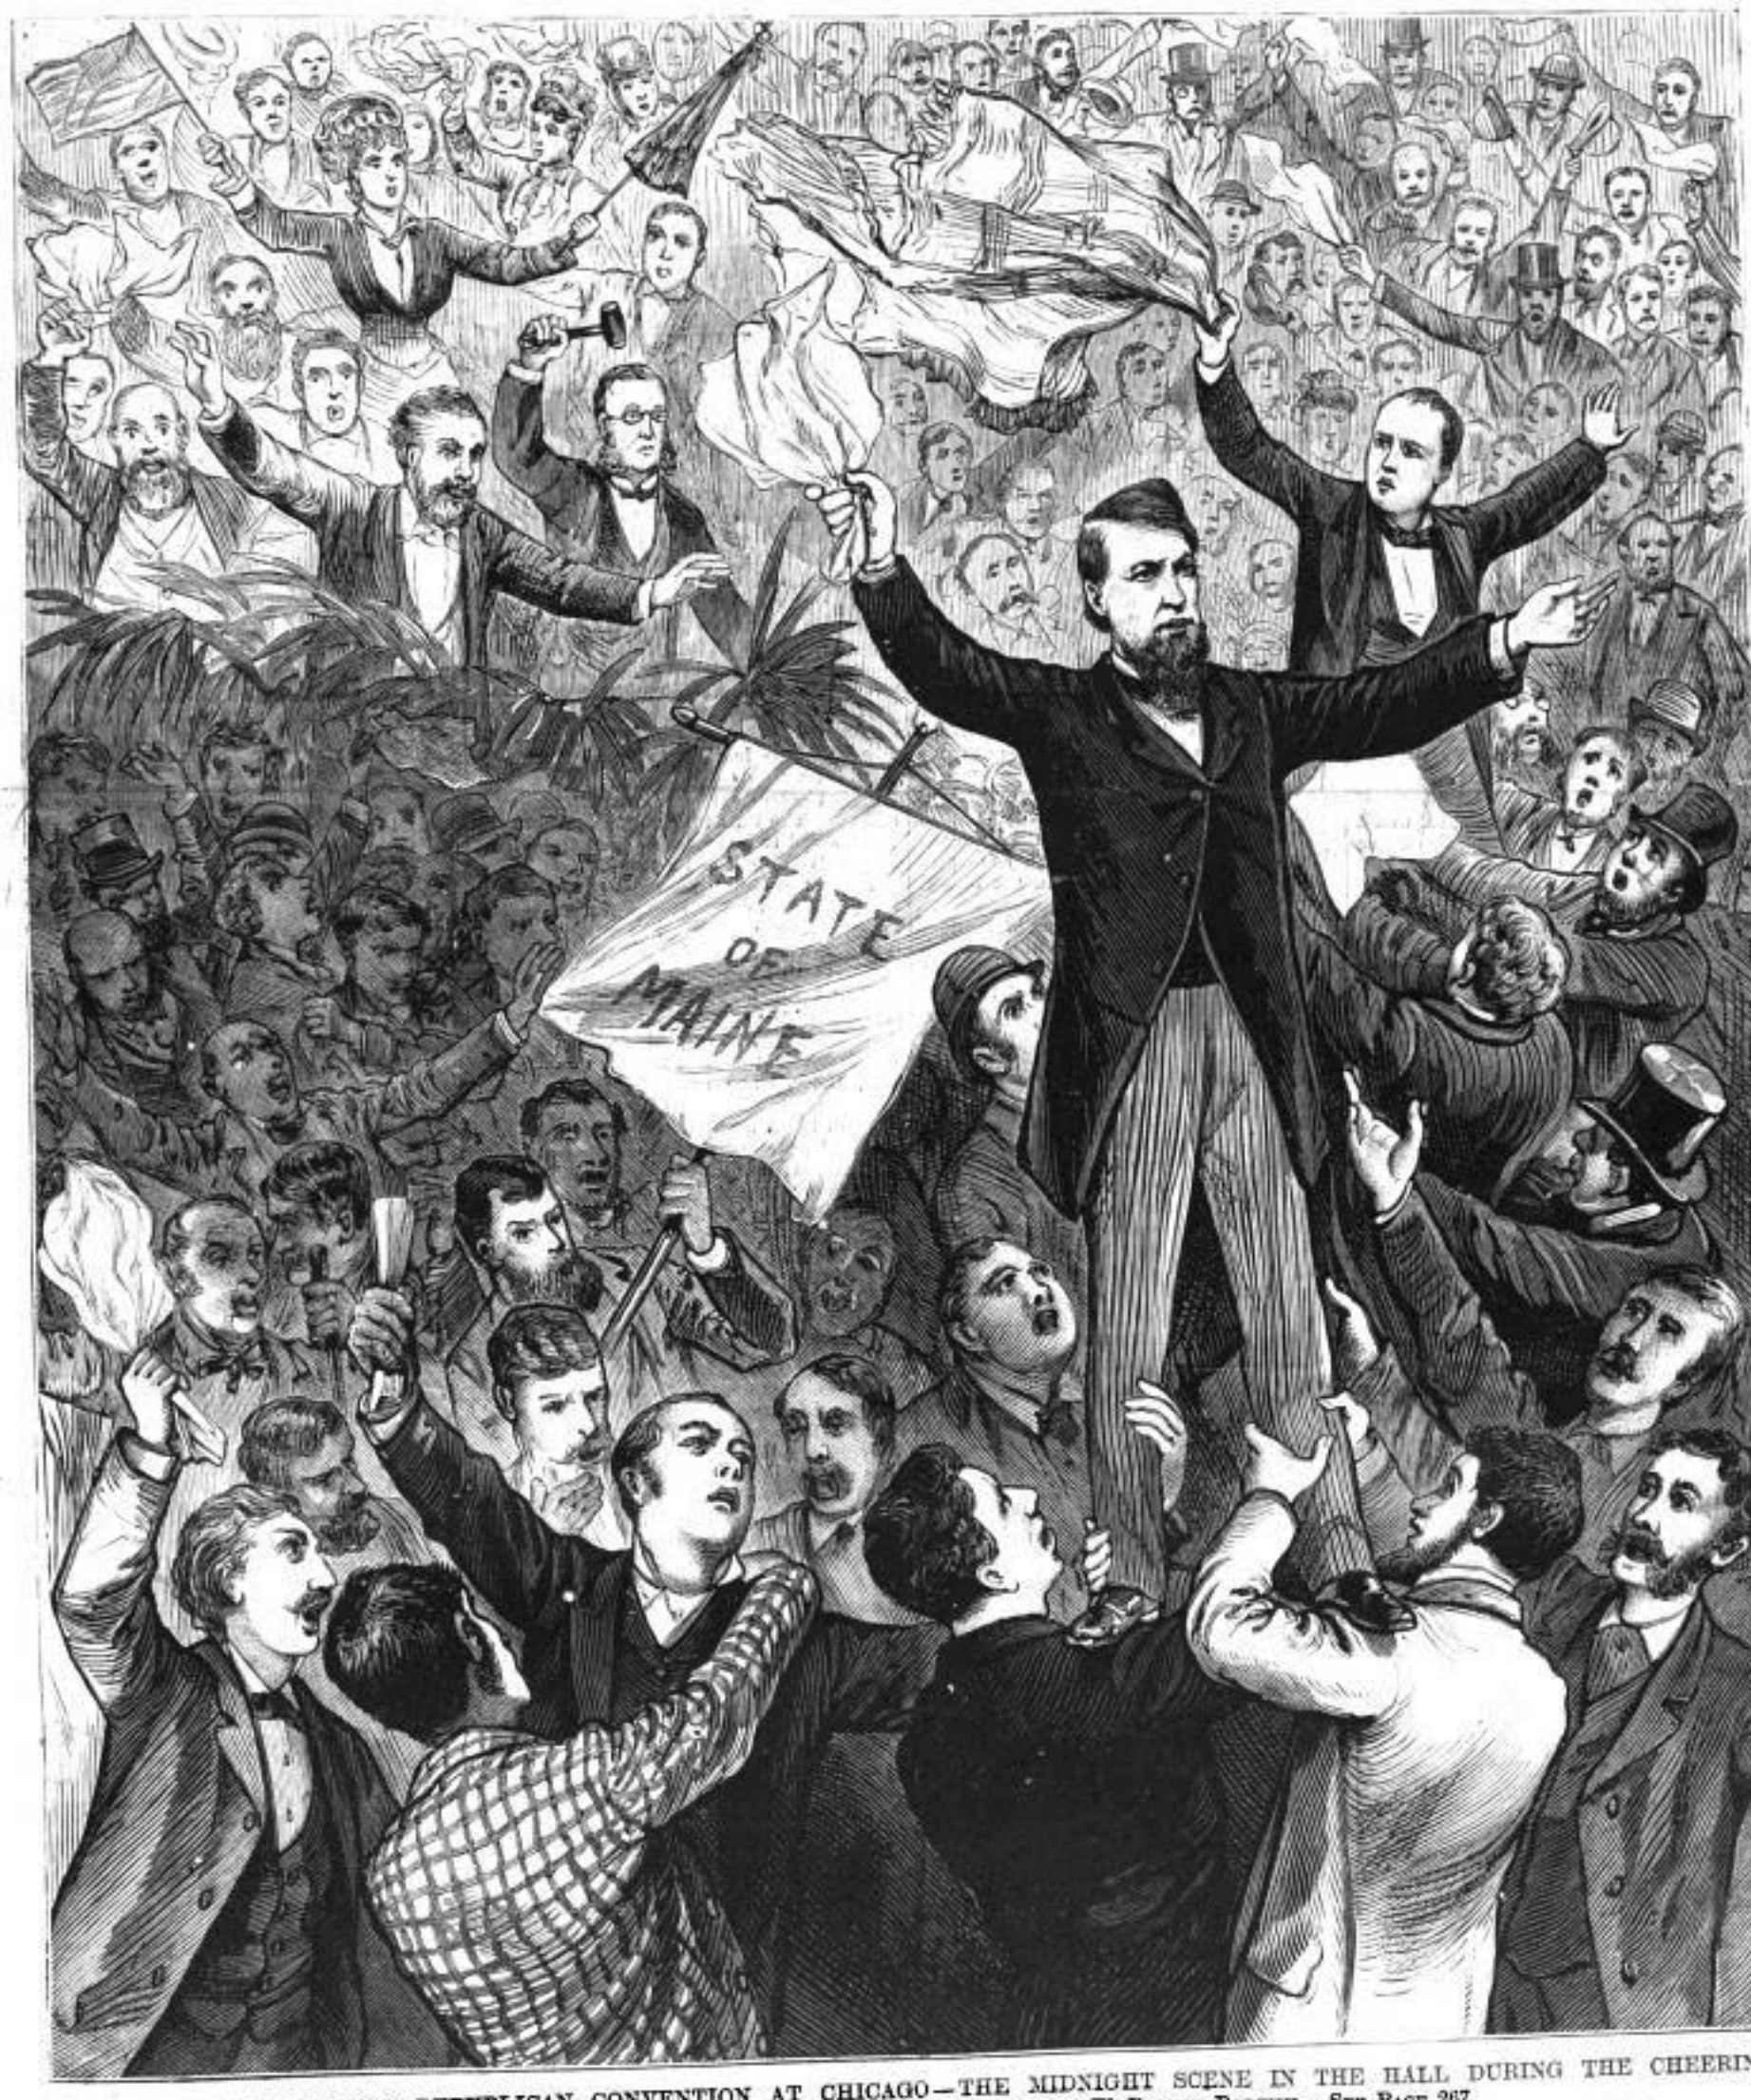
A Monk with a Fortune.

A SUIT at law respecting property left by a monk named Agostino, whose home was at Malta, has recently been tried at Constantinople before the Supreme Consular Court of the English Government. Agostino was a Capuchin and a member of the monastery of that Order at Malta. Like his brothers, he had voluntarily imposed upon himself the vow of poverty, but in spite of this he accepted a salaried appointment at Tunis charged by the British Government with the care of the British Roman Catholics at that place. He lived some years in office and prospered the while, leaving a handsome collection of savings when he died. A large number of competitors came up to contest their right to the money. First the convent put in its claim as entitled to all things acquired by the individual members of the society, but it was met with the objection that the vow of poverty applied to the community as well as to each of its members. Then a claim came from the Pope as head of the Propaganda Fidei, and finally the collateral relatives of the deceased insisted that the property should go to them. After admitting as valid the objections made to the claims of the convent and refusing to allow that the Pope had any right to the fortune, the Consul decided that it must be disposed of according to the Malta laws and as if Agostino had not been a monk. At the same time he added that if the English Government had claimed the property, it would have been very difficult to withstand the argument in its favor.

The Paris Police.

THE Prefect of Police of Paris commands an army of nearly 50,000 men and disposes of an annual budget of 20,000,000 francs. He is assisted by the Chief of the Municipal Police and a force of nearly 8,000, including 38 peace officers, 25 inspectors, 100 brigadiers, 700 sub-brigadiers and 7,000 policemen, and to them must be added an unknown number of detectives. The budget of the Municipal Police amounts to 14,000,000 francs; that of the Central Administration to 1,500,000, and that of the Paris Commissariat at 1,300,000 francs.

Influx of Skilled Artisans.



A GRATIFYING feature of the present large immigration is the large number of skilled artisans who of late have been coming to these shores, such as silk-weavers, glass-blowers and makers. English cutlers and French glove-makers, who will enable the country to excel in industries in which hitherto America has been unable to cope with Europe. It was thought at one time that European emigration was recruited from the very lowest classes of agricultural laborers and mechanics. There is now no longer room for this idea, for, with the exception of some bodies of very destitute Hungarian Slovaks who have recently arrived here, the emigration appears to be recruited from the very best of the agricultural and working classes of Europe. Even the energy and financial resources necessary to a transatlantic venture betoken a higher spirit of pluck and enterprise than is common with the lowest types of European fleet laborers or workingmen. The slovenly, the inert, the idle, the indolent, do not possess sufficient courage and energy to struggle out of the deep slough of despond in which they are plunged at home, and to undertake a journey involving a railroad trip of hundreds or perhaps thousands of miles even to the Atlantic steamer, and they necessarily remain behind. In Mr. Jackson's opinion (and other competent judges of the facts with whom the writer conversed coincide in this view), this country gets the very pick and flower of the productive labor, excepting, possibly, that of the most high-priced fancy work of certain industries of luxury, which have not as yet sufficiently developed here, owing to the predominance of Europe in certain well known classes of manufactures; but, even in this respect, as has been stated above, there is an improvement, and the skilled artisans who are now beginning to come here in considerable numbers promise to add a very useful contingent to the higher manufacturing interests of this country. What appears to be most needed, however, to the development of this country, in the opinion of those who have studied the question of emigration, is agricultural labor, and of that this country gets the very best that Europe can afford. The emigrants arriving here at the present time, who appear to be best situated as regards the possession of worldly goods, are the North Germans and the Russians. Of the latter, more especially among the Mennonites, it has been not uncommon to find many individuals bringing drafts of $1,000. Twenty of these Mennonite families last Fall brought the considerable amount of $85,000.

THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

THE Republican National Convention which convened at Chicago on Wednesday last will possess a historic character, not only because of the important issues which it was called to decide, but also for the unusual length of its session. At this writing, Monday, June 7th, the question of the nomination for President is still undecided, and nothing can be safely predicted as to the actual result. The indications seem to point to the defeat of the managers, who have staked everything upon the nomination of General Grant; but conventions are proverbially capricious, and that which now seems improbable may yet become reality. If the third-term party shall be beaten, it will be due to the stubborn opposition of the friends of Mr. Blaine and Secretary Sherman; if it shall prevail, the victory will be the result of a policy of intimidation, audacity and arrogance wholly unprecedented in the annals of American politics. As the case now stands, the nomination of Mr. Washburne, General Garfield, Senator Windom, Ben. Harrison, or some other candidate who may be personally unobjectionable, but has not yet developed any compact or formidable strength, would seem to afford the only reasonable chance of escape from the embarrassments and perils which the prolonged struggle in the Convention has certainly provoked.

MINING EAST AND WEST.

NEW YORK is destined hereafter to be the centre for the ownership of mines in this country. San Francisco deserves the credit of being the first city in the Union to demonstrate the wealth of the United States in gold and silver mines. The capitalists of California profited largely by this industry. Some of the richest men in this country are citizens of the Golden State, and they owe their immense accumulations to their skillful manipulation of mining properties on the Pacific Coast. But circumstances have recently diverted this profitable industry from the West to the East. The failure of the Comstock Lode to produce a bonanza for the last two years; the impoverishment of the mass of the community from dealing in unprofitable and assessable mines, led to a discontent which resulted in communistic agitation, and ultimately in a new organic law for California, which has had the effect of driving the bulk of the mining business to New York City.

For some time past it has been foreseen that New York would eventually become the centre of the mining industry. All great speculative enterprises are naturally promoted and kept alive wherever money is cheapest and most abundant. Whenever New York was ready to pay more for mines than did the local capitalists of San Francisco, the ownership naturally tended to this city. This is what has occurred during the past year. But this general tendency has been helped by special causes. The new Constitution of California, with its provisions directed against incorporated wealth, has had the effect of transferring literally thousands of California operators, with their money and experience, to the metropolis. Then it happened that the great wealth of Leadville was first developed by Eastern capital. The Black Hills mines also are now mainly held in New York. The principal dividend-paying bullion properties are now owned in the East, and our public is fast getting educated to speculate in "fancies."

And here let us remark that the Eastern prejudice against "prospects," or "wild cats," as they are termed, is not shared by the experienced California operator. He says, and with some show of fairness, that all good dividend-paying mines were at one time "prospects"—mere holes in the ground—and if people were not willing to take risks, mines would never become dividend-paying. Hence the Pacific Coast speculator prefers to invest in low-priced shares of non-dividend-paying stocks rather than the high-priced securities of mines which pay dividends. So far, however, the Eastern public have preferred the stocks which have paid the heaviest interest on the investment.

It is predicted that mining will be the next great craze in the speculative world. In prosperous times there is always some lunacy which affects people engaged in making money. It was the petroleum excitement, just after the close of the Civil War. There was a Colorado mining excitement raging about the same time. Just before the panic of 1873 extravagant railroad-building was the order of the day; some time in the not distant future speculation will run to land, especially eligibly-located real estate in and near large cities. It may be before this comes about that we may have a widespread mining excitement. There are great prizes as well as heavy disappointments for those who deal in mining securities, and in the prosperous era which is now upon us, it may be that some of the surplus profits will be used both in developing mines and in dealing in their shares on this market. We have an immense mineral territory. We already produce more gold and silver than all the rest of the world put together. If there are large investments in the development of mining properties, individuals may suffer, but the community will profit by the utilization of our vast mineral resources in the way of gold, silver, copper and lead mines.

THE DEMOCRATIC ATTITUDE.

IN determining to hold their convention after the Republicans had selected their nominees for the Presidency and the Vice-Presidency, the Democratic leaders assumed an attitude of expectation which, it cannot be denied, gives them some very appreciable advantages, if they shall prove themselves endowed with wisdom enough to profit by the opportunities of their position. Holding the final decisions of their National Convention in a prudent reserve, they have avoided, in large measure, the "faction fights" by which the Republicans have sought to forestall the choice of some particular favorite as their standard-bearer; and thus the delegates to the Cincinnati Convention may be expected to enter on their labors without the criminations and recriminations which have produced so many antagonisms in the bosom of the Republican organization.

And, besides this moderation of temper, the Democratic delegates are in a position to profit by the lessons of prudence that shall be taught by the outcome of the Chicago Convention. It is a rare advantage, in making up the order of a battle, to know the order of battle chosen by the enemy. This advantage is conceded by the Republicans to their Democratic antagonists. The issues on which they elect to go before the American people, and the candidates selected to be the exponents and representatives of those issues, will be announced by the Republicans in advance of the wager of battle offered to the Democrats. It will be the defiance of men assured by their position, or of men who have that audacity which never simulates the assurance of success more boldly than when it exhibits the pride that goes before destruction.

But while this expectant attitude of the Democrats has its advantages, it also has its perils. The party which does not know its own mind until it knows the mind of its rival does not give any very strong assurance of the definite opinions and robust convictions which are the true bond of political confederation. It has long been known that the Democrats are weak as an "Opposition Party," because there are so many diversities of opinion comprised in their own ranks, especially on the "currency question," which, in spite of the acquired fact of resumption, still threatens to be an issue in the coming canvass. Political Turveydrops, who wait for "something to turn up" before they screw their energy up to the working point, are little likely to be the projectors of a successful Presidential campaign. In the stern conflicts of life men may often deserve success by the earnestness of their convictions without commanding it, but it is very seldom that they are allowed to command success in the absence of the qualities that deserve it. Every good cause must gain the momentum impressed by the zeal and resolution of its advocates before it can hope to make much headway in the world.

The Republican Party has, for twenty years, intrenched itself in the high places of the land. Intrusted with a measure of power far exceeding that which has ever before been lodged in the hands of any party, it has committed excesses and errors which have greatly weakened its hold on the popular confidence. And nothing has saved it from utter wreck and overthrow except the fact that the Democratic Party has not offered to the people a strong rock and tower of defense for their protection from the extravagancies of the Republican domination. And in so speaking we refer, of course, to the conduct of the party under the Administrations of President Johnson and of President Grant, rather than to the conduct of the party under the Administration of President Hayes. It is unfortunate for the repute of the Republicans that the present Administration has been rather regarded as an interregnum in their annals than as an integral part of their political history. The scant support and meagre sympathy which President Hayes and his Cabinet have received from the Republican leaders afford a convincing proof that the latter have not been converted in the spirit and temper of their minds. They still sigh for the fleshpots of the Grant Administration.

But it is more than the savor of fleshpots which should give zest to the Democratic "still hunt" for the Presidency, if they would make their calling and election sure as against the Republicans. In a contest between spoilsmen and spoilsmen the advantages of the position are with the Republicans, for they are in possession of place and power. It is the fervent hope of every good citizen that the coming contest may be lifted out of the mud and mire of "personal politics" into the high plane of an earnest and manly contention for principles of government and measures of public policy that shall be intelligible to the people, and which shall at the same time offer to them the conditions of an eligible choice among the contestants.

TRANSFER OF POLITICAL POWER.

OUR Eastern statesmen have brought themselves with reluctance to recognize the fact of Western preponderance in the halls of national legislation. They have been willing enough to point out that "Westward the star of Empire holds its way," so long as the balance of power rested with the East; but it was not in the power of human nature to rejoice over the transfer of the legislative power to new and less experienced hands. The time was when New England furnished schoolmasters and Congressmen to the Western States and Territories, but now they have raised a generation of their own representatives. The West has learned to look at matters from its own standpoint, and can almost dictate the policy it desires the nation to pursue. The East is strong in counsel; the West steadily increases in the number and aggressive weight of its votes.

There is nothing necessarily antagonistic, however, in this change of the centre of population and power. On the contrary, it has its compensations for the older and more settled communities. The East creates, for instance, the literature and civilization of the whole country. The metropolitan newspaper, magazine and book have the stamp that makes them pass current everywhere. The manners, fashions and opinions of the people who inhabit the great cities of the Atlantic carry authority everywhere and are quoted with emphasis. Our educational institutions are known, approved and patronized by the entire nation. Harvard and Yale, Columbia and Princeton are shrines of learning held in as great honor on the Mississippi as on the Hudson. These forces of civilization are the fruit of more than two centuries of diligent cultivation. The work of the pioneer was slow and laborious. When the colonial period had ended and the time for self-government came, the foundation of a national civilization had been deeply and securely laid, but nothing had been builded thereon. Since then the superstructure has been reared, and it now serves as a model to others. The culture of the East is something that is fixed and permanent. It already bears the stamp of age, and for this quality, as well as for its real worth, commands respect. Not only does the ambitious youth who finds the East too crowded for his plans go forth from his home to help in building up Western States, but he takes his social, educational and religious ideas with him and plants them in the new soil in which he strikes his stake. He is a colonizer of ideas as well as a builder of homes. He goes forth to his pioneer work filled with the traditions and wisdom of gathered generations, and the mark he leaves on the new land is not so much his own as that of his ancestors. From his inherited riches of civilization spring his knowledge and culture which are to make his adopted home vigorous and filled with prosperity.

Many persons will be amazed to learn that the State of Texas claims a population of 1,800,000, and that its people have ground for the expectation that by the coming census they will be conceded a register of nearly two millions. This is two-thirds the total population of the original thirteen States a hundred years ago, and fully equal to the patriot portion of the population in the struggle for independence. Perhaps these figures better than any other will give a true idea of the rapid increase of centres of population, and the capabilities of our land in the way of growth. The virgin State that can give support to a community almost large enough to be called a nation has naturally its right to an authoritative vote in deliberation. Yet, while its plans and policy for the future generally must be its own, and adapted exclusively to its necessities, it is the civilization of the East that builds the towns, erects churches, opens the schools, and lays down the laws that hold society together and weld the heterogeneous masses of a new emigration into a stable and prosperous State.

This is the law of recompense which holds our federation of States into an interdepending union. The East really loses nothing through the increase of population and growth of power at the West. If the Western commonwealths were separate and detached communities the case might be different; but living under a common government, and connected by internal commerce, as well as by laws made for their mutual welfare, the States have grown up under a natural system of supply and demand, the necessities of each being supplied from within our own borders. We must deprecate, therefore, anything like a feeling of jealousy at the possible transfer of the legislative power to Western hands.

In the rapid and prosperous growth of the great West there is room for all to rejoice. The son of the New England farmer exchanges his few acres of rocky soil for the teeming section of Western land, and there works after the hardy fashion of his fathers, leaving the broad impress of his civilization wherever he steps. The son of the Southern planter leaves the worn fields he has inherited on the seacoast, and in a great State like Texas finds room for his ambition and energies, carrying with him the best of the ideas that experience has commended to him. With such good material as this, the foundations of national unity are strengthened more and more every day, and the people grow daily into a feeling that there is, after all, an actual community of interest regardless of geographical lines. This is the true theory of our national life. There is neither reason nor room for sectional jealousies. Our East and West are common ground, on which the glory of the nation is to be builded through a unison of ideas and unity of labor.

THE PUBLIC FINANCES.

THE public debt statement for May shows a reduction during the month of $15,928,033, and a decrease during the eleven months ending June 1st of about $74,820,536. Of the interest-bearing debt the reduction in May amounted to about $12,000,000, of which nearly $8,000,000 is in 6 per cent. bonds, and over $4,000,000 in 5 per cents. The net amount of silver dollars owned by the Treasury, deducting silver certificates outstanding, is about $36,726,651, being an increase for the month of $3,000,000. Of fractional silver coin, the Treasurer has now on hand over $25,500,000, which is an increase of $1,000,000 for the month. The customs receipts for May were $15,027,254, an increase of $3,799,876 over the corresponding month last year, while the receipts from internal revenue were $13,063,776 against $15,341,991 for May, 1879. For the eleven months ending June 1st, the increase in customs receipts over the corresponding eleven months of the preceding fiscal year is $44,930,782, and from internal revenue, $9,481,631, making an aggregate increase from these two sources in favor of the eleven months just ended of $54,500,000. These figures tell their own story of prosperity in business, and show that upon the whole the condition of the national revenues is encouraging and satisfactory.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE circular which England has addressed to the other Powers represented at the Berlin Congress requires the Porte to fulfill its obligations under the Berlin Treaty with regard especially to Greece, to Armenia and to Montenegro.

Mr. Goschen, who was First Lord of the Admiralty under Mr. Gladstone's former administration, is now a special Ambassador at Constantinople to arrange and insist upon the execution of the provisions of the treaty, and Sir Austin Layard, the former Ambassador has returned to England. In Russia, Lord Granville's note has been exceedingly well received, and the leading journals in St. Petersburg consider the English initiative important as representing the commencement of united action on the part of Europe—an action at once resolute and founded upon the mutual confidence of the Powers. But it is difficult to see how the Porte is to be coerced into obedience. Mr. Gladstone lately stated in the House of Commons that he is too sensible of the gravity of a resolution to employ force to come to any such conclusion. But should the Porte, as it probably will, plead that it is most willing to perform all the requirements of the treaty, but that it is really unable from want of money, what course will Mr. Gladstone's Government take?

The most difficult question at the present moment is to be found in the position of Albania and the rectification of the Greek frontier. According to the latest advices, reaction is making huge strides amongst the Albanians, and the party opposed to offensive action is now in the ascendency. The formation of a feudatory Albanian principality between Greece, Eastern Roumelia, Montenegro and Bosnia is favored by Turkey, and is not badly received in other countries. But it is scarcely likely that the Hellenes would accept any such proposition, for it would at once put an end to an extension of the frontier. The King of Greece is at present in Paris "lobbying" for the aid of France in forcing the concession of Zanina. After the famous recommendation of the Berlin Congress about the "rectified frontier," both Greece and Turkey proposed boundary lines. These lines form the basis of mediation for the Powers. Greece, however, insists upon the concession of Zanina, and it is likely that she will not be satisfied without it. Zanina is the capital of Epirus, and is a town of some 36,000 inhabitants, of whom 20,000 are Greeks. It is to the Greeks a sacred place, for it was there that the first movement which resulted in the autocracy of Greece took place. It is the birthplace of modern Hellenism, and both King George and his people have set their hearts upon its possession.

The first of June was the anniversary of the death of the Prince Imperial in Zululand. The ex-Empress, who left England some time ago so as to visit the place where her son was killed upon the anniversary day, arrived there in time after a very pleasant voyage. She was received by Sir Bartle Frere at Cape Town, and was treated with the greatest respect and sympathy by the inhabitants, who vied with each other in showing their grief at her great loss. Queen Victoria has ordered a monument to be erected upon the spot where the ill-fated young Prince fell. It was finished some time ago, and Major Stabb, under whose supervision it was built, has confided it to the care of a neighboring tribe of Zulus, very probably to the very one which killed the Prince. When the monument was unveiled, Gabousas, the chief of the tribe, raised his hand towards heaven and solemnly swore that the spot should never be violated, and that it should always be to both himself and people an object of respect and veneration.

The Church Bill in Germany has been referred to a committee, which has already thrown out the first clause. It seems that Prince Bismarck underrated the powers of his opponent when he launched the May Laws against the Pope. Since that day the Roman Catholic party has been increasing in strength and numbers. The German Chancellor has been obliged again and again to make concessions to the Centre, but all has been of no avail, and it seems certain that he will be obliged to meet the Pope half way. The Hamburg trouble still goes on, and Prussia has proposed in the Bundesrath that the lower Elbe be included within the customs' territory. This would imply the transfer of the customs' frontier to Cuxhaven, and the good people of Hamburg are up in arms. The Bavarian Minister at Berlin was accused by Bismarck of conspiring with "those Hamburg Jews," and immediately went to Munich to ask his sovereign's leave to resign. The King treated the whole matter as a joke, and it afterwards turned out that Bismarck has secretly secured his support in taking from Hamburg part of its rights as a free port!

The operatic season is in full swing in London. Mr. Mapleson, at Her Majesty's Theatre, has opened with "Faust." Christine Nilsson being the Marguerite, and Mr. Joseph Maas, who was formerly a member of the Carl Rosa company, appearing in the title rôle. The entrance to the theatre presented a lovely scene, the doorways and staircases being masses of palms, rhododendrons, ferns, and azaleas, artistically arranged. Madame Nilsson's voice, about which several sinister reports were spread, is said to be as good as ever, and her performance to have been quite up to her former representations of Goethe's heroine, which, of course, means that it was perfect.

At Covent Garden Adelina Patti is once more to the front, her voice fresh and her acting better than ever. She made her first appearance, not as she usually does as Rosina in "Il Barbiere," but as Giulietta in Gounod's opera on the subject of "Romeo and Juliet." The sweet-voiced Nicolini is, of course, with her, but he does not receive as unalloyed praise as does la diva.

A young American lady has made a successful début at Her Majesty's Theatre in "Somnambula." She appeared under the name of Mlle. Nevadi, but her real name is Wixen, her father being a doctor at Austen in Nevada, from which State she takes her stage name. She is only eighteen years old, but gives many signs of being in time a welcome addition to the list of prima donnas.

The walking mania has died out and has been followed by a swimming mania. Captain Webb swam in a tank at the Westminster Aquarium for sixty hours, thereby filling his pockets with shillings but entirely denuding himself of skin. He was succeeded by a Miss Beckwith, who swam for two days and a night and attracted large audiences, probably by the suggestion of impropriety which such a performance necessarily entails. It is said that she received two offers of marriage after she left the tank, and before she had time to change her tight and soaked costume.

THE House of Representatives last week passed a joint resolution appropriating $30,000 for the erection of a monument to mark the birthplace of George Washington. This action is eminently proper; but wouldn't it be well for our Representatives to show their appreciation of the Father of his Country in a more practical form by occasionally emulating his virtues?

THE American Rifle Team sailed last week for Ireland, where they will participate on the 29th inst. in the international rifle match at Dollymount. It is to be hoped that they may be able to maintain the reputation which Americans have already achieved as marksmen.

THE Democrats of Maine have again capitulated to the Greenbackers, having accepted their candidate for Governor, and voted to cooperate with them in the selection of Presidential Electors. Undoubtedly a desperate effort will be made to carry the State for the Fusion nominees; but we are scarcely prepared to believe that the honest, hard-money Democrats of Maine will consent to be again delivered into the hands of a faction which has already brought disaster upon the party and dishonor upon the State.

THE confirmation of Hon. Horace Maynard as Postmaster-General is a gratifying proof of the subsidence of the violent partisan feeling which, for a time, pervaded the Southern States. Mr. Maynard's confirmation was strongly urged by both the Senators from his own State, who, while opposed to him politically, testified in the highest terms to the ability and purity of his personal character, and, on the final vote, only thirteen Senators recorded themselves against him. There can be no doubt that Mr. Maynard will direct the affairs of the Postal Department with efficiency and integrity.

SENATOR DON CAMERON is reported to have declared that he is "disgusted with politics." We think it quite likely. The unceremonious way in which the National Republican Committee "sat down" upon him when he attempted to play the dictator and stifle the voice of the majority, would probably have "disgusted" even a more arrogant "boss" than the Pennsylvania Senator. Then, too, the development of the fact that he didn't carry his State delegation in his pocket, and could not control the better portion of it, must have added very sensibly to the poignancy of his "disgust."

THE war upon Mayor Kalloch has been renewed in San Francisco by the publication of a scurrilous pamphlet giving his history from the date of his expulsion from college until now. The pamphlet is said to have emanated from William M. Neilson, a well-known journalist, who, in reply to a note of warning from Kalloch, replied that he shrank from no responsibility as to anything he might choose to say truthfully of any man's career. The publication has had a wide sale, and produced a genuine sensation. But this style of warfare, if anonymously conducted, has nothing to commend it, and, in the best aspect of the case, can scarcely be regarded as serving any really useful end.

"HE was unfaithful to important public trusts, he plundered the people, debauched the politics of his time, accumulated a colossal fortune, was detected in his crimes and compelled to fly his country, and he died in exile, abhorred of men." This is the story of the life of Richard B. Connolly, once a chief of the Tweed Tammany Ring, who died the other day in France. The life of the humblest toiler, living in obscurity and poverty, who does his duty conscientiously and bravely, has in it more of real sublimity, is intrinsically a more potent moral force, than such a life as this—a life which, shining once with the tinsel of wealth and bedecked with the badges of power, had passed into hopeless eclipse even before the shadow of the grave fell across it.

PENNSYLVANIA has an old law, passed in 1794, against profanity. Recently a Schuylkill County Justice enforced its provisions by imposing a fine upon a particularly profane citizen who had exploded, on one occasion, a volley of twenty-three separate and distinct oaths. The offender refused to pay the fine, and the case was carried to a higher court, where the decision below was reversed on account of a defect in the proceedings. The Judge, however, sustained the propriety of the action, using the following language:

"The general prevalence of profane swearing indicates that the statute under which this defendant was convicted had long been buried out of sight. Perhaps its resurrection in this case may accomplish some good by showing those who have no regard for the law of God that the law of the land imposes on them a penalty of from forty to sixty-seven cents, to be followed by imprisonment, accompanied with a diet of bread and water, on refusal to pay for each and every time they pollute the atmosphere with their profanity."

SOME interesting figures are published in reference to the colored exodus to Kansas and other Northwestern States. It appears that since the 13th of October last fully 20,000 suffering freedmen have been cared for by the Kansas Relief Association, which has provided for nearly all of them good locations where they are now self-sustaining. There are as yet no indications of an abatement of the exodus from the South. The refugees are still arriving as heretofore. At the same time there are increasing calls upon the association from Nebraska, Colorado, New Mexico and California for large numbers, with assurances of good opportunities, steady employment and good pay. An increasingly large proportion of those who now arrive are being sent on to those places, and good reports are received from those who have already reached these destinations. The association is now considering the propriety of purchasing unoccupied land in some locality on which to establish a new colony of the refugees, as necessity and wisdom may suggest. One of the settlements already established in Kansas consists of 105 families who have taken up land, built a church and established a Sunday School, and are doing well in every respect. Another colony has thirty-one families, with 1,280 acres of land. While thirty families have forty acres each, one of these families has eighty acres.

THE London Whitehall Review of May 22d has the following:

"It seems that we have a new composer among us—Mr. William Fullerton, an American. As his songs are sung by Mrs. Bonnida and Miss Friedlander, they will probably become very popular. Anyway, the composer gives evidence that he possesses real talent, and, perhaps, something more."

Mr. Fullerton, who is here so pleasantly referred to, is the son of ex-Judge Fullerton, of this city, and will be remembered by hosts of friends both on account of his genial social qualities and his marked musical tendencies. His gifts in this direction have been cultivated by two years of study abroad, and some of his songs, of which he has produced a number, of conspicuous excellence, have attracted not only the warmest appreciation of critics but the attention of royalty itself. Undoubtedly, with the ripening of his taste, the deepening of his culture and the practical utilization of his admitted talent, he will attain that eminence in the musical world which his present achievements seem to clearly foreshadow.

WHATEVER General Sheridan may think or say to the contrary, it is quite obvious that the Confederates who fought at Five Forks are entirely satisfied that General Warren's part in that battle was creditable alike to himself and the old Fifth Corps. General Fitz Hugh Lee, who commanded the Confederate cavalry at Five Forks, testified last week that the advance of General Warren's corps compelled the Confederates to withdraw and abandon a combined attack which they had proposed to make on Sheridan's forces on the second day of the fight, and that the success of the Federals was mainly due to this derangement of the plans of the enemy. It is a little curious that a Federal commander of such approved courage and ability as General Warren should consider it necessary to invoke the testimony of Confederates in defense of his own reputation against the hostile intimations of his own superior officer, but it cannot but be gratifying to him that the evidence of nearly all the subordinate Federal officers who participated in the battle tallies exactly with that of the Confederates who have so far spoken.

A PAPER read before the American Medical Association at its meeting in this city last week presented some interesting statistics as to the literary activity of physicians. The literature of medical jurisprudence alone amounted to 15 books and reports, and 223 articles in periodicals, making a total of 238 during the last year. On psychology, exclusive of writings intended for popular perusal, the number of books that had been published was 81, and of articles in periodicals 367, making a total of 448. The department of state medicine presented a list of 114 books and pamphlets and 380 articles in journals—total, 494. That of public hygiene supplied 220 books and reports and 811 articles in journals. Without taking into account the literature of chemistry, which was so commingled with general physics as to be inseparable from it, there was thus presented a grand total of 2,211 treatises of more or less length, all of which must be examined in order to give a résumé of the intellectual work for the last year of that section of the association devoted to medical jurisprudence, psychology, chemistry, state medicine and public hygiene.

THE forcible removal of the Ponca Indians from their reservation by the authority of the Government was one of the greatest outrages ever perpetrated. An investigation of the subject by a Senate Committee shows that the Poncas were one of the most peaceable of all the Indian tribes; "that they were dwelling upon a reservation which they had occupied since they were known as a tribe, under words of absolute grant from the United States, accompanied by a covenant of peaceable enjoyment during their good behavior; that, without their knowledge and without compensation, and without a shade of complaint against them as a tribe, the United States removed them by force and without their consent to the Indian territory, leaving their houses and all other property which they were unable to take with them, and lodging them in a hot and, to them, an inhospitable climate." The committee declares truly that this proceeding on the part of the United States was without justification, and demands at the hands of the Government speedy and full redress. The redress proposed by the Senate is the passage of a Bill requiring the Secretary of the Interior to cause the Poncas to be returned without delay to their Dakota reservation, and providing that their title to the same shall be deemed valid, anything in the Sioux treaty to the contrary notwithstanding. The Bill also requires the Secretary of the Interior to restore to the Poncas' "use and enjoyment, in the same condition, as nearly as may be when left by them, all houses and other improvements and personal property belonging to the tribe when removed from Dakota." Congress should make haste to clear the nation's skirts of the foul wrong done this peaceful tribe of Indians by passing unhesitatingly the Bill here referred to.

The minority holds that this action is inexpedient at this time. HOW HE PAID HIS DEBT.

IT wasn't at all his way to loll about in the public squares waiting for something to turn up. But he had wandered away from the business heart of the town, and, finding himself in the vicinity of Logan Square, concluded to rest a bit under the shade of its splendid trees and forget himself and his condition, if possible, in watching the pranks of the sparrows and the gambols of the children. It was noon of a sultry August day. In the last three weeks he had earned but little more than twice as many dollars, and in the last three or four days literally nothing. What to do he did not know. His circumstances, like himself, were getting desperate. The "want columns" of the newspaper had become his daily study, and these he diligently conned every morning so soon as he could lay hands on copies of them, on the principle that it is the early bird that gets the worm. Though unincumbered with wife or children, he was already in very close quarters, and found himself face to face with actual destitution. He had about concluded that he was incapable of getting his own living. He had been bred to no trade and was without any profession. Cradled in luxury, he had never known until within three years what it is to want money, and it was a serious question with him whether even now, after the miserable straits in which he had frequently found himself of late, he knew the value of it. Never a spendthrift, gambler, nor debauchee, he had spent his money freely, and, to a practical knowledge of every section of his own country gained by travel, he had added no inconsiderable an acquaintance with many of the Old World countries. How he became bankrupt and penniless does not concern us now.

He had been seated in the square an hour perhaps, and, on getting up, his eyes suddenly encountered those of a lady intently fixed upon him. She was dressed in deep mourning, stood but a few feet distant, and was advancing with the evident intention of speaking to him. In the same instant he recognized her, but, with an air of apparent unconcern, he turned and walked quietly away and out through one of the gates without daring to venture a look behind. Turning to go down Race Street, congratulating himself the while upon his escape, he presently found himself confronted by the figure from which he had fled.

"Why, Mr. Watson!" exclaimed a mellow, musical voice, with just a touch of reproach in its tones. "I mean to speak to you even though you do seem determined to avoid or ignore me. I am heartily glad to see you!" And in the frankest and most cordial manner she held out the elegant hand she had uncovered.

He winced a little, did this proud, high-strung, poorly-clad fellow, at being gotten the better of by a woman; but there was no retreat now, and, lifting his hat, he grasped the extended hand.

"Thank you. You are very kind and—very courageous."

"Courageous! What can you mean?"

"Why, to insist upon recognizing and greeting so shabby a fellow as I am."

"Oh! Excuse me, Mr. Watson," she answered, a little haughtily, "none of my friends ever before gave me the credit of addressing myself to a man's clothes. Really, I had not noticed yours, but was observing your face and thinking of the great service you so bravely did papa and me in a London street five years ago, and of how suddenly and strangely you finally took your leave of us."

"Service! Never mind that. Which way were you going?"

"I am going home to lunch and I want you to go with me."

"Thank you very much, but I cannot. I ought to be down-town now. Some other time, if you please."

"But I don't please," she said. "I expected you would refuse; but as I did not ask you out of mere compliment, I propose that you shall comply with my invitation.

"But——"

"I know what you are thinking of, and why you refuse. You need not feel in the least embarrassed. There is nobody in the house who will evince any particular desire to—examine your clothes. You will see only your humble servant. Father, mother and Bess have gone to the Gap for a few days, and have left me to keep house with the cook and the coachman."

Arriving home, she let herself in with a latch-key, and showed her guest into the library, knowing that he would feel at home among books. But he didn't feel at all at home. He moved about like a beast in a cage, and fancied that he felt like one. He called himself all sorts of uncivil names, and recklessly consigned himself to regions unmentionable to ears polite. He looked vacantly at the titles of the books that lined the walls, carelessly turned the leaves of the magazines that lay upon the table, and paced to and fro across the floor, heaping imprecations upon his own head for allowing himself to be entrapped by a woman. Presently appeared his fair jailer, who intimated that he would find a room at the top of the staircase if he wished to bathe his hands and face. Returning, he was conducted to the dining-room, where lunch was served. After the fashion of the Eastern prince whose piety increased as he ate, Watson recovered some of his equanimity over this repast, and considerably thawed in the warmth of this woman's smiles. Before lunch was finished, he had unwittingly given her an outline of his history since his unceremonious departure from the London hotel, several years agone.

"You spoke of your father and mother and Bess," he had said. "For whom are you in mourning?"

"For my husband," she answered, simply. "Mr. Lawton and I were married a few months after you left us. He died very suddenly two years ago while conducting an engineering expedition in South America. You knew that I was engaged when you were with us in England," she added, rather than asked.

"Yes."

"Where are you staying?" she inquired, as he was taking his leave.

He evaded the question, and was in the act of saying Good-by when she told him that on the day after the next she expected to join her parents at Cape May, and could he not find time to call upon her to-morrow after twelve o'clock, as she would have something to say to him.

"Thanks. Very likely I will;" though the ungrateful wretch had made up his mind that, once out of this house, he would take care not to enter it again.

Instantly he was gone this brave, big-hearted little woman gave herself up to the clubbing of what she was pleased to deem her conscience, and made herself fairly miserable over a sense of her unwomanly boldness and independence. What had she done? What could he think of her?

"How did he lose his money, I wonder, and where are his friends that they do not help him? He is poor enough now, at all events; I suppose he would have felt dreadfully insulted had I offered him the loan of a little money. Why shouldn't a woman help a man in that way if he needs help, and that is the only way to give it? That is what he was afraid of, I suppose. Men are such fools! Vanity! Nothing can approximate the vanity of men when they are down in the world. They think it is pride, but it isn't; it's nothing in the world but the silliest sort of vanity." And so she went on to herself, and after a while sought to dissipate her vexation with him and herself at the piano.

* * * * * *

Five years previous to this incident Watson had made the acquaintance of this woman, who was then Miss Bradshaw, in England. He had been traveling through Ireland for a couple of months, and was spending a few days in London debating whether he would take a run up into Scotland. Hurrying along the Strand one day to keep an appointment, his attention was arrested by an unusual commotion in the roadway, and, turning, he saw a horse attached to a hansom, from which the driver had been thrown, plunging madly along. Rushing into the street, he seized the frightened brute by the check-strap, and, after being dragged twenty feet or thereabouts at the imminent peril of life and limb, succeeded in bringing him up to the curb. A middle-aged gentleman instantly leaped from the vehicle and proceeded to help therefrom a young lady eighteen or nineteen years of age, very pale and much frightened. Before they could speak their thanks he was off, a glance having convinced him that they were unharmed. The next morning, while enjoying his after-breakfast cigar in the smoking-room of the Langham, he was accosted by a gentleman who introduced himself as Mr. Bradshaw, of Philadelphia, and overwhelmed him with expressions of gratitude for his brave kindness of the preceding day. "And you, too, are an American?"

"Oh, yes; my name is Watson."

"Of New York?"

"No. I don't know where I ought to hail from; I was born in the South and educated in Germany."

"And are you traveling alone?"

"Yes; I have but recently returned from a two months' jaunt in Ireland, and am undecided whether to make a trip into the Highlands or take the next steamer for New York."

"Why, we are contemplating Scotland. My eldest daughter has quite set her heart upon the North, and declares she will not go home until she has seen the Hebrides. By-the-way, she will be delighted to make your acquaintance and thank you in person for yesterday's rescue."

Cigars finished, the gentlemen went up into the parlor, where Watson was introduced to Mrs. Bradshaw and her daughters, by whom he was most graciously and warmly received. A pleasant dish of chat followed, and before parting with his newly-made acquaintances he had volunteered to be their guide to several places of interest in and about London they had not yet visited.

"Come, Watson," said Mr. Bradshaw, one day, "we can't do without you up in Scotland, and since you confess that there is no pressing reason to compel your presence in America just now, why not make one of our party, and we can have a right jolly time of it for the next six or eight weeks. What do you say?"

"Well, I'll do it," answered the younger man. "'Tis ten years since I've been further north than Edinburgh, and shall enjoy seeing the country again."

He was thoroughly honest and candid about it, and hadn't the least idea then—though it dawned upon him painfully enough before he saw London again—of the actual incentive that prompted him.

Forty-eight hours afterwards the little party set out. Precisely where they went and what they saw is of no special moment to us who did not go with them. Sufficient that they enjoyed themselves immensely, and no one of them more than Watson. Miss Bradshaw and he were thrown very much together, and, somehow, the care of her seemed to devolve particularly upon him—a responsibility, by-the-way, which he was not disinclined to accept. Before a week passed he had concluded that she was one of the very brightest and most sensible young women of the many he had known. Of a somewhat critical turn, he could not pronounce her a handsome woman, though there was a nameless something in her face, form and manner, that separated her from all women of his acquaintance. Her voice was clearly not the least of her charms, while her frankness, her continual good nature and her quick and keen enjoyment of the beautiful in art and nature held an irresistible fascination over everybody with whom she came in contact. Watson was conquered; the heart that had successfully resisted so many sieges by coy maidens and plotting mammas, surrendered at discretion. He awoke one morning and found himself, not immortal, but—in love. Strange to say, he didn't know what to make of it; he was surprised and alarmed, exactly why he could not tell. The idea of loving her had never occurred to him in his intercourse with her. He had simply given himself up to the charm of her presence, knowing, indeed, that it was a new delight, and this is what had come of it. There had never been any love-making between them; no gazing into each other's eyes, no soft hand-pressures, no intentional stealings away by themselves of moonlight nights, no whispering of those sweet nothings which, in lovers' ears, translate themselves into significant somethings. On her part she had made no secret of her great liking and admiration for him, but she would have been surprised and shocked had he told her what she had so unconsciously done.

But he did not tell her, nor did he suffer his love to make any sign.

Back to their old quarters in London came the party, and almost the first person to greet the Bradshaws was a commercial-looking gentleman, unmistakably an American, who was introduced to Watson as Mr. Lawton. It required no special astuteness to determine the relationship he sustained to Miss Bradshaw, for he took particular pains to show his ownership of that precious piece of goods. The next morning when Mr. Bradshaw came down the hotel clerk handed him a note which proved to be from Watson, who requested farewells to the family, and accounted for his sudden departure on the ground of urgent business in Liverpool, to which place he had been summoned by telegraph.

* * * * * *

The circumstances under which he next met Miss Bradshaw—or Mrs. Lawton, rather—have been told. Two days after this meeting she joined her parents and sister at Cape May. Watson had not called again, an omission which the kindly-intentioned little woman was inclined to resent as a deliberate slight, though in her heart she forgave him freely enough. She was very solicitous about him—though she informed no one of having seen him—so much so that the irrepressible Bess rallied her on her absent-mindedness, volunteered the information that she wasn't a bit like most widows whom she had known, and added some remarks not entirely respectful to the late Mr. L., whom, by-the-way, she had never liked. Indeed, on one occasion, not a great while after her sister's marriage, she confided to the latter her opinion—that Mr. Watson would have made a much more agreeable brother-in-law. Several days went by, and other members of the family observed that Mrs. Lawton was preoccupied and uneasy. The shore had evidently lost its attractions for her, and the fact that she had told not even her father of her late adventure somehow made her feel a trifle guilty.

Early the next week she made some excuse and went up to Philadelphia, having concluded upon a bold piece of business. She went straight to her Uncle Philip's office.

Watson, meanwhile, had gone to New York City in pursuit of work. Walking up-town one day, three weeks after his arrival, he strolled into the reading-room of the St. Nicholas to have a look at the newspapers. Turning over a file of Philadelphia papers, this is what he read in one of them:

"If Mr. Richard Watson will call upon, or communicate with, Philip Bingham, Esq., No. 228 South —— Street, he will hear of something to his advantage."

"Who the deuce is Philip Bingham," he said, half aloud, "and what can he have of advantage to me? Call! Well, that is out of the question, but I'll write him."

The second morning thereafter he received a note requesting him to call upon Mr. Bingham at the Brevoort House between twelve and one o'clock on the following day. At this interview he was informed, in the most business-like manner possible, that he—Mr. B.—had one thousand dollars that had been put into his hands some two weeks previously for the purpose of being handed to Watson as a loan for an indefinite period—indeed, until he should be in a condition to repay it.

Too astonished to say anything for a minute or two, he then asked:

"Who is it that wishes to lend me the money?"

"My dear sir, that is none of your business. I——"

"Excuse me, Mr. Bingham, but it is very much my business. I don't know that I could accept the loan in any event, but certainly not unless you give me the name of the gentleman who wishes to do me so great a kindness."

"Now, young man, I am a deal older than you, and let me beg of you not to make a mule of yourself out of idle curiosity. I can tell you nothing further than this: I've got this money for you, and am charged to insist on your acceptance of it; if you refuse, all the blame of your refusal will fall upon me. And, more than that, I am not at all certain but that the loss of one of my most valuable and profitable clients would ensue if I am compelled to return home with this money in my possession."

And more of the same sort. The men were together for a half-hour, Watson vainly trying to get some clew to the identity of his benefactor, and trying all the harder because he could not help surmising the source of this generosity. Finally he said:

"Mr. Bingham, I'll take $100 of that money."

"Oh, let us have no half-work about it—take the whole and clean up the matter like a man."

"Like a beggar, you mean!" was the reply—the first bitter remark he had made.

Mr. Bingham was obliged to give up the contest and content himself with his visitor's receipt for just one-tenth of the money he had hoped to dispose of. Watson went to his lodgings. He knew exactly what he would do, for he had concluded months before that if he ever got ahead $75 or $100, he would turn his back upon cities. By daylight of the next morning he was a hundred miles beyond New York City, whirling westward.

Reaching Denver, he let himself out as sheep-herder—or as a kind of overseer, rather, for he had two Mexican "greasers" under him whom he was expected to keep to their work. He was fortunate in his employer, who took a fancy to him and fitted him out with a rifle, a buckskin suit and a mule, and the next day they went down to the ranche, two days' travel southeast from the young metropolis of the Centennial State.

"You won't get much society here," said the proprietor, over their first meal; "but you'll find enough of that at the 'Springs' to keep you from turning into a Ute. That is your nearest town, by-the-way; you will get your supplies there, and my banker will introduce you to all the people worth knowing. I shall expect you, however, to spend the greater part of your time here for the next six months, so these Mexicans can fully understand that they are under the hand of somebody who will brook none of their tricks and treachery. After that you can run off for several weeks, or even a month or two at a time if you are inclined; and if you are bright, as I think you are, and watch your chances, you may be able to make a stake down in the San Juan. But don't let any sharpers trick you, and don't lose your head over any big mining stories. The atmosphere of this latitude has a wonderful effect upon the imagination. I am going back to England, and shall not see you again for a year, but shall write you every month, and shall expect to hear from you as often."

And thus it was that Watson made a new start in life.

* * * * * *

Two years later, in the Autumn, a family party was leisurely traveling in Colorado. Intent upon two or three days' camping out, they were driving up over the plains towards the magnificent pine forests that cover the "Divide." The afternoon was wearing rapidly towards sundown, but there was promise of a splendid moon, and so no one took thought for the evening, even though their driver-guide had said they were still some fifteen miles distant from their destination. Not a cloud was to be seen in the wonderful blue of the sky as they looked out through the face of their homely-covered wagon. Presently, however, the sun ceased to shine, and far behind them they beheld thick clouds covering the tops and banking the sides of the rugged line of mountains. The air became suddenly cool, and gusts of wind swept upon them, dropping specks of snow.

"Driver, it isn't possible that we are going to have a snowstorm so early in the season as this?" said the elder gentleman.

"Looks very like it now, sir; frequently happens about this time, and then like as not we won't get another one till New Year's. But we're only five or six miles from Russell's ranche, so I guess we sha'n't come to any harm."

And with this he pulled down the curtains of the wagon and sent on the mules at a quicker pace. But every moment the storm increased, and so thickly did the snow fill the air that nothing thirty feet from the wagon could be seen. Before they had gone a mile further on, the short grass on either side of them was literally buried from sight, and, in another half-hour the darkness and the snow made it impossible to follow the road with anything like certainty.

"Well, driver, and what are we to do now?"

"Stay where we are a while, sir. This kind of storm is never a long one; we shall have a fine moon when it breaks up, and I reckon we can get shelter at Russell's for to-night, and go on to the pines in the morning."

"Go on to the pines! Why we can't camp out on the snow, man."

"Oh, the snow'll be all gone by to-morrow noon, sir, except what'll be left on the mountains, and by nightfall the ground'll be as dry as an old sermon."

So the mules were unhitched and tethered to stakes, and the driver managed to get together brush enough to build a fire, over which coffee was made. The party were settling themselves to their novel situation, when they were startled by a loud, cheery voice:

"Snow-bound, eh?"

And looking out they saw what the youngest member of them afterwards said looked like "death on a pale horse," but what was in fact a man on a mule.

"Come, driver, put-to your cattle, and we'll go on to Russell's," continued the same voice; "your party can't stay here all night."

"But we can't make out the road," protested that worthy.

"No, I dare say not; but my mule can, even though it were under a foot of snow instead of only a few inches. You keep your team in my wake, and in less than an hour we will make better quarters than this spot."

And on they went.

"We haven't many of the appointments considered essential to fashionable life, but you will be more comfortable here than in a wagon out-of-doors such a night as this," said their host, as he ushered them into a low, oblong log-house of two rooms.

The ladies were shown into the inner one, while a fire was being built in the huge fire-place, and preparations were made for supper. The rough table was laid, and his host was about to place thereon a steaming dish of venison, when the elder gentleman of the party, who had been eagerly watching him for the last half-hour, suddenly seized him by the shoulders, and, turning his face full to the fire-light, exclaimed:

"Bless my soul! Watson, it is you, isn't it?"

"Why, yes, Bradshaw. I'm anybody you please, if only you won't make me drop this venison," said he, with a smile running over all that portion of his browned face which was not covered with hair.

And then he was surrounded by everybody except Mrs. Belle Lawton, who waited a bit, and, without saying a word, gave him her hand and looked full and searching into his great brown eyes. And she was the only one who did not eat heartily.

"Madam," said Watson, in a mock serious tone, "the last time I had the pleasure of sitting at table with you I did much better justice to your fare than you have done to mine."

"Perhaps——"

"I was hungrier then than you are now."

"You are cruel," she answered.

"Excuse me, Mrs. Lawton, you are the last woman in the world I would be cruel to."

The next day at noon the snow had disappeared, and they all went on to Bijou—Watson with them.

Seated around the camp-fire on the following evening, Miss Bess, who sat next him, broke in:

"Oh, Mr. Watson, you must have had lots of adventures out in this country. Do tell us a story—a true one, I mean."

"Well, I'll tell you a story, though there isn't much adventure in it, for I had it all from the fellow himself, who is a neighbor of mine. Several years ago he lived in the East and was very poor; he had had money but lost it in a bunch. For three years he knocked about from one city to another trying to earn his living, and had a rather sorry time of it. One day a gentleman, whom he had never seen, came to him with a large sum of money which somebody, who kept in the background, insisted on loaning him. He took $100 of it and came to Colorado, where he got a situation as manager of a sheep farm at the munificent salary of $35 a month and found. He very soon had that amount of money in hand intending to send it East to the gentleman from whom he had received it, but had lost his address. A year ago last Summer he made a trip down to Leadville, to get a sight of the mines and of mining life, and, while there, came upon a couple of old prospectors who had taken up a claim and partially opened it, but were about to abandon it because they were 'dead broke.' They would give one-half to any man who would advance the money to keep them in provisions for a few weeks. So he lodged that amount with a storekeeper in the place, who also promised to see that the miners did the square thing by him. The find proved to be a rich one, and in three months was sold for $120,000—he consenting to take $60,000 for his share, only on condition that he should retain a one-tenth interest with the purchasers, which the latter were glad enough to agree to. The new owners went to work with a will, and, for the last six months, Fenwick has regularly drawn between $1,000 and $1,200 every month as his share. He persists in thinking that the $60,000 he got for his half-interest is the direct product of the $100 that properly belonged to his unknown benefactor, and is going East next month to find him out and hand it over to him. With an income of more than $1,000 a month, and a standing offer from his partners of $150,000 for his one-tenth interest, he feels rich enough without the other plum. More than that, he has bought a one-half interest in the flock of five thousand sheep he has the charge of, and thinks he may be well enough to do in a few years to venture upon marriage."

"Now, if Mr.—Fenwick—is that his name?—was only in love with some nice girl, who had been waiting for him all these years and clung to him through his poverty, what a complete little romance it would be, wouldn't it?" This from the wise Miss Bess.

The next morning two members of the party were missing, and many were the inquiries and surmises respecting their absence. Breakfast was nearly over when they made their appearance, walking leisurely over the carpet of fine reeds—Mrs. Belle Lawton leaning upon Watson's arm, her face radiant as the morning and her eyes brighter than the wood-crystals she carried in her hands, while her escort looked as though he had recently come into possession of the entire mining-region of the State.

"Here they are, the truants!" exclaimed Miss Bess, running toward them. "And when is it to be? I'm so glad, you dear old shepherd," turning to Watson; "I've always wanted you for a brother-in-law ever since our journey in the Highlands."

THE MOORE MONUMENT IN CENTRAL PARK.

THE bust of Thomas Moore, erected in Central Park by the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, and which was formally unveiled May 28th, is three feet high, and rests upon a pedestal nine feet four inches in height, bearing the simple word, "Moore." The attitude is that of poetic reverie, the head turned towards the right shoulder, and the eyes gazing placidly upon the little sheet of water which nestles in the southeast corner of the Park, near the Scholars' Gate. The sculptor, Mr. Denis B. Sheehan, has caught the familiar expression of the poet's face, and transferred it to the bronze with grace and fidelity. The whole pose is expressive of the dignity, the warmth of heart and the geniality of manner and bearing for which Moore was noted. The bust was generally pronounced to be equal to anything of the kind in the Park, not excluding J. Q. A. Ward's Shakespeare.

The ceremony of unveiling the bust was attended by some 1,000 persons. Mr. John Savage opened the proceedings in a brief and appropriate address, in which he said that the bust itself was the best report of the committee having charge of the matter. He then introduced Mr. Sheehan, the artist, who was received with applause. The ceremony of presenting the monument to the city was officially performed by Judge Shea, who spoke at length of Moore's merits as a lyric poet, and set him down as of more account to Ireland than Burns to Scotland or Beranger to France.

In acknowledging the gift to the city, Mayor Cooper said that America, in her large hospitality, not only welcomed the men of every nation to her shores, but that she embraced the representative celebrities of every nation in her sympathies. Standing as she did by her principles and institutions for the broadest humanity, whatever illustrated the elevation and grandeur of that humanity, whatever had won the homage or kindled the love of whole nations, touched a responsive chord in her breast, and she received and adopted it as her own. Thus she had given recognition to a master spirit of England—nay, should he not say of the world?—in her Shakespeare; to a master-spirit of Scotland in her Scott, so long the Wizard of the North, but now of mankind; to Germany in her Humboldt; and now she gave recognition to another master-spirit from the Green Island, which had been called the Mother of Saints and of Singers. Famous for the number and the distinction of her men of genius, no one had more brilliantly illustrated her peculiar qualities of wit and fancy; no one was more dear to the hearts of her impulsive people than the author of those Irish melodies which had been sung in every homestead where their language was known, and which had drawn tears to the eyes of the men and women of almost every clime.

The site selected for the monument is eminently in keeping with the poet's gentle fancies and his great love for the beautiful in nature. It stands on rising ground to the right of the Fifth Avenue entrance, backed by a grassy bank, spreading elms and other shade-trees, and bounded on the southwest with an added fringe of green, through which the glimmer of the water in the little lake is visible. It will be, undoubtedly, an object of very general interest to visitors.

NATIONAL BICYCLE MEET.

THE growing popularity of bicycling in this country was well illustrated by the large attendance and the brilliant success which marked the first national meet and convention at Newport, R. I., on May 31st. The convention, held at the Skating Rink, embraced some 160 wheelmen, representing 31 clubs. A constitution was adopted which provides that the name of the league shall be the "League of American Wheelmen," and states that its object is to promote the general interest of bicycling, to ascertain and protect the rights of wheelmen and to encourage touring. The following officers were elected: President, C. E. Pratt, of Boston; Vice-President, T. K. Longstreth, of Philadelphia; Corresponding Secretary, A. S. Parsons, of Cambridge; Recording Secretary, J. Frank Burrell, of the Manhattan Club; Treasurer, Hugh L. Willoughby, of Saratoga. The convention also elected a Board of Directors, giving, under the rule, representation to every State where there is an organized club.

The parade of wheelmen, which took place on Bellevue Avenue, attracted a large concourse of spectators. There were in all 116 machines in the regular line, divided into four divisions. Besides these, there was a division of unattached riders with 29 machines. The cortège was led by Mr. C. E. Hodges, of Boston, accompanied by Mr. Nellson Howard, of Newport, who acted as guide. The first club in the line was the New York, in soldierly-looking gray suits, and riding in beautiful style. Then came the Boston boys, in brown, and the Massachusetts Club, in gray. The Providence Club made a brilliant appearance in their white suits. The Manhattans wore a quiet uniform of blue with black braid. The red stockings of the Yonkers boys were greatly admired, as were the picturesque wheelmen of the Crescent Club. The route was along Bellevue Avenue to the boathouse, where the party was photographed, and thence back to the New Casino, in front of which an exhibition drill was given by the New York Club. After this a short spin through some of the principal streets was enjoyed alike by riders and spectators, and at five o'clock the wheelmen dismounted at their hotel, in time for the bicycling dinner, which was served half an hour later, and at which speeches were made and a song indulged in.

Old residents of Newport declare that, with the exception of the athletic games of 1878 and 1879, no event of the past decade has awakened such wide-spread interest and been so thoroughly enjoyed by all classes of people as was this bicycle meet.

An Earth-rock Avalanche

THE sand-storms through the great Colorado Desert are as obstructive to the Southern Pacific Railway as the snow is to the Central Pacific Road on the Nevada summits. Instead of snow-sheds, the Southern Pacific is putting up sand-fences for many miles, which will greatly lessen the evil. Never in the history of the Central Pacific Road has travel been interrupted for a week before this Winter. Snow-sheds have been destroyed and tracks buried beneath landslides of great extent. The company has given proof of being prepared for the emergency. Snow-plows and working brigades swarmed on 200 miles of track. They seemed to spring out of the ground. But near Alta, on the California slope of the Nevadas, an earth-and-rock avalanche occurred of such magnitude that the army of shovelmen stood aghast at the month's job before them. But a hydraulic gold gravel sluicer smiled at it. "In forty-eight hours, without a pick, a shovel, or a barrow, or a man to wield them, I will say to yon mountain mass, Begone, and it will vanish and leave no sign!" And it was so. It was but an hour's work to make a flume of boards and tap a mountain-stream 150 feet overhead, and lead it to the spot. Then, borrowing some hydraulic hose and three-inch nozzles from gravel miners close by, he had quickly several such streams, under 180 feet pressure, playing with nitro-glycerine powder on the mass. Down came rocks, boulders, trees, stones, and earth; 100 tons at a roll tumbled down the steep declivity, and, good as his word, there remained in forty-eight hours not a hillock to bear record of the wondrous achievement. Quick almost as thought the track was replaced; the cars and engine appeared; glad passengers, released from bondage, made the welkin echo with joyous cheers, and the next train wonders where was the obstruction!

The New Palestine.

THE progress which has been made in Palestine during the last twenty-five years is especially evident in the erection of many new buildings. In Jerusalem, inside the town, ruined houses have been restored or rebuilt. Outside the old town are entirely new suburbs, the extension being made especially towards the west. The Jews have formed among themselves building societies, which have erected long barrack-like buildings adapted for several families. The number of dwellings during the last twenty-five years has been trebled. Bethlehem conveys the impression of a newly built town. In Jaffa the town wall has been demolished, the ditch filled up, and a number of new houses and magazines, even palatial buildings, have been erected. So also in the gardens of Jaffa many new houses have been erected, and to the south and north of the town complete Arabic suburbs, mostly by soldiers from Egypt. In Ramleh, also, new houses are seen, still more in Kaifa. Nazareth has increased in size, and looks as if it had been rebuilt. Tiberias also has its new houses; in Jenin a new military arsenal has been erected, as also in Nablus, along with a fine new barrack. In the latter place the once lonely valley towards the east has assumed quite a homely aspect, and in the town are many new private buildings and also a new khan; there are also the new school, a Roman monastery, and the buildings of the Protestant mission. In Bethlehem a new barrack and arsenal have been erected. Through the schools and the increasing trade the workingpeople have acquired greater style and taste, and the newer houses are thus mostly a great improvement on the old—not the oldest, which, as a rule, are well built. Nearly all the houses have now glass windows, a rare thing twenty years ago.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Beethoven Monument at Vienna.

The great composer was already honored with a statue at Bonn, where he was born December 17th, 1770. Vienna, where he died March 26th, 1827, now honors him in a similar way. He studied under Mozart, and, after ten years of study at Cologne, whose Elector gave him a yearly pension, he began his career in troublous times. Jerome Bonaparte, King of Westphalia, desired to secure him as chapel master, but to prevent his leaving Austria the Archduke Rodolph, Prince Lobkowitz and Count Kinsky gave him a salary of 4,000 florins. Beethoven was melancholy, suspicious and distrustful. In symphonies he was unrivaled. The monument, by Zumbusch, was inaugurated May 1st, and faces the Academic Gymnasium. He is represented sitting. The only inscription is, "Ludwig von Beethoven." The base is adorned by figures of dancing genii and larger figures of Prometheus and Liberty.

St. George's Day in Russia.

In the northern parts of Russia, not far from St. Petersburg, it is the custom of the villages to send out the cattle, both cows and sheep, into the fields every Spring on the 23d of April, St. George's Day—St. George being the patron saint of the Muscovites. This is done with no little ceremony, the priest of the town taking a prominent part. Bread, water and eggs are put on the table, covered with a white tablecloth, and placed before the stables where the beasts are confined, and round the table stand the peasants, holding the portraits of different saints, brought from the village church for this occasion. One man is holding with a white cloth the chief Ikon, four pictures painted on one board, in the corner of which may be seen St. George, riding on a white horse, killing the dragon. The women are holding smaller Ikons with cloths, decorated with crosses. After having preached a long sermon, the priest drops the cross three times into the water (which is consecrated), and then, as the cows are let out, he stands at the door, sprinkling them with a brush containing holy water. The cows in Russia are kept indoors from November up to St. George's Day.

New Bazaar at Buda-Pesth.

The new bazaar erected at Buda-Pesth, in Hungary, by the Emperor Francis Joseph, forms a most picturesque illustration of a decidedly picturesque country. The buildings, perched upon the rocks, running down their side and nestling at their base, are attractive enough to render the bazaar a most popular resort in seasons of fairs and expositions. There is much beauty in the rugged strength of the place, besides much of that element which both the inexperienced and the traveled reader would term romantic.

Hop-Picking near Hairnsdale, Victoria.

The culture of the hop is one of the most picturesque shapes which agriculture takes in this colony. A hop-garden in the middle of Summer is a pleasing sight, with its straight rows of the rich, green plants luxuriantly climbing the poles, and their long tendrils gracefully waving and floating in the breeze. A month later it is the scene of great life and bustle as the work of picking is going on. The manner in which this is done is shown in the cut. The poles, with their leafy surroundings, are brought by men to the women and children engaged picking the flowers off into great canvas bins stretched on sticks, and the hops are thence placed in bags and carried off to the drying house, which can be seen in the back of the picture. The chief, indeed almost the only, district of Victoria in which hop growing is carried on is around Bairnsdale. The soil and climate in that part are found very well suited to the culture, and the numerous hop gardens add a beauty and interest to the landscape offered to the view of the passenger on board the steamer plying up and down the River Mitchell.

The Truro Cathedral.

The new Cathedral at Truro, the corner-stone of which was laid by the Prince of Wales with elaborate Masonic ceremonies on May 21th, is said to be the first English edifice of the kind that has been begun since some centuries before the Reformation. The structure will be Early English in style, with characteristics of the early part of the thirteenth century. It will consist of choir, nave, north and south transept and crypt. It is estimated that £92,000 is needed to complete the shell of the Cathedral, for the ornamental carving will have to be done by succeeding generations, as will also the completion of the western towers.

An Irish Bog Village.

The County of Roscommon is bounded on the north by Sligo and Leitrim; on the east and south by Leitrim, Longford, Westmeath, King's County and Galway; and on the west by Galway and Mayo. Its greatest length is sixty miles, and the greatest breadth forty miles; comprising an area of 607,691 acres, of which 440,522 are arable, 130,299 uncultivated, 6,732 in plantations, 186 in towns, and 29,370 under water. Peat bogs, however, cover a considerable portion of the plains in this region of Ireland. The average depth of these bogs is commonly from sixteen to twenty-five feet, but some reach thirty to thirty-five feet, and the extreme depth observed is forty-seven feet. More than two-thirds of the space occupied by these bogs is at the west side of the River Shannon, while those which lie to the eastward of the great river are generally known under the name of the Bog of Allen.

The New Water Supply for Saigon.

Some years ago France occupied part of the Empire of Anam, and has been building up her colony of Cochin China. The capital, Saigon, is in the delta of the Cambodia, on the Donnai branch. As the tide ascends beyond this point, the river water is not fit to drink. By sounding in the earth it was found that the alluvion lay on a sandy bed containing excellent water. Pumps failed, however, to obtain a supply, as the clay sank into the quicksands when disturbed. Engineer Thiers set proposed to excavate a basin down to the water. At thirty-six feet excellent water was obtained, free from impurities, but it will be sunk six feet below the lowest tide. It will then be walled in and vaulted, and the water will be pumped up to a reservoir about one hundred feet above the level of the surface.

Foundering of the M.S.S. "American."

The Union mail steamship American, on her voyage from Southampton to the Cape of Good Hope, foundered at sea off Cape Palmas on April 23d. The shaft broke at 5 A.M., and the rush of water was so great that the pumps were of little use. At 8 o'clock the passengers, at the commander's request, sat down to breakfast in the saloon. The water still gained, although coals and cargo were thrown overboard, and at 11:30 the word was given to take to the boats. This was done without the least flurry or haste, the captain himself being the last to leave the vessel, which went down soon afterwards, stern foremost, the eight boats laying by to see the last of her. The little fleet then made all sail, steering for Cape Palmas, 210 miles distant.

—THE annual report of the New York Cotton Exchange shows that the number of bales sold for future delivery from June 1st, 1879, to May 29th, 1880, was 36,728,200; for export, 155,894; for spinning, 169,202; for speculation, 14,502; for transit, 1,150. These figures do not include shipments to mills by commission merchants without the intervention of brokers, which are estimated at about 1,000 a week. The deliveries on contract amounted to 256,800 bales, making the gross handling of cotton for twelve months 680,248 bales.

—THE declaration of the suffrage women, made in a National Convention at Indianapolis a few days ago, under the direction of Susan B. Anthony, is as follows: "In this year of Presidential nominations, of political campaigns, we announce our determination to support no party, by whatever name called, unless such party shall in its platform first emphatically indorse and support our demand for a recognition of the exact and permanent political equality of woman with man, and we hereby declare that we shall hold any party as an enemy that does not make woman suffrage a permanent and immediate demand in its platform of principles."

—PREPARATIONS are making at Atlanta, Ga., to receive the Seventh Regiment of New York and other organizations next October. The citizen soldiery from the other Southern cities will be present to meet the Northern organizations and lay the corner-stone of the Memorial Armory to be erected by the Gate City Guard of Atalanta to commemorate the reunion of the States and return of peace. The friendly meeting of the Northern and Southern soldiers on the battlefields of Atalanta will be the first and most important event of the kind that ever occurred in the South. Transportation for the soldiers and citizens from all parts of the country is being arranged.

—THE Comptroller of the Currency reports the additional national bank circulation issued during the month of May to be $626,100; the amount surrendered or destroyed, $369,187, leaving the net increase $256,913. The net increase of national bank notes during the year ending June 1st, 1880, is $15,761,432. The increase of legal tender notes on deposit for the purpose of retiring circulation during the month of May is $294,983; increase during the year ending June 1st, 1880, $6,558,581; amount of legal tender notes now on deposit, $19,521,725. The total amount of national bank notes outstanding June 1st, 1880, is $343,836,243, not including national gold bank notes, amounting to $1,347,490.

—THE Whittaker Court of Inquiry made a final report May 29th, finding that the colored cadet wrote the "note of warning" himself, and that he "is not ignorant of the person or persons engaged in the affair" of the night of April 5th. The court is also of the opinion that "the imputation upon the character of Cadet Whittaker referred to in the order convening the court" is fully sustained. The report was signed by all the members of the court. Whittaker was placed under arrest to await the decision of the authorities at Washington. Professor Greener, who has been in attendance at the Court of Inquiry, has obtained a promise from the Secretary of War that he shall be heard in Whittaker's defense before action is taken upon the report of the court.

A SUMMER DAY.

THE flowers lay sleeping beneath the dew,
But the mother had watched the whole night through.

The wild sweet carol of one small bird
Was the sound that the weary watcher heard.

And the Summer dawn grew into the morn,
But still she sat weeping beside her first-born.

Life was fading from cheek and brow,
And the mother's heart was hopeless now.

Not one sound in the chamber of death
Was heard—save the maiden's laboring breath;

No word of murmur the mother spake;
Silent and calm are the hearts that break.

Morning passed, and the noon so still
Bathed in warm loveliness wood and hill.

Slumbrous airs from the west went by,
And the mother watched for her child to die.

Afternoon came, and the maiden lay
Lifeless and soulless—a mold of clay!

Rain came down as from eyes that wept,
Watching was over—the maiden slept.

Through the quiet falling of evening rain
The bird's soft carol stole in again:

Then the mother said, "'Tis a message for me
To tell me, O child, that 'tis well with thee!"

And the Summer day ended, for "late or long,
Every day weareth to even-song."

CHAPTER VII.—MR. TIPPINGS IS VANQUISHED.

A FEW hours later Valentine emerges from her chamber and walks swiftly to the beach. Like many another, the rich promise of the early morning has given way to darkness and menace of storm.

She stands motionless upon the beach, her dreary eyes turned outward to the gray sea that comes heaving and tumbling in at her feet.

A short distance away sit Toboskie and Jack Ashhurst, idly lounging upon the sands. The eyes of the former light upon Valentine, and he watches her in fascination. She stands sidewise to the Channel, and he sees that her eyes burn with an unnatural lustre, and are rimmed around with heavy, dark circles, extending downwards into the swarthy cheek. Aside from that, there are no signs of that inestimable agony that smote her as she stood in the fresh light of the young day.

Still Toboskie regards her. Her countenance is an icy blank, and the straight outlines of face and figure are sharply defined against the cold, gray mass of heaving sea.

A stiff breeze comes up from the water, driving clouds of mist before it, and fluttering the sable garments of that tall, slim form, that seems cast in iron; the sea, dark and angry, breaks roughly at her feet.

Suddenly Toboskie turns to his companion:

"Queer woman," he says, lowly, "that companion of your wife's."

"Valentine!" says Jack, heartily. "Give you my word, one of the best women ever lived. She is a trifle reserved in her manners, and the least bit melancholy in appearance," gazing with slight dissatisfaction at her sable robes; "but it doesn't signify," with cheerful allegiance to Valentine's cause. "'The rank is but——' What's that Burns says about the 'guinea stamp'?"

"Known her long?" asks the Ambassador, disgracefully invulnerable to Jack's poetic effusion.

"Known her long!" he reiterates, amazed. "Why, I thought you knew that she has been life-long companion to my wife—her second mother—and all that. Gypsy's parents died when she was a baby, and left her entirely to the care of Valentine, who is a distant relative."

No more is said on that subject; and they soon stroll away; but all the morning the Ambassador carries with him a vision of that stony figure as it stood upon the beach.

At dinner—their seats are all together—Jack is silent and a trifle distrait.

"Got the blues, Jack?" asks Chetewood, cheerfully.

"No." There is a suspicion of crossness in Jack's voice.

"What's up, then?"

"Thinking."

Chetewood sinks back in his chair with amazement.

"Didn't know you ever thought," he says, with unbecoming impudence.

"Don't usually," confesses Jack, frankly; "but the races come off to-morrow."

"Jack's horsey to-day," says Gypsy, with an adorable little sniff of her dainty nose.

"Good cause to be," says Chetewood, instantly sympathetic. "He makes or loses a cool hundred thousand to-morrow."

"More than that," corrects Jack, dismally.

Toboskie looks at him in surprise.

"Is there any doubt," he inquires, "of your horse winning?"

"Lord, no!" cries Jack, overwhelmed with contrition at his apprehension of his favorite thoroughbred—even though that apprehension lasted but a moment. "Her equal isn't in this country," this with pardonable pride.

"A better horse never made tracks," assents Chetewood, with a growing air of conviction. "I have a few thousands staked on her, myself; but I don't feel very apprehensive. I was down at the stables this morning; Tippings is sure of her; says she never was in better order in her life."

Toboskie is innocent of any knowledge whatever of horseflesh; but he is not so ignorant of humanity. Turning to Jack, he says, carelessly:

"Are you sure of your trainer?"

Jack stares.

"Sure of Tippings!" he repeats, as if doubting his senses; "what do you mean, man?"

"I mean that I don't like that man's face," says the Ambassador, emphatically; "he is treacherous."

"Treacherous—Tippings! Good gracious! I have had him for three years, and he came with the best of credentials. He's won more races than any trainer in England. His whole life has been spent with horses." Jack's manner announces that it is a moral impossibility for a man of such advantageous rearing to embrace a sin as glaring as treachery.

"Nevertheless, I am suspicious of Mr. Tippings, despite his early advantages," says Toboskie, dryly.

"Oh, come, now! Tippings is no end of a good fellow—honest as the day," says Chetewood, flinging in his mite in favor of the abused Tippings.

"It seems to me," says Gypsy, with a laudable desire to be mixed up in everything—"it seems to me that in a race the rider is as important as the horse."

"You're right there," says her husband, approvingly, "and you may be sure that I would not rest well if I had the slightest doubt of my jockey. I have risked more on that race than I ever did before in my life; and, although to lose would not be to break me, it would make a pretty good hole in our spare money, Gyp."

Valentine, as usual, has listened to the conversation in silence, and an hour later may be seen advancing towards Jack Ashhurst's stables, which are under the dominion of the reliable Mr. Tippings. At the door she is met by that dignitary himself, who touches his hat and makes his best bow. He is not at all surprised at this visit, as both Gypsy and Valentine, having weaknesses for horseflesh, are in the habit of occasionally visiting him in his dominion.

"I called to see Flotsome," says Valentine, carelessly. "She runs to-morrow, don't she?"

"That she does, ma'am; and I never see 'er promise fairer," says the honorable Tippings, who is a person of incredibly diminutive stature, with a meagre, starved look that instantly proclaims his vocation. He has a shock of sandy hair, but black eyes, small and twinkling like a rat's. Long before Toboskie announced his opinion of this individual, her shrewd, keen instincts had apprised Valentine of the crafty, treacherous nature of this necessary appendage to Lord Jack's stables. He is dressed now in a suit of broadcloth, irreproachably black, while in his shirt-front sparkles a huge stone of suspicious dimension and brilliancy. His resolute assumption to gentility is simply sickening. Valentine, for an instant, closes her eyes upon the harrowing spectacle of Mr. Tippings standing bowing and smirking in the door, while from every portion of his painfully respectable attire comes a stanch aroma of the stables. "She's sure to win," continues Mr. Tippings, flushed with his approaching success. "Lud, ma'am, the labor I've spent on that 'orse! As I tells Lord Jack this morning, says I, 'Lord Jack, the race is the easiest part, after all; it's the practice, and training and sweating.'" Mr. Tippings is very careful to give the ing its proper emphasis, "'that is killing. The duties of a statesman is nothing to the cares that rest upon the shoulders of a 'ead trainer.' Why, will you believe it, ma'am? me and Flotsome has actually sweated off three pound the day for a fortnight. It is a feat, ma'am, unequaled in the annals of 'istory." With a bosom swelling with conscious pride, the gallant Tippings leads the way down the entry to the stall wherein stands the dainty queen of the stables. She is a pretty beast enough—that is, judging by the small portion unconcealed by the jealous blanket—with a delicate head and neck, and smooth, clean legs, that represents a fortune.

"How long has Lord Jack had her?" asks Valentine; "not over two years, has he?"

"Two years, coming the fifth of next month," says the condescending Tippings, "and there's a deal 'o money in 'er—too much to put on one piece of flesh. Not but what the creetur"—Valentine shudders—"is worth her weight in gold."

"And there is no doubt of her winning?"

"Not the slightest." Mr. Tippings grows an inch taller, while his diamond sparkles bravely.

"It would be a great loss all around if she were to fail," observes Valentine. "I suppose Lord Jack will make you a handsome present, if she wins."

"I don't know: Lord Jack may present me with a few 'undred, in testimony of 'is gratitude for my unvaluable services. Not that money can pay me, 'owever," says the head-trainer, with refreshing modesty.

"I desire you to tell me, immediately, how much Lord Ashhurst will probably give you for winning this race for him?" in a voice suddenly changed to haughty command. Valentine addresses the astonished trainer.

He stares hard, then evidently thinks it prudent to obey.

"Fifty pounds, more or less," he says, briefly.

"Very well." The visitor fixes her steady eyes directly upon her companion, and under that stare Mr. Tippings's back breaks into goose-flesh. "You once lost a very important race, if you remember, Mr. Tippings. How was that done?"

This is a random shot of Valentine's, but it strikes home. Jack Ashhurst's head-trainer grows a lively purple, and his rat-like eyes take on a look of dread and fear.

"Really, ma'am," he stammers. "I 'ope you don't think—that is to say—I—if you 'ave ever 'eard—er—any base calumny——"

"I have heard some very strange stories, Mr. Tippings," says Valentine, severely, and the wretched trainer trembles in his boots. "But it is not my intention of disclosing what I know of you," continues the lady, with laudable generosity. "I have no desire to get you into trouble, Mr. Tippings."

The three years of the trainer's servitude to Lord Jack present a clean record, and beyond this Valentine has not the slightest knowledge of her victim. Still the baleful shadow of some dirty trick of the past causes the unhappy Tippings to shudder with the liveliest apprehension.

"What—what do you know?" he stammers, quaking in his brave attire.

"Do you wish me to tell?"

Again Valentine fixes the full gaze of her mysterious eyes upon the trainer.

"Oh, no; don't trouble yourself—I wouldn't think of putting you out——"

"Very well. And now I will tell you my business. Mr. Tippings, Flotsome must lose that race to-morrow!"

The head-trainer stares at her as if she had gone mad.

"Eh—what?" he mutters, perceptibly increasing the distance between himself and this remarkable woman.

"I want you to lose this race," she reiterates, slowly. "Can it be done?"

"It can be done, foul," says the trainer, unconscious that he is entirely under the magnetic influence of the other.

"Then it must be done; you cannot be backward in devising some little plan to that effect. You know it will not be the first time, Mr. Tippings, that you have done this sort of thing."

Visions of sorceresses and witchcraft float before the excited fancy of the wretched Tippings, and a great gulp breaks in his throat; but he is speechless.

"If Flotsome loses the race to-morrow you make two hundred pounds, and are safe. If she does not, I shall feel it my duty, Mr. Tippings, to put in possession of the English Jockey Club the facts I know concerning you. What do you say?"

What can he say, poor Tippings, with every vein tingling under the mesmeric fire of those powerful eyes, and the consciousness of past guilt heavy upon him? But he makes one faint effort to resist.

"But consider," he falters, "my reputation as a jockey will be ruined, ma'am, and the finger of scorn pointed at me wherever I go. I sha'n't be able to look Flotsome in the face, nor any other 'orse!"

Valentine says not a word, only transfixes him with her powerful eyes. He stands motionless as stone, his gaze fixed helplessly on her. Then his lips move slowly, stiffly, and his words are low, but distinct:

"I'll do as you say, ma'am."

Valentine withdraws her gaze, and with a shudder the trainer reels back against the partition.

"I will bid you good-morning," she says, quietly.

Tippings's eyes follow her in fear and horror, then from his pale lips breaks forth an emphatic declaration.

"She's the devil!" says Tippings, wrathfully.

As Valentine enters the hotel she meets Lord Ashhurst. As she passes him a ray of feeling, for the first time since reading the fatal letter, breaks up the icy blank of her countenance.

"Poor Jack!" she mutters; "poor fellow! It will nearly kill him; and he is the only true friend I ever found, yet it has to be!"

CHAPTER VIII.—FLOTSOME'S DEFEAT AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

LATE next day—the day of the biggest race in England, and which has determined the championship between the two most famous horses in the country—Jack comes staggering in his wife's room like a drunken man. He has had a terrible blow, and, true to the simple instincts of his nature, comes home for comfort. True, later he may go down-stairs and invite all his friends in to a champagne supper and grow a trifle convivial, or, as his man delicately expresses it, "get beastly drunk." Still, now, poor Jack, with his great "spirit" and "weak flesh," comes home to Gypsy like a home-sick child, at present only desiring to get entirely away from the world, and very sick at heart.

His ruddy visage is blanched to a dull gray, and his eyes are sunken and hollow. At his heels follows the faithful Tippings, his smart jockey suit covered with dirt, one arm bound in a sling, and his nose bearing the evidence of recent blood—and blood that flowed generously. Supremely indifferent to propriety, Mr. Tippings, in a very dilapidated condition, carefully seats himself sideways upon a blue satin chair in Gypsy's bedroom, the painful solicitude with which he accomplishes this feat showing that his injuries are not confined to outward view.

Gypsy starts up at the entrance, and looks in alarm at her husband's wild eyes and haggard face: nor does the presence of the head-trainer in her bed-chamber cause less consternation. Still, at present, Gypsy loyally confines her attention to her husband, who, with a heartrending groan, sinks in a chair opposite to his trainer.

"Good gracious! Jack, what is the matter?" cries Gypsy, not over particular as to the elegance of her language in this exigency.

Jack, in a state of utter collapse, refuses to speak.

"Jack, for mercy's sake, tell me what has happened?" urges his wife, her voice unconsciously running the gamut.

Still her husband maintains that terrifying silence, and she glances for explanation at his companion. Mr. Tippings, motionless as stone, still poises himself in that uncomfortable attitude upon the edge of the chair, and has fixed his eyes in mournful contemplation upon his employer, it thereby being impossible for him to perceive that beseeching glance of the lady.

"Jack"—Lady Ashhurst possesses herself of her husband's broad shoulder, which she shakes vigorously—"Jack, if you don't tell me what is the matter, I'll—I'll—Tell me what is the matter!"

Under this final, fierce command, Jack raises his haggard eyes, and Gypsy recoils.

"It's no use, Gyp," he says, vaguely, though in tones of deepest despair. "It's all up."

"What is all up?"

Jack relapses into silence, and again his wife looks across at Mr. Tippings, who shakes his head in mournful corroboration.

"Jack, you terrify me!" cries poor Gypsy, wringing her hands. "Will you tell me what dreadful thing has happened?"

Again Lord Ashhurst lifts his head with that weary, impatient gesture, and regards his wife in dreary wonder.

"Is it possible you don't know?" he says.

"I don't know any thing, only that you are very brutal to keep me in suspense!"

There is a suspicion of tears in Gypsy's voice which instantly has the effect to bring Jack to his senses.

"I have lost the race, Gypsy," he says, quietly; but his face grows positively ghastly as, for the first time, he puts into words the terrible loss that will soon be published all over the country.

Gypsy stands as if stunned. A minute of supreme silence comes in the chamber. Then all the good and loyal instincts of her nature come to the front. The future evil, which in the past few weeks has just begun to dawn upon her, is entirely vanquished for the time being, and she gets further away from the precipice upon which she has stood. To this man, who has been a faithful and indulgent husband, she takes up her woman's mission of comforter and sustainer for, perhaps, the first and the last time. Against Jack's rough cheek she lays her rose-leaf of a face, and throws her slim white arms around his neck.

"Poor Jack! dear Jack!" she whispers, and he feels a rain of tears upon his clinched hands. "Oh, Jack, I'm so sorry!"

"I know you are, little woman!" His voice is resolutely steady.

"How did it happen? I thought Flotsome was sure of the race!"

Jack flinches every time the mare is mentioned; nevertheless, he commences a full explanation, while his trainer sits by in dismal silence.

"I saw," says he, "as soon as she came on the field that she wasn't in prime condition; still, even then I hadn't any doubt of her, though she made a bad start and carried her legs stiff. But before she had made two bouts I saw how it would be! She wasn't far behind—not a length—and all the men thought Tip was holding her in to save her for the last round, but I knew the poor little mare was doing her level best. It was the first time she ever was led, and, Lord! how hard it went with her! She felt it as bad as I did, and I saw by her eyes, when she passed the stand, that she couldn't understand it. I whistled to her as she went by, and if you could have seen how she turned her head and looked at me, and then leaped again to her work! She did bravely; not another horse in the country would have kept up as she did. But it was no use; she was beat dead. And just as the other horse drew up to the goal on the last round, Flotsome stumbled and fell. I reached her in a minute; her flanks were steaming and the blood spurting from her mouth and nose. It was sickening—never was so cut up in my life—couldn't do a thing but stand and look at her, while she rolled her great eyes up at me and bit the earth. Do you mean to tell me," and Jack's voice rises excitedly—"do you mean to tell me that horses don't know—that they have no intelligence? Flotsome knew as well as I did that she had lost the race; and the last thing she did before she died was to beg my pardon with her poor dumb eyes."

Gypsy bursts into a flood of tears.

"Oh, poor, dear Flotsome!" she sobs. "Dead! What a sin! I wish there never had been a race-course in the world. Oh, poor little Flotsome!"

"It was a most haffecting sight," says Tippings, mournfully wiping his eyes. "I never expected I was saving 'er for this! And for two weeks past we've sweated off three pounds the day."

"How was it done?" asks Gypsy, in a tearful voice from behind her handkerchief.

"We blanketed 'eavily, and took pow'ful hexercise," promptly responds Mr. Tippings, in lachrymose tones.

Gypsy flashes one indignant glance upon the unconscious trainer, and turns to her husband.

"How did the tragedy occur?" she repeats, in tones that would wither any one but the irrepressible Tippings.

"I can't understand it," says poor Jack. "Everybody was wild with excitement, and not a man on the ground had ever seen a case like it before. There is one upon record, I believe"—the trainer starts sharply, but in the next instant his countenance regains its former expression of acute suffering—"but in that case the horse lived, though unable to track a course for months. Probably Flotsome would have got over it if she had not thrown herself; it was that that broke the blood-vessel, though she was all racked to pieces before she came on the track."

After the first shock of grief, Gypsy's woman's nature asserts itself.

"And to think of all the money you lose!" she exclaims, dismally.

"Money!" cries Jack. "I don't care a —— for my money. It's the other fellows and the shame of being beat, and—and poor, dead Flotsome!"

"You look as if you were suffering, Mr. Tippings," observes Gypsy, now turning to the trainer.

"Never were so knocked up in my life," affirms that individual, looking wofully at his patched up condition. "Two cuts on the 'end, shoulder dislocated, arm broke, and the bridge of my nose knocked into a cocked 'at. To say nothing of bruises elsewhere!" concludes Tippings, with praiseworthy reticence, refraining to locate his other injuries.

"Really, that is very bad," commiserates Gypsy, but it must be confessed that her tones are a trifle indifferent.

"Here, Tippings," says Jack, "take that and invest in court-plaster," tossing him some gold.

"And I 'ope, my lud, begins the trainer, deprecatingly, "I 'ope as you won't be a-treasuring this up against me. You can't feel more cut up about it than me," concludes Tippings, with watery eyes and villainous grammer.

"Oh, Tippings, that's all right," says Jack, absently. "I have no cause to treasure anything against you. You couldn't help it. You may go now."

With the liveliest signs of suffering, the battered trainer raises upon his feet and gets into locomotion.

"It's very kind of you indeed, my lud," he says at the door, and overwhelmed with emotion, "very kind! Not but wot I'm as blameless as a babe unborn; but it ain't allus as we gets our just deserts in this world. But one thing I can say, an' with truth, I 'ave bit the dust this day!"

With which flight of eloquence, Tippings bows and closes the door, and upon the outside triumphantly rattles his two hundred pounds which repose safely in his pocket.

OPENING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION AT CHICAGO.

THE National Republican Convention assembled at Chicago on Wednesday, June 2d. The hotels of the city, which seemed packed to their utmost capacity before the opening day, were literally jammed. There was unprecedented trouble and confusion over the distribution of tickets, and only a small portion of them had been distributed at the hour of meeting. Many prominent persons were unable to obtain admission. Otherwise the arrangements were as near perfect as need be; the seating the various divisions, the location of entry and exit, provisions to insure order, and the decorations, were all such as to reflect credit on all concerned. The hall, as prepared, was four hundred feet long by one hundred and fifty feet wide. At one end was the presiding officer's platform, elegantly furnished and decorated with flags and flowers. Back of the speaker were the invited guests; in front of him, a little below, was the press platform, and below this the main floor of the convention. The galleries rise on all sides to the spring of the roof arches. There were great and small festoons of flags, State seals and huge portraits of such leaders as Lincoln, Sumner, Ben Wade, Thaddeus Stevens and Morton.

After a series of caucuses and a protracted contest between the Grant and anti-Grant men of the National Committee, during which Senator Cameron refused to accede to the will of the members, and was threatened with deposition from the chairmanship of the committee if he did not yield, a compromise arrangement was finally reached, by which it was agreed, on the part of the Grant men, that Senator Hoar should be reported as temporary chairman, without opposition, and that the Convention should be organized without any attempt to enforce the unit rule, leaving the question for after consideration and decision. On the basis of this understanding, Mr. Cameron was left to act as chairman of the committee. The effect of this arrangement was to tide over what seemed a very threatening point. It at least postponed, and, perhaps, wholly averted, a rupture.

At one o'clock, sharp, Senator Cameron called the delegates to order, and after prayer had been offered, he carried out the agreement by nominating Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, for temporary chairman.

Mr. Hale, of Maine, to expedite business, moved that the roll of States and Territories be called, and the chairman of each delegation shall name its members of committees in the following order: On Permanent Organization, on Rules and Order of Business, on Credentials and on Resolutions. It was adopted, without objections. The roll was accordingly called and the committees named.

The Committee on Credentials organized in the afternoon and adjourned until 8 P.M. The Grant men moved that B. F. Tracy, of New York, be made chairman. Chandler, of Maine, moved to substitute the name of Conger, of Michigan, which was agreed to—20 to 11.

The Committee on Rules and Order of Business organized with James A. Garfield as chairman and Thomas W. Chase, of Rhode Island, secretary.

The Committee on Resolutions organized with Edwards Pierrepont, of New York, as chairman, and T. D. Edwards, of Nevada, secretary. After hearing delegates from the National Woman's Suffrage Convention in favor of a resolution in the national platform favoring woman suffrage, the committee took a recess until evening.

After a number of credentials and protests had been presented and referred to the committee, an adjournment was taken until 11 A.M. on the 3d. Caucuses of the recognized leaders were held in the evening, and few of the active delegates got a wink of sleep during the night.

On Thursday, the second day of the Convention, little progress was made beyond the completion of the permanent organization, Mr. Hoar being continued as President. One or two passages-at-arms occurred between Messrs. Hale and Frye, representing the Blaine interest, and Senator Conkling, representing the friends of General Grant—in all of which the latter were worsted. At the afternoon session, a motion that the Committee on Credentials be requested to report—the same being a substitute for a resolution directing that the report of the Committee on Rules be presented—was rejected, after debate, by a vote of 318 yeas to 406 nays. This was regarded as a victory for the anti Grant party. After this action the Convention adjourned until Friday.

On Friday the Convention received the reports of the Committees on Rules and Credentials, did not discuss the former, which forbade the unit rule, and spent the day and night discussing the latter, which maintained and applied the principle of Congressional district representation as against State Convention instructions. Senator Conkling met a defeat at the beginning of the morning session on a proposition to forfeit the seats of three West Virginians who had voted "no" on a resolution he had offered to bind all the delegates to the nominee of the Convention. The vote was so overwhelming against the Senator that between the yeas and the nays he withdrew his resolution. It was decided to take up the contested States separately. A proposition to substitute the minority or Grant report on Alabama was negatived by 449 nays to 306 yeas.

The case of Illinois was then taken up, and an hour was allowed for the presentation of arguments on both sides. The majority report was admirably read by Samuel Fessenden, of Connecticut.

In the course of his remarks Senator Logan made a direct assault on California and said: "I am told that the California delegation could not obtain their certificates until they had pledged themselves to vote for a certain candidate. Am I right or not?"

Up jumped Mr. Pixley, the spokesman of California, and in an impassioned retort narrated the steps by which his delegation was appointed, and concluded as follows:

"And, Mr. Chairman, we were instructed first, last and all the time for the distinguished Senator from Maine," and then sat down. Talk about the applause for the "old soldier?" It was like a zephyr's breath compared to a tornado. Hats, canes, umbrellas, arms, heads, coats, were waved. The air was packed with Blaine. The great place was a thunderclap of Blaine. Logan stood and sweated profusely. Conkling turned from white to red. Cameron pulled his mustache and wiped his glasses. Hale sat nervous, but permeated by one vast tickle. Frye laughed till tears rolled down his cheeks. Fred Douglass pulled his long white beard. Hoar forgot to play with his gavel. The New York delegation grew dark and saturnine, but the ladies were ecstatic and their escorts were wild with delight.

Cheers for Grant and Blaine alternated during the debate, and, after an allusion by Mr. Storrs to the superior trustworthiness as workers of the followers of the ex-President, Mr. Conkling led the cheering, waving a flag, while somebody started the cry, "Rally Round the Flag, Boys," and the convention sang. Then followed cheers for Blaine and Grant inextricably mixed.

Nearly every person within the hall was on his feet, each cheering for his own favorite. Flags, shawls, parasols, hats and all other movable things within reach were swung furiously to and fro. Bob Ingersoll, seizing a lady's shawl, waved it frantically from the platform. In the centre of the stage, just back of the Chair, a woman, with a flag in one hand and a parasol in the other, swung them to and fro time and again, crying "Hurrah for Blaine!" She stood directly in front of Governor Jewell, of Connecticut. Finally she obtained two flags, and, with one in each hand, continued her enthusiastic efforts as long as the uproar lasted.

Half an hour elapsed before the Chair made any effort to recall the house to order. At this time Mr. Hale, of Maine, was seen standing above the surging crowd upon the shoulders of some friends, waving the banner of Maine, and with the banners of the Blaine States grouped closely about him.

At half-past 1 o'clock, when the vote on Illinois was reached, Senator Clayton offered a resolution to adopt the minority report instead of the majority report. The contest in the First Congressional District was first voted on separately. The Convention unseated the sitting Grant delegates by 387 to 332, thus defeating Clayton's motion. At 2 o'clock Senator Logan insisted upon a vote by States upon the adoption of the majority report upon the First Illinois District, which had been virtually decided by vote to reject the minority report. The majority report was adopted by 384 to 356, and the Grant delegates were unseated.

At 2:30 on Saturday morning the Convention adjourned until 11 o'clock. Upon reassembling at that hour, the Convention decided the contests for seats in the Kansas, West Virginia and Utah cases, after which, having first negatived, by 479 to 276, a motion to proceed to the nomination of candidates, the rules reported by the committee were adopted, the so-called "unit rule" being nullified. The Platform, as reported by the Hon. Edwards Pierrepont, with the addition of a Civil Service plank proposed by Mr. Barker, of Massachusetts, was next adopted. Then the candidates were formally presented. Mr. James F. Joy, of Michigan, nominated Mr. Blaine, Mr. Pixley, of California, and Mr. Frye, of Maine, seconding the nomination. General Grant was nominated by Senator Conkling; Secretary Sherman, by General Garfield; Mr. Windom, by E. F. Drake, of Minnesota; Mr. Edmunds, by Mr. Billings, of Vermont; Mr. Washburne, by Mr. Cassidy, of Wisconsin. The speeches of Senator Conkling, Mr. Frye and General Garfield were especially eloquent, and elicited the wildest applause, the scenes of enthusiasm even eclipsing those of the previous night. At 11:50 P. M. the Convention adjourned until Monday, June 7th.

The Platform rehearses the great benefits of Republican rule to the country, which has restored solidity to national finances, lifted the credit of the country and insured the prosperity of the future; it advocates popular education, adherence to the Constitution, prohibition of the use of public funds for sectarian schools; favors protection of American labor, commerce and industries; denounces polygamy, and renews the obligations of the country to the Union soldiers. The Platform opposes unlimited Chinese immigration, and suggests Congressional modification of existing treaties to remedy the evil; commends the Hayes Administration; arraigns the Democratic Party, and holds it to be the duty of the Republicans to harmonize the whole country.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

THE KENTUCKY INSTITUTE FOR THE BLIND.

THE finest view of the three cities about the Falls of the Ohio may be had from the dome of the Kentucky Institute for the Blind. From its height, on the very beginning of the great bend of the Ohio in which Louisville lies, may be seen this largest city of the Southwest, extending along a river-front of seven miles, while on the northern (or Indiana) shore are Jeffersonville and New Albany, separated in the view by the magnificent bridge of a mile in length, as by a line.

But if the view from the dome awakens feelings of delight, the scenes presented to a visitor in the building itself impress him with deeper feelings of wonder and admiration. The South has been marvelously prompt to establish and maintain the various charities for the defective classes. Her schools for the deaf and dumb and those for the blind stand in every Southern State, with the single exception of Florida, monuments of the wise philanthropy of her people. Our correspondent was assured at the Kentucky School for the Blind that it was but a type of what was going on all through the South. The building is palatial in size, beautifully located in a grove of ten acres, and contains about seventy pupils. The instruction appears exactly like that of any well-endowed boarding-school, with the addition of industrial training given to both sexes.

The girls, in one room visited by our artist, were busily engaged at sewing-machines and knitting-machines, which they managed in all their details with the facility of persons with perfect sight, threading their needles by means of a thin wire as rapidly and dexterously as some persons with sight could have done it. Other girls in this room were sewing by hand, and all the older girls learn to cut out their own garments by means of stiff paper patterns, put them together and make them. Some of their crochet-work was beautiful and perfect; and even in the homely art of darning stockings not a few were proficient. Some little blind children, fresh arrivals in the school, illustrated the first steps in educating the blind. One little girl was taking lessons in developing her sense of touch by putting together some of Crandall's building blocks; another was putting embossed words, like her copy, into a reading frame, made with parallel grooves just fitted to hold the little slips of pasteboard on which the words were pasted; another was learning to distinguish by touch the various common objects of the household, such as coffee, tea, rice, starch, hominy and beans, while others were piecing the little triangles of the kindergarten into the various shapes devised for them in their tablets. The scroll-saw had evidently been at work for their benefit, for in one room a number of children were putting together a dissected county-map of the State, naming each county by its shape with unerring precision of touch. In fact, this sense was made to minister to the cause of education in a wonderful way. A large supply of tangible models gave them ideas of natural history and elementary physiology. Our artist saw a totally blind lad of fourteen dissect and put together a manikin, or model of the human body, naming each part correctly, and describing the circulation of the blood and the action of the heart with as complete a knowledge as that of any seeing child of his age.

Their pencil-writing was peculiar but legible, and written on squares of pasteboard the size of a letter-sheet, with narrow grooves in it to enable them to keep the line. A simple device of a tablet, with an awl and a guide, gave them means for writing and reading their own exercises and compositions.

At the hour set apart for systematic exercise, the pupils were seen in the grand gymnasium hall—70 feet long, 30 feet wide and 24 feet high—going through the various movements of calisthenics, according to Dr. Dio Lewis's system of light gymnastics. Here, also, was placed a beautiful pipe-organ of twenty stops with a double row of keys, upon which some of the advanced pupils gave an exhibition of their skill. In fact, the instruction in music in all schools for the blind is made especially prominent, as it is a branch in which the blind can compete with the seeing at less disadvantage than in any other. Their singing and pianoforte playing is often of artistic merit, and in their band and orchestral music they do well.

The industrial department for the boys is necessarily limited. Broom-making, simple upholstery (like mattress and lounge-making), the various styles of cane-work, and, in some schools, willow-work, brush-making and pianoforte-tuning are taught with more or less success, according to the natural aptitude of the pupils. This, indeed, seems to be the only limit to the education of a blind child.

Under the same roof is located the American Printing House for the Blind, the largest establishment of the kind in the world, and now receiving a subsidy of $10,000 a year from the general Government. Every superintendent of a State school for the blind is, ex-officio, a member of its board of trustees, and receives for his school, books and tangible apparatus according to its number of pupils. The new devices here, in respect to cheap stereotyping, were wonderful. By their process the stereotype plates of a volume of 150 pages of the size of Webster's dictionary could be easily carried under a man's arm. Under the ordinary system these would fill a cart and be a load for a horse.

In this well-appointed school, of which B. B. Huntoon is superintendent, with its abundant evidence of thoroughness and efficiency, its spotless cleanliness, the cheerfulness and proficiency of its pupils, its numerous and ingeniously devised apparatus fitted to assist the sense of touch to supply, to a remarkable extent, the lack of sight, and in the printing for the blind done here for the whole country, one may recognize the fact that even in the loftiest fields of Christian philanthropy the South stands in the first rank of earnest workers.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

It has been resolved to establish a Museum of Science and Art in Aberdeen.

Dr. M. Treub has been appointed director of the Botanical Gardens at Buitenzorg, Java.

In the vicinity of Milan pile-dwellings have been discovered in a peat-moor, and the foundations of a Roman theatre in the city itself.

The Collections from Socotra, which Professor Bayley Balfour was compelled to send by sea from Bristol, have arrived safely at Kew Gardens.

The Municipality of Rome has just erected on the promenade of the Pincio a statue in honor of Father Secchi. The statue represents the great astronomer in the attire of a member of the Company of Jesus.

The Late Joshua Jeans, of Philadelphia, bequeathed $20,000 to the Academy of Natural Sciences in that city in a codicil to his will, but did not sign it. His sons, the executors, however, have paid the sum to the Academy.

Mr. W. Chandler Roberts, F.R.S., Chemist of the British Mint, has been appointed to the Lectureship of Metallurgy in the Royal School of Mines, rendered vacant by the resignation of Dr. Percy, F.R.S. Mr. Roberts will continue to hold his appointment at the Mint.

England has a new pest, the tipula grub, which ultimately blossoms into a Daddy Longlegs. It goes to the root of every green thing with amazing appetite, and so serious are its ravages that the Royal Agricultural Society has issued an elaborate description of it and its little ways.

The Archæological Society of Athens has purchased about half the village which stands upon the ruins of the Temple of Eleusis. The Society intends building new dwelling-houses in another part, and to begin with excavations as soon as the present inmates of the village have moved.

The Astronomer, Herr Rudolf Falb, well-known through his theory of earthquakes, has returned from his South American exploring tour, which extended over a period of more than two years. In his researches he was led in the direction of ethnography and linguistics, and believes that he has made interesting discoveries regarding "the original language of the human race."

Mr. J. P. Lesley, of Philadelphia, has shown that Dr John L. Le Conte, of the same city, anticipated by several years the suggestion attributed to Professor Metschinkoff that a fungus which would destroy insects should be deliberately cultivated and applied in quantity to places infested by noxious insects. At the Portland meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, in August, 1873, Dr. Le Conte delivered an address in which he recommended, among other things, "careful study of epidemic diseases of insects, especially those of a fungoid nature, and experiments on the most effective means of introducing and communicating such diseases at pleasure."

It is Reported in the Moniteur Scientifique that Dr. G. Schmitz's hypodermic injections of pilocarpine in certain diseases of the eye had not only the effect of curing the diseases, but of restoring the hair on the heads of the patients. One man, aged sixty, was quite bald, and was suffering from double cataract. Three injections of the pilocarpine were performed in fourteen days. The membrane over the pupil of the eye disappeared, and the head first I. rame covered with a thick down and then with an abundant crop of partly white and partly black hair. Another patient, aged thirty-four, had detachment of the retina, and was bald on the top of his head. Two injections cured his eye and reproduced his hair.

Under their present government the French are multiplying the statues erected to their men of science by means of public subscription. Not less than three new schemes are on foot for that purpose in several parts of the country. A committee has been established at Montpellier for Auguste Comte; another at Blois, in honor of Denis Papin, a rival of the Marquis of Worcester, who, according to the French notion, invented the steam engine; and a third at Bar-le-Duc, on behalf of François Cugnot, an engineer born in the vicinity of that city, who in 1770 constructed a road locomotive. This rudimentary steam-engine, which is exhibited just now at the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, was tried officially but unsuccessfully in the arsenal of Paris more than a century ago.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

BISMARCK does not make his continuance in office dependent upon the passage of the Church Bill.

STRAUSS, the musical composer, who now lives in Paris and is 74 years old, has a passion for bric-à-brac.

A STATUE of Goethe was unveiled at Berlin June 24, in the presence of the Emperor and a large concourse of people.

HELEN E. COOLIDGE is a partner with her father, an ex-judge, at Niles, Mich. The firm name is Coolidge & Daughter.

EX-EMPRESS EUGENIE arrived on the 28th of May at Durnford, Zululand, near the spot where the Prince Imperial was killed.

THE only foreigner who has gained honorable mention in the French Salon this year is Mr. W. L. Picknell, an American.

ROBERT W. BOYD, the English oarsman, who is to row against Hanlan at Seekonk in a few weeks, arrived at this port June 3d.

CLARK MILLS, the sculptor, has been presented by the Tennessee Historical Society with a beautiful gold-headed cane made of hickory-wood from the "Hermitage." This is the first testimonial ever given to any one by this society.

GEORGE PEABODY WETMORE'S Summer house at Newport, R. I., has cost about half a million dollars. The cost of the main staircase alone was $40,000. The wood is all imported, and the carving was done abroad in the Florentine style.

PRESIDENT JOHN W. GARRETT, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, intends to sail for Europe on June 19th. He will be absent from two to three months. His visit is understood to be entirely for rest from the cares of his office.

THE President has nominated Eugene Schuyler, of New York, now Consul-General at Rome, to be Consul-General and Diplomatic Agent of the United States at Bucharest; and William N. Pethe, now Vice-Consul at Tientsin, to be Secretary of the Commission to China.

MRS. SENATOR HAYARD is a graceful, polished, attractive, dark-eyed lady, too busy with her many children to devote much time to society. It is understood that Mrs. Bayard inherited great wealth. The two elder daughters are in society, graceful and accomplished young ladies.

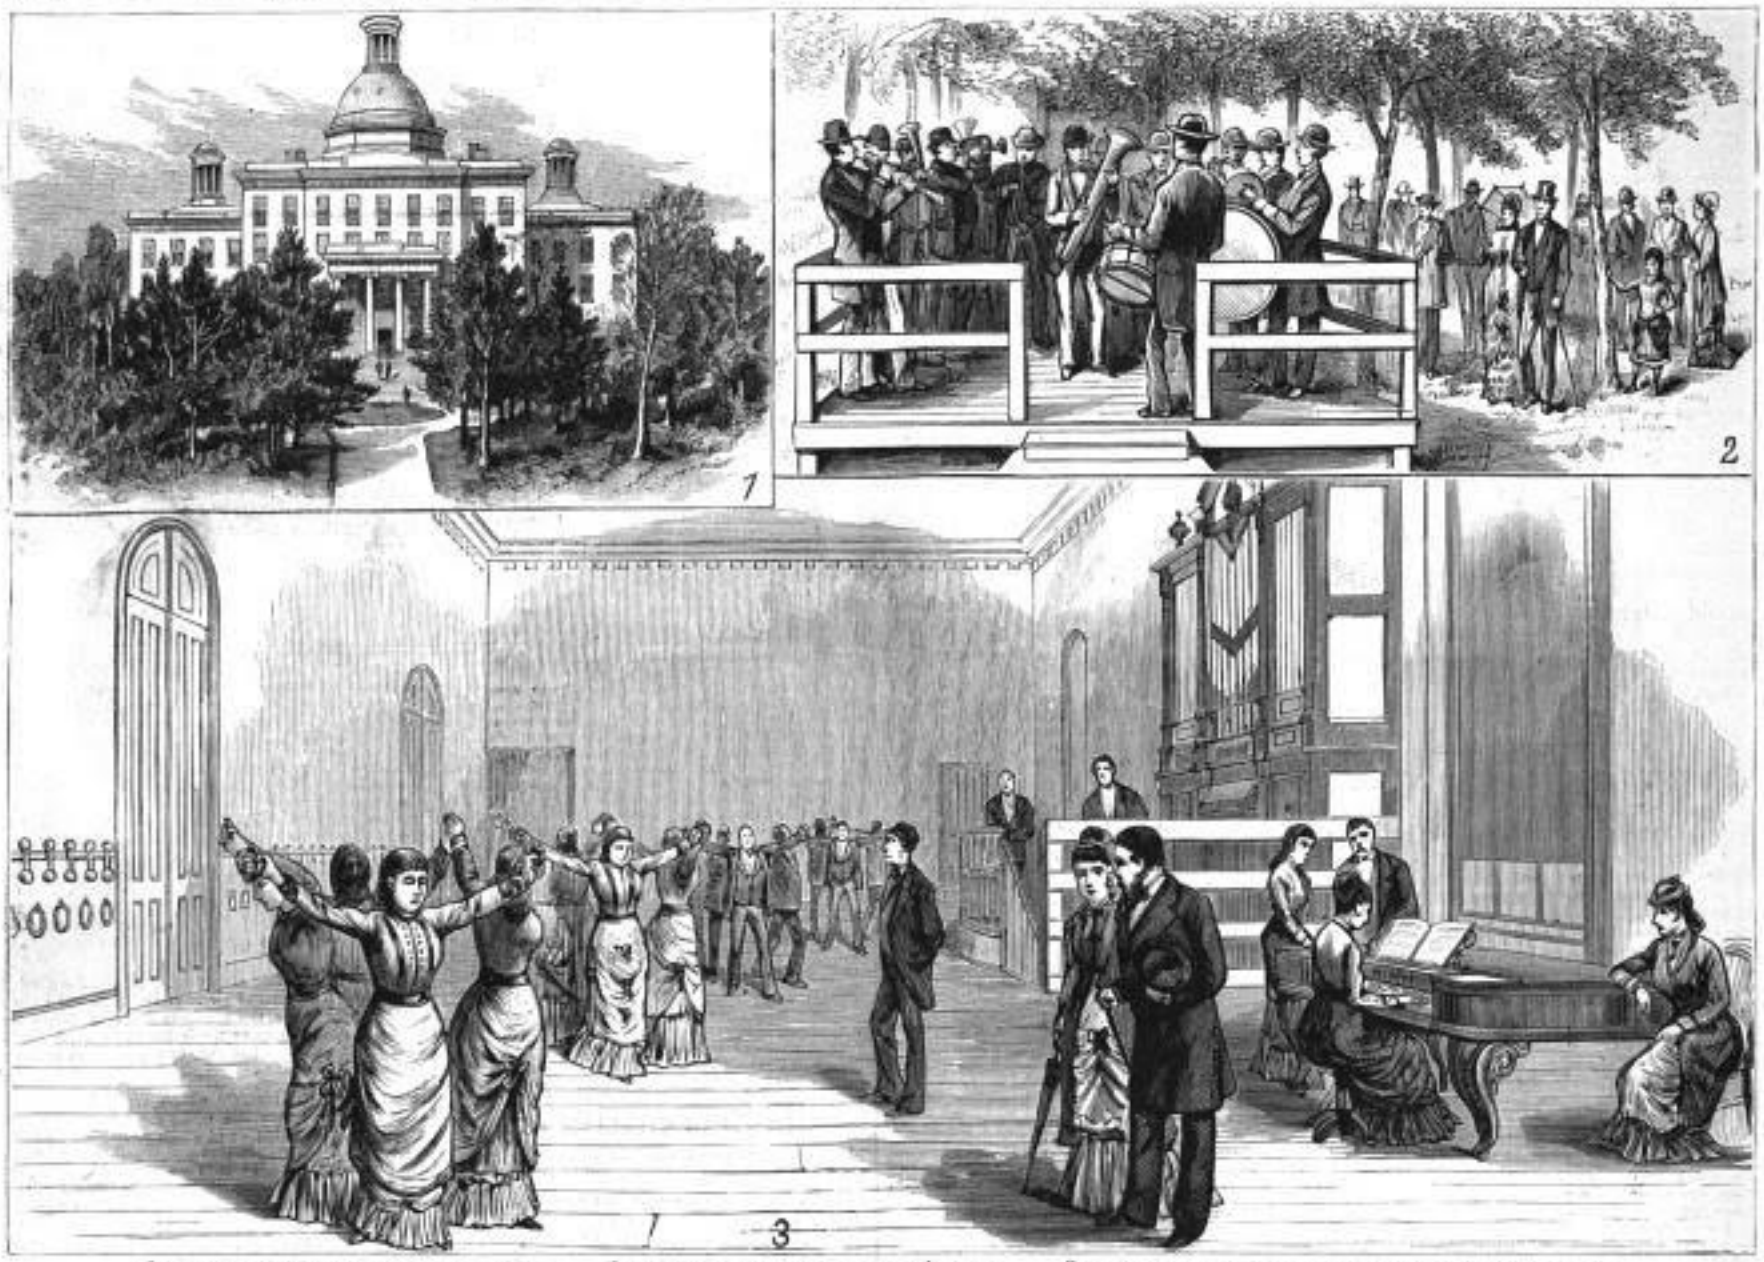
A PARIS dispatch states that Sarah Bernhardt has accepted an offer of an engagement in the United States for 60 nights, the season to begin in November next. She is to receive 3,000 francs for each night. Two hundred thousand francs are deposited as security in the Bank of France.

BESIDES the $100,000 which Wellesley Female College received from Mrs. Stone for the erection of a new hall, the corner-stone of which was laid May 27th, the college has lately received $15,000 from Mr. M. H. Simpson, of Boston, to be used in erecting another dormitory, and a $5,000 scholarship, for which preference is to be given to the daughters of foreign missionaries.

MR. STRAHAN, the well-known London publisher, has sailed for the United States. It is said that one of the objects of his visit is to ascertain whether American publishers are not willing to agree to some better compromise than any of the many which have been suggested in America relative to international copyright. It is hoped that at the next session a successful attempt will be made to settle this vexed question.

AMONG recent deaths we note that of Richard B. Connolly, the ex-Comptroller of New York, who fled to Europe on the breaking up of the Tweed Ring, at Marseilles, on May 30th, aged 70; M. Passy, the venerable French statesman, at Paris; William Scott Murray, who had been a merchant of New York for 45 years, on June 2d, aged 77; the Empress of Russia, at St. Petersburg, June 3d, aged 56; Colonel J. C. Audenried, U.S.A., of General Sherman's staff, June 3d.

THE wife of the Hon. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, is plump and rosy, with dark hair and animated countenance. This lady is gifted with that rare, precious quality which enables its possessor to put every person around her at ease, diffusing sunshine and blessing wherever she moves. This talent would be most available in shaking hands with a thousand strangers, what no queen, except an American queen, is expected to do. Mr. Morrison's many friends rejoice in the acquaintance of his affable and admirable wife.



MRS. JUSTICE FIELD is fine-looking, many years the junior of her husband, brilliant in conversation, though often reticent. The Fields, as sons of a clergyman, have survived the popular notion that the sons of ministers are sure to go to the bad. Cyrus W., the cable man; David Dudley, the noted lawyer; Henry M., the editor of the Evangelist; as well as the Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, all live to prove that ministers' sons have only to do good and be good, and their chances to life are fully equal to those of other men's sons.

MRS. SENATOR WINDOM is one of those sprightly women whose brilliancy attracts. Tall and graceful, with an animated face that lights up in conversation, an easy, affable and engaging manner—the unbridled expression of a warm heart—it is no marvel that callers at Senator Windom's carry long, thus virtually crowning the hostess queen. The school where Mrs. Windom educates her children is their own home, and she herself is their sole teacher. What is of rare occurrence, both Senator Windom and his gifted wife are blessed with that indefinable quality we call magnetism, rendering their society most attractive.

MRS. E. B. WASHBURNE is described as petite, dark-eyed, emotional, a fine conversationalist, an enthusiastic, warm-hearted friend. As mistress of a household she is alert, a faithful mother of numerous children, yet ever ready to entertain, on short notice, Mr. Washburne's constituents—and not only so, but to enter with zeal into their plans. Her spontaneous benevolence found ample scope when, as Minister to France, Mr. Washburne, through the terrible siege of Paris, found his hands and heart full, in relieving suffering. In this way the Washburnes became endeared to many who cherish for them profound esteem and gratitude.

MRS. JUDGE EDMUNDS is a person of fine culture. The first impression is that of repose and gentleness and quiet dignity, with a soft manner not in the least self-assertive. Of medium figure and brunette complexion, the arched eyebrows remind one of those French beauties such as the old masters were fond of delineating as expressive of devotional spirit. At once, as you enter Mrs. Edmonds's drawing-room, you perceive an air of refined domestic culture such as pertains to a New England home. There are books and music, pictures and embroidery—all bespeaking not only the taste, but the talent, of the gentle hostess. The eldest daughter, Miss Mary, endowed with the taste and talent, both artistic and literary, of both the parents, does the honors of the house, and takes her place beside her father in society during the absence of the mother and younger sister in Europe. Mr. Edmunds lives in his own modest house on the heights, near the Thomas statue, when in Washington.

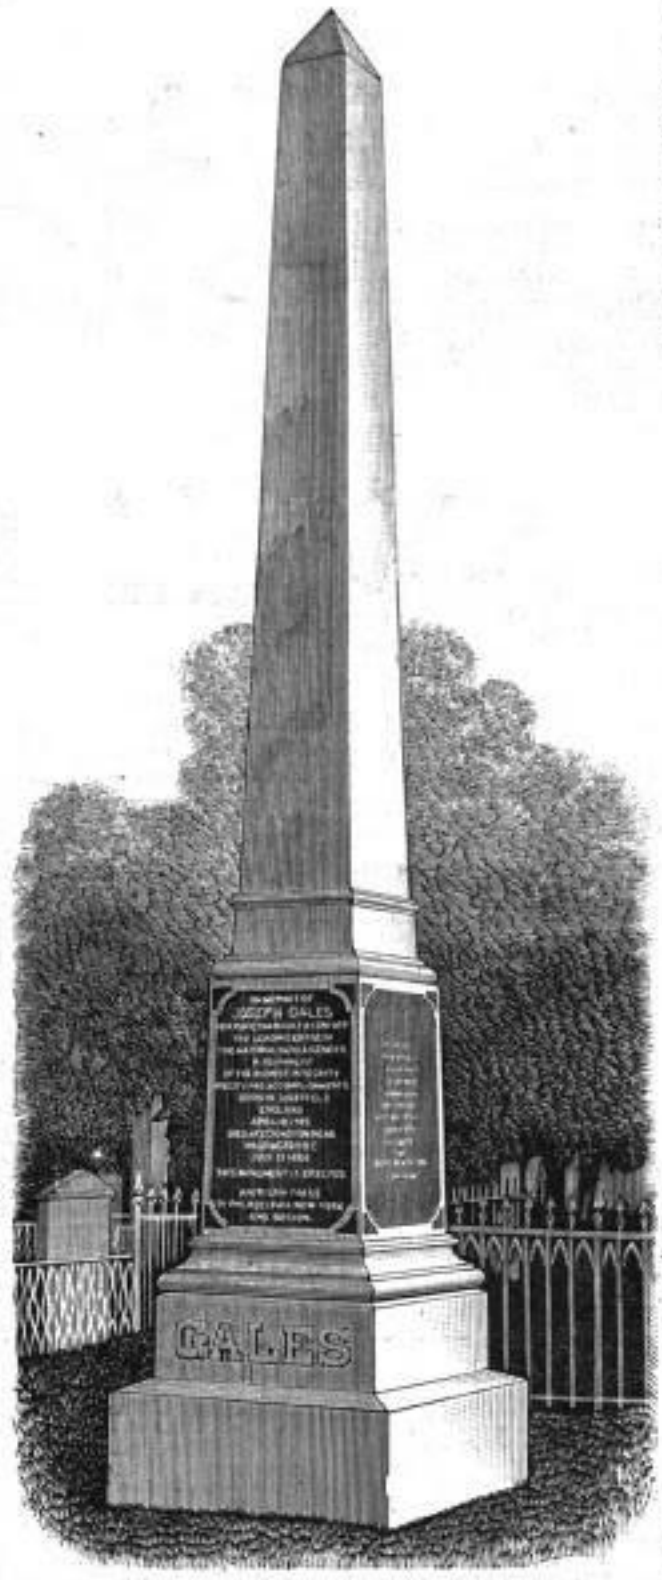
TESTIMONIAL TO MR. BERGH.

AN elegant gold badge, set with diamonds, is now on exhibition at Tiffany's, which has been presented to Henry Bergh as "a mark of the personal esteem and friendship" of the following gentlemen, comprising the Executive Committee of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals: N. M. Beckwith, James M. Brown, Nathan C. Ely, Frederick Gallatin, Elbridge T. Gerry, John P. Haines, Benjamin D. Hicks, John Taylor Johnston, Charles Lanier, Royal Phelps, Frederick W. Stevens, James Stokes, Sinclair Tousey and Charles L. Tiffany. Accompanying the badge is a beautifully-illuminated scroll, to which is appended the signatures of the above-named gentlemen.

THE HOWGATE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

THE Howgate Arctic Expedition is expected to sail for its destination during the present week. The expedition vessel, the Galatea, has been fitted up to accommodate comfortably forty persons—twenty-five constituting the permanent or station party and fifteen the officers and crew of the vessel. The crew are supplied with rations for sixteen months. The officers and men of the crew are detailed from those now in service.



DIAMOND BADGE PRESENTED TO HENRY BERGH, ESQ.

The station or permanent party consists of Lieutenant A. W. Greely, Fifth United States Cavalry, commander, with, as assistants, Lieutenant G. C. Doane, Second United States Cavalry; Lieutenant W. H. Low, Twentieth United States Infantry; Henry Clay, Volunteer Aid; Astronomer—Orray Taft Sherman, who was connected with the Florence Expedition, and, as assistants, George H. Roble, W. S. Jewell and O. Aldrich, of the Signal Corps, United States Army; Surgeon and Naturalist, Dr. Octave Pavy; Photographer, J. W. Rice, and fourteen enlisted men as a working party. In addition to these, two half-breeds have been engaged as dog-drivers, and will join the vessel at a place called Rigolet, on the coast of Labrador.

Dr. Octave Pavy, the surgeon and naturalist, is a native of France, thirty-five years of age, and graduated in art and science at the University of Paris, where he also spent several years in the study of medicine. In 1868, Dr. Pavy became attached as secretary to the organization of the proposed French Arctic Expedition, under the command of M. Gustave Lambert. This expedition failed through the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, during which M. Lambert was killed. Dr. Pavy commanded a company of guerrillas during that war, and did some excellent service with his troop. At the termination of hostilities he came to America for the purpose of prosecuting, on his own account, an expedition to the Arctic, via Behring's Strait, in continuation of the original plans of M. Lambert. The sudden death in San Francisco of the person who was to provide the necessary funds for the expedition brought the enterprise to an untimely end, but failed to quench the desire of Dr. Pavy to ultimately reach the far North. For several years he has been practicing medicine in the West, and devoting his spare time to the study and advocacy of Arctic enterprise. His selection by Captain Howgate for the position he occupies on the present expedition will give him the long-hoped-for opportunity of battling with the Frost King in his own chosen stronghold.

"Harry" Clay, as he is familiarly called in Kentucky, is a grandson of the great statesman of that name, and is a man of varied accomplishments. He has a sanguine temperament, expressive gray eyes, and is light both in weight and complexion. He is twenty-nine years of age, and has traveled extensively in Europe. He was born in Lisbon, Portugal, where his father was the American Minister, and was christened on board the U. S. man-of-war Independence. He has for a number of years been a practicing lawyer in Louisville, Ky., and has made a fine reputation in his profession. He now fills the position of Prosecuting Attorney for the city, to which office he was elected in 1878. He goes with the expedition in the capacity of Volunteer Aid to the commanding officer.

D. C.—MONUMENT ERECTED OVER THE GRAVE OF JOSEPH GALES, IN THE CONGRESSIONAL CEMETERY, WASHINGTON.

GENERAL FRANCIS WALKER.

GENERAL FRANCIS WALKER, the Superintendent of the Census of 1880, the taking of which began simultaneously in every city, town and village of the United States on Tuesday morning, June 1st, was born in Boston, July 3d, 1840. In 1860 he graduated at Amherst College with high honors, and had just entered upon the study of law when the war broke out, and he promptly volunteered for service. He remained in the field until 1865, having served on the staffs of Generals Couch, Warren and Hancock, and passing the last two years as Assistant Adjutant-General. In 1869 he was appointed to the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, and in February, 1870, was made Superintendent of the Census. A year later he was appointed Commissioner of Indian Affairs, holding that office for a year in addition to the Superintendency of the Census, and resigning it to accept the Professorship of Political Economy and History in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale College.

Early in 1876 he was appointed Chief of the Bureau of Awards in the Centennial Exposition, a jury composed of two hundred and twenty-five gentlemen, half American and half European.

His official report upon the Ninth Census (1870) was embraced in three quarto volumes, published in 1872. By reason of the extreme laborious and painstaking manner of compilation, writing and indexing exhibited in this work, the report has been praised at home and abroad as the most complete statistical document of a public character extant. Besides this, he has produced more or less elaborate papers on "The Indian Question" (1873), and "The Wages Question" (1876), and a most comprehensive "Statistical Atlas of the United States" (1874).

He has been honored with the medal of the first-class by the Geographical Congress at Paris, 1875, with the degree of M. A. from both Amherst and Yale, and that of Ph. D. from Amherst. The taking, compiling and reporting the Tenth Census could not have been confided to abler hands.

FRANCIS A. WALKER, SUPERINTENDENT OF THE CENSUS OF 1880.

HISTORIC DOUBTS.

IT has been strongly doubted whether Joan of Arc ever suffered the punishment that has made her a martyr, though details of her execution and last moments grace the civic records of Rouen. Several books have been published discussing the question. A Belgian lawyer is the author of one of these. He contends that the historians—who have done nothing but copy each other in the narratives of her death—err exceedingly in saying that it took place on the last day of May, 1473, the fact being that she was alive and well many years after that date. There are good grounds, too, for believing that the pretty tale of "Abelard and Heloise" is a pure fiction. Nobody has yet unriddled the mystery of the "Man in the Iron Mask," and nobody seems likely to do so, while the identity of the writer of the "Junius" letters is as far from being settled as ever. These are two insoluble enigmas, impenetrable mysteries that baffle solution, and about which, perhaps, the public has become tired of surmises.

An extremely witty and characteristic anecdote, told of Lord Beaconsfield, will bear repetition. An admirer from a distant country brought his two sons to the then Mr. Disraeli and asked him to give MONUMENTAL HONOR TO A VETERAN EDITOR.

SOME time ago the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Boston, called attention to the fact that the grave of Joseph Gales, for fifty years editor of the National Intelligencer, had remained unmarked since the interment. Mr. Winthrop inaugurated an effort to procure a suitable monument in memory of the once famous editor, and was ably seconded by George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, who offered, with a liberality entirely characteristic of him, to defray the whole expense himself. It was thought best, however, to solicit contributions from other sources as well. The sum of $700 was quickly raised, being contributed by Mr. George W. Childs, by Mr. Goddard, of the Boston Advertiser, and other editors in Boston, and by Mr. Robert Bonner and Mr. George Jones, of New York City; and the monument, of which we give an illustration, has been erected over the grave in the Congressional Cemetery at Washington, D. C.

The following inscription, prepared by Mr. Winthrop, appears on the face of the monument:

them a word of advice on their introduction into life. "Never try to ascertain," said the illustrious statesman to the elder boy, "who was the man who wore the iron mask, or you will be thought a terrible bore. Nor do you," turning to the second, "ask who was the author of 'Junius,' or you will be thought a bigger bore than your brother."

Walpole wrote an ingenious work to show—taking for his base the conflicting statements in history and biography—that no such person as Richard III. ever existed, or that if he did he could have been neither a tyrant nor a hunchback. "Historic Doubts Relative to Napoleon Bonaparte" was published in London in 1810, and created widespread amusement because of its amazing cleverness. Napoleon, who was at the time a captive at St. Helena, admired the composition greatly. Archbishop Whately and Sydney Smith were both reputed to be the author. Since the publication of that skit numerous imitations have been issued, but none have shown much originality or literary skill, and have therefore vanished into the darkness of merited oblivion.

Edward Everett Hale, on the Church of the Bay Colony, New England, entitled "A Quarter-millennium"; a biographical and critical sketch, by Alfreton Hervey, of Franz Liszt, the pianist and composer; a sketch of the Emperor Tiberius, by Herbert Lee, being in continuation of the series of Gentile rulers mentioned in Scripture; No. 6 of "The Children of the Bible—The Widow's Son"; "Aaron, the High Priest," another of the series of Old Testament characters; an interesting paper on "Modern Jewish Life"; and other entertaining articles, all fully and beautifully illustrated. Will be issued Thursday, JUNE 24th.

The Japanese Treaty.

THE Japanese evidently prefer the draft of a new commercial treaty between Japan and the Western powers, but threats of England, through diplomatic agents, prevent such presumption. Japan, being under the unwholesome fear of exciting British animosity, Minister Bingham strongly protests, not only in the maintenance of American interests, but for the sake of Japanese liberties, which are menaced by constant European interference. He expresses himself unreservedly in reprobation of the reprehensible methods employed to advance English projects at the cost of Japanese integrity, and regardless of American privileges, but nothing can dispel the terror with which English officials inspire Japan whenever so disposed. The execution of a new treaty appears remote, as every question of the restoration of the Simonoseki indemnity to Japan is complicated by claimants on the Japanese treasury residing in this country and elsewhere. Though not pretending to the slightest connection with the Simonoseki business, they allege that, being Americans, their demands should be satisfied out of moneys recurred by America, and threaten to retard the passage of refunding Bills, by means of friends in Washington, in case of refusal. The Japanese Government appears unaccountably embarrassed by these alleged claims, notwithstanding they receive no support from the United States Legation.

FUN.

"OUR new Constitution has one very weak spot," said Denis Kearney. "It should have provided a Board of Pardons."

ATMOSPHERICAL knowledge is not thoroughly distributed to our schools. A boy being asked, "What is mist?" vaguely responded, "An umbrella."

MAMMA seeks to console her crying child: "Why do you cry, John? What has hurt you?" "Mamma," and he bawls more lustily than ever, "yesterday I fell down and hurt myself." "Yesterday! Then why do you cry to-day?" "Oh, because you were not at home yesterday."

A BOY can imagine almost anything; he can lug an old shot-gun about all day without firing at a living thing and be under the impression that he is having a howling good time. But all attempts to induce a boy to imagine that he's killing Indians, when he is sawing wood, have proved futile.

TO GRATIFY his wife's persistent demand for a Summer in the country, Smith hired a suburban villa of which, however, the garden was so small that one could scarcely turn in it. "But how do you get the air in such a tiny garden?" one of her friends asked of Mrs. Smith. "Oh, it is easy enough," answered that lady. "We have only to open the dining-room window."

B, who has conceived quite a liking for C, invites him occasionally to his house. He met him the other day. "Come and dine with me this evening?" "No," responded C, hesitatingly. "Oh, come along." "Well. But lend me a louis." "A louis?" "Yes," replied the modest C. "I have dined at your house a dozen times, and I have never yet presented a bouquet to your wife."

SECOND THOUGHTS.—Candidate: "How many cabs and conveyances do you say there are in town, Smithers, and how much do they ask for election day?" Steward: "About five hundred, Sir Henry—they want five pounds each for the day—and they've nearly all of 'em votes—" Sir Henry: "Hum—hum"—(does mental sum)—"Bless my soul! that's two thousand five hundred pounds! Do you know, Smithers, I begin to have very grave doubts whether I'm a 'fit an' proper person' to represent this borough!"

ON THE EVE OF ST. VALENTINE.—Squire (who will have his joke): "I hear they're getting up a subscription for poor old Walter Chalks, the postman. He's almost past his work." Dear Girls (both together): "Poor, dear old man. I am sure he deserves a pension." Squire: "That he does. He's ill in bed to-day with acute rheumatism; and so to-morrow I suppose we must do without our letters the best way we can. Can't expect him to come out, you know, this awful weather." Dear Girls (under their breath): "Bother his rheumatism! The old stupid!"

JOHN WILLIAMS, merchant of Rutledge, Ga., sued a desperado. The defendant, in a furious passion, entered the store, held out the summons in one hand, clutched a long knife in the other, and said, "Williams, have you sued me?" Williams knew that an immediate "Yes" would make him sure of a stab. "Let me get my spectacles, so that I can read the paper," he said. He went behind the counter and came back, not with his glasses, but with an ax across his shoulder. "Yes," he said, "I have sued you." "All right," remarked the desperado, "I guess I'll pay the bill."

A LITTLE washing-soda was wanted for cleansing purposes; so George was given a dime and dispatched to the apothecary's at the corner to get it. George soon returns, but no soda. "Why didn't you get the soda, George?" chorused the family. "I did." "Where is it, then?" "I drank it." "Drank it!" "Yes; the man said it wouldn't keep to bring home." A light dawns on the family's mind. It asks eagerly, "What did you ask for?" "Soda." "Didn't you say washing-soda?" "Washing-soda? No; only soda." Family laughs as though it were crazy. George doesn't know what all the fun's about, but he is subsequently heard to say, "That was a boss drink!"

$500 REWARD—CATARRH CURE.

SOME people would rather be humbugged than to get "value received" for their money. Hence it is that such persons run after this and that pretended cure for catarrh, forgetting that Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is so positive in its effects that its former proprietor advertised it for years throughout the United States under a positive guarantee, offering $500 reward for an incurable case, and was never called upon to pay this reward except in two cases. This remedy has acquired such a fame that a branch office has been established in London, England, to supply the foreign demand for it. Sold by druggists at 50 cents.

UNABLE TO BREATHE THROUGH NOSE.

PORTLANDVILLE, Iowa, March 11th, 1879.

DR. R. V. PIERCE:

Dear Sir—Some time ago I bought a Douche, some of your Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy and Golden Medical Discovery, and commenced to use them. The aches and pains, as well as sore throat and catarrh from which I have been for so long a time a sufferer, have entirely left me with their use. I feel like a new man as well as look like one. For four years I was unable to breathe through my nose. From the use of the Catarrh Remedy I can now do so freely. Your medicines I know to be all that they are represented. Long live Dr. Pierce and the gentlemen connected with him.

Gratefully yours, WATSON SMITH.

NO ONE ever stopped at the ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL and left dissatisfied. With a capacity that has few equals among the hotels in this city, and a location which places it in the vicinity of both social and business portions, the ST. NICHOLAS is still further advanced in value by the excellent fare provided for its guests. Especial pains are taken to make transient patrons happy, and people passing through New York on their way to Summer resorts will find the ST. NICHOLAS just the place for a rest, while their baggage can be checked to any point in the United States. The ST. NICHOLAS still further saves the traveler care and annoyance by providing messengers on the trains who attend to the baggage of passengers coming to that house.

HALFORD SAUCE.—Unrivaled by any relish. Intended for family use. Recommended by the best families.

"AN ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure"; therefore, it is cheaper and better during these Summer months to keep well than to pay doctors' bills. WERNER'S "AMERICA" Extra Dry Champagne is recognized and prescribed by many leading physicians of all schools as one of the safest and most satisfactory sanitary agents. It sustains the tone of the whole system, enabling it to withstand sudden changes of temperature and other attacks frequent in Summer, and maintains all the while sound, vigorous health. As a medicine or as a beverage, WERNER'S "AMERICA EXTRA DRY" is not excelled by any home or foreign wines.

THE New Jersey Central Railroad has issued a guide-book showing the attractions of the large number of Summer resorts reached by the roads of that company, together with the distance, fare, etc., from New York to each important point. To persons contemplating Summer tours, the little volume will be found of peculiar interest.

EPPS'S COCOA.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"BY a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines—the Louis and the Baden Baden—covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

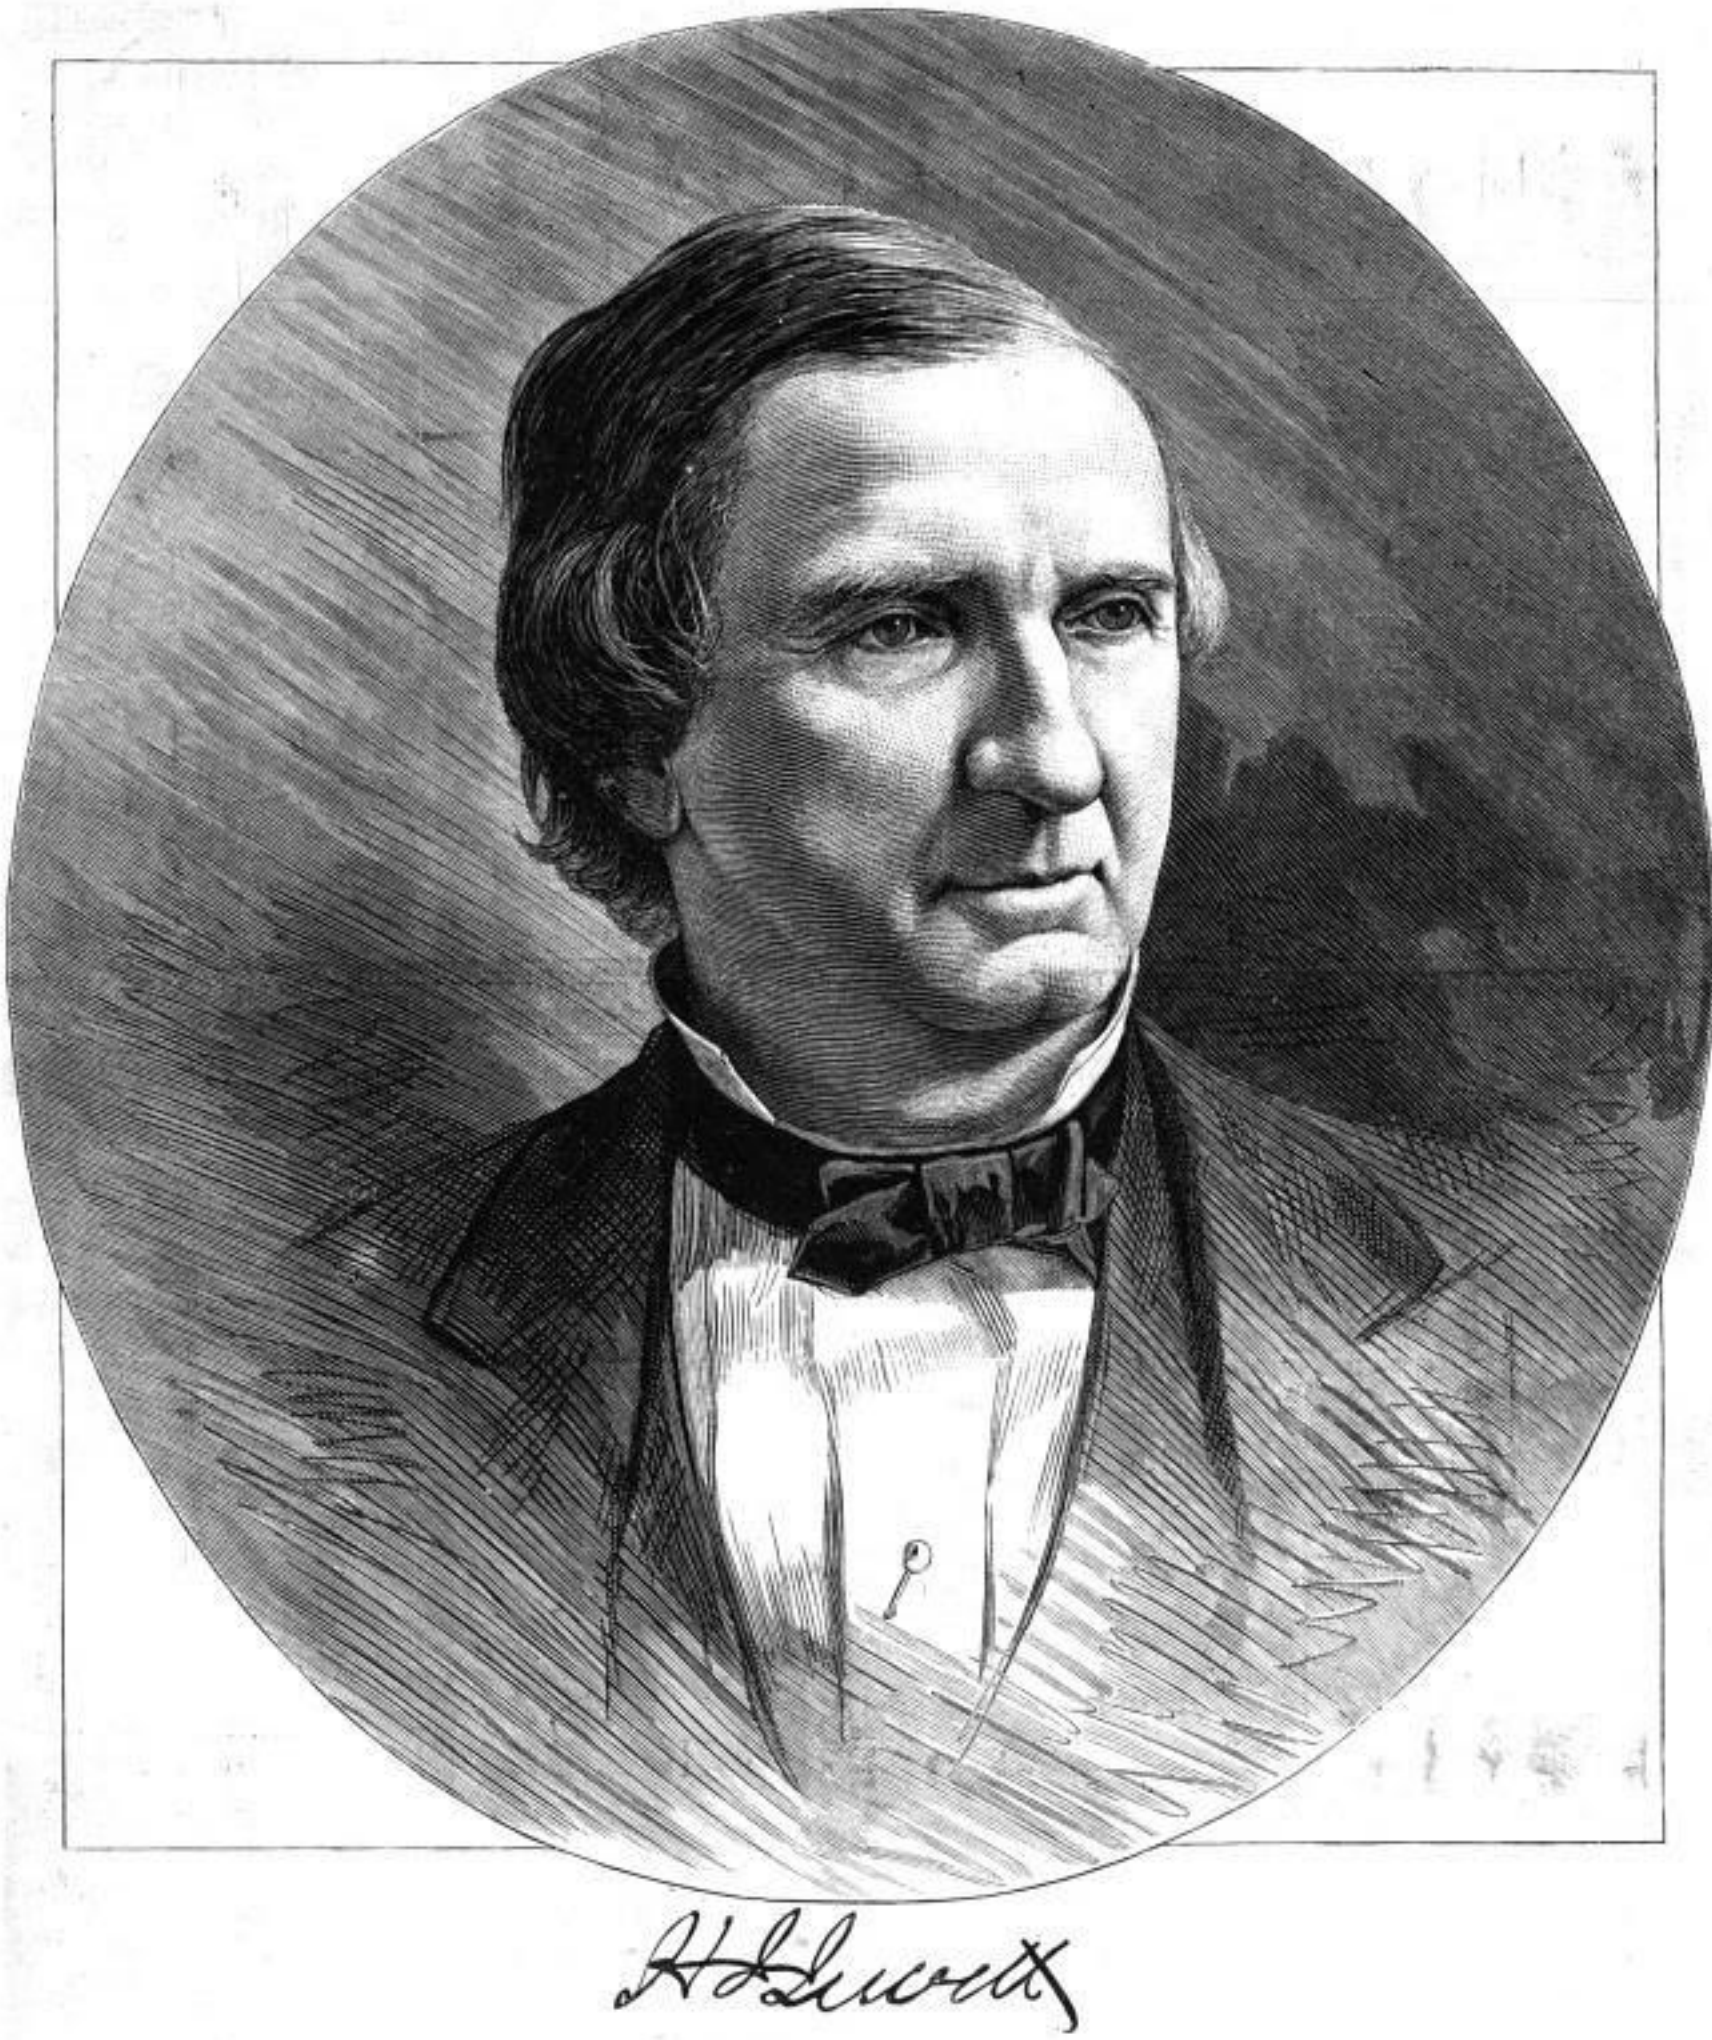
POSSIBLE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

HUGH J. JEWETT, PRESIDENT OF THE ERIE RAILWAY.

MR. HUGH J. JEWETT, who ranks conspicuously among the self made men of the time, is a native of the State of Maryland, where he studied law and was admitted to the Bar. In 1840, desiring a fresh and larger field, he removed to Ohio, which, at that day, was regarded as the "Far West," but afforded peculiar opportunities to enterprising and ambitious spirits. He at first located in a modest country town, where he speedily established a reputation for ability and industry; but another sphere opening, he, in 1848, removed to Zanesville, then having a population of nearly 4,000. Here success continued to follow him in even more generous measure than before.



Mr. Jewett's rare judgment and his natural aptitude for cases involving financial questions gave him a lucrative commercial practice and led to his election, in 1852, as President of the Muskingum branch of the Ohio State Bank. He had, also, the tastes and aptitudes of a statesman, and was in 1852 a Presidential Elector; in 1853 was elected to the State Senate, and soon after was appointed United States District Attorney for the southern district of Ohio.

But he also took a great interest in railway matters, and his ability in this line was recognized by his election, in 1858, as a director of the Central Ohio Railroad Company. Here he found a field of labor so congenial and so well fitted to draw out his faculties, that, in 1866, he was elected vice-president and general manager, and in 1867 was made president. When the panic of that year and the resulting difficulties compelled resort to a receivership, the confidence in his integrity and management was shown by his appointment as receiver in 1869.

In 1860 he was nominated for Congress, but he was defeated, the district being very strongly Republican, although he greatly reduced the Republican majority. In 1861 he was the Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio, and in 1863 was nominated for the United States Senate. In 1867 he was returned to the State Legislature, and in 1872 he was elected to Congress, where his remarkable grasp of the financial questions gave him at once a very high standing. During all this period of his political career Mr. Jewett's position was that of a man whose candidacy was a compliment from his own party to his superior personal strength, which, it was hoped, might secure for his party a victory otherwise hopeless.

In 1869 his success as a railway-manager having been altogether exceptional, he was elected President of the Little Miami and Columbus and Xenia Railroad, and shortly after was elected President also of the Cincinnati and Muskingum Valley Railroad. After a short residence in Cincinnati he removed to Columbus and was chosen Vice President of the Pittsburg, Cincinnati and St. Louis Railroad. In 1871 he retired from active railway management and became General Counsel for the Pennsylvania Company, but three years later was again called to the personal direction of a great railway property—the Erie—then discredited and bankrupted. His achievements in connection with the restoration of this important property are well known to the public, and need not be dwelt upon here. Suffice it to say that he has extricated the road from its multiform embarrassments, has re-established it in the confidence of the people, and has shown himself to be, in every respect, a man of the highest executive powers, as well as of indomitable courage in facing difficulties, and of the sternest integrity in the management of a great trust.

He is now named in connection with the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, especially as representing the solid conservative element of the party. He has done nothing in his own behalf, and will not consent to go into any scramble for the nomination; but should it, by any possibility, come to him, there can be no doubt that he would lead his party skillfully and acceptably.

NO. 10.—HON. HUGH J. JEWETT, OF OHIO.

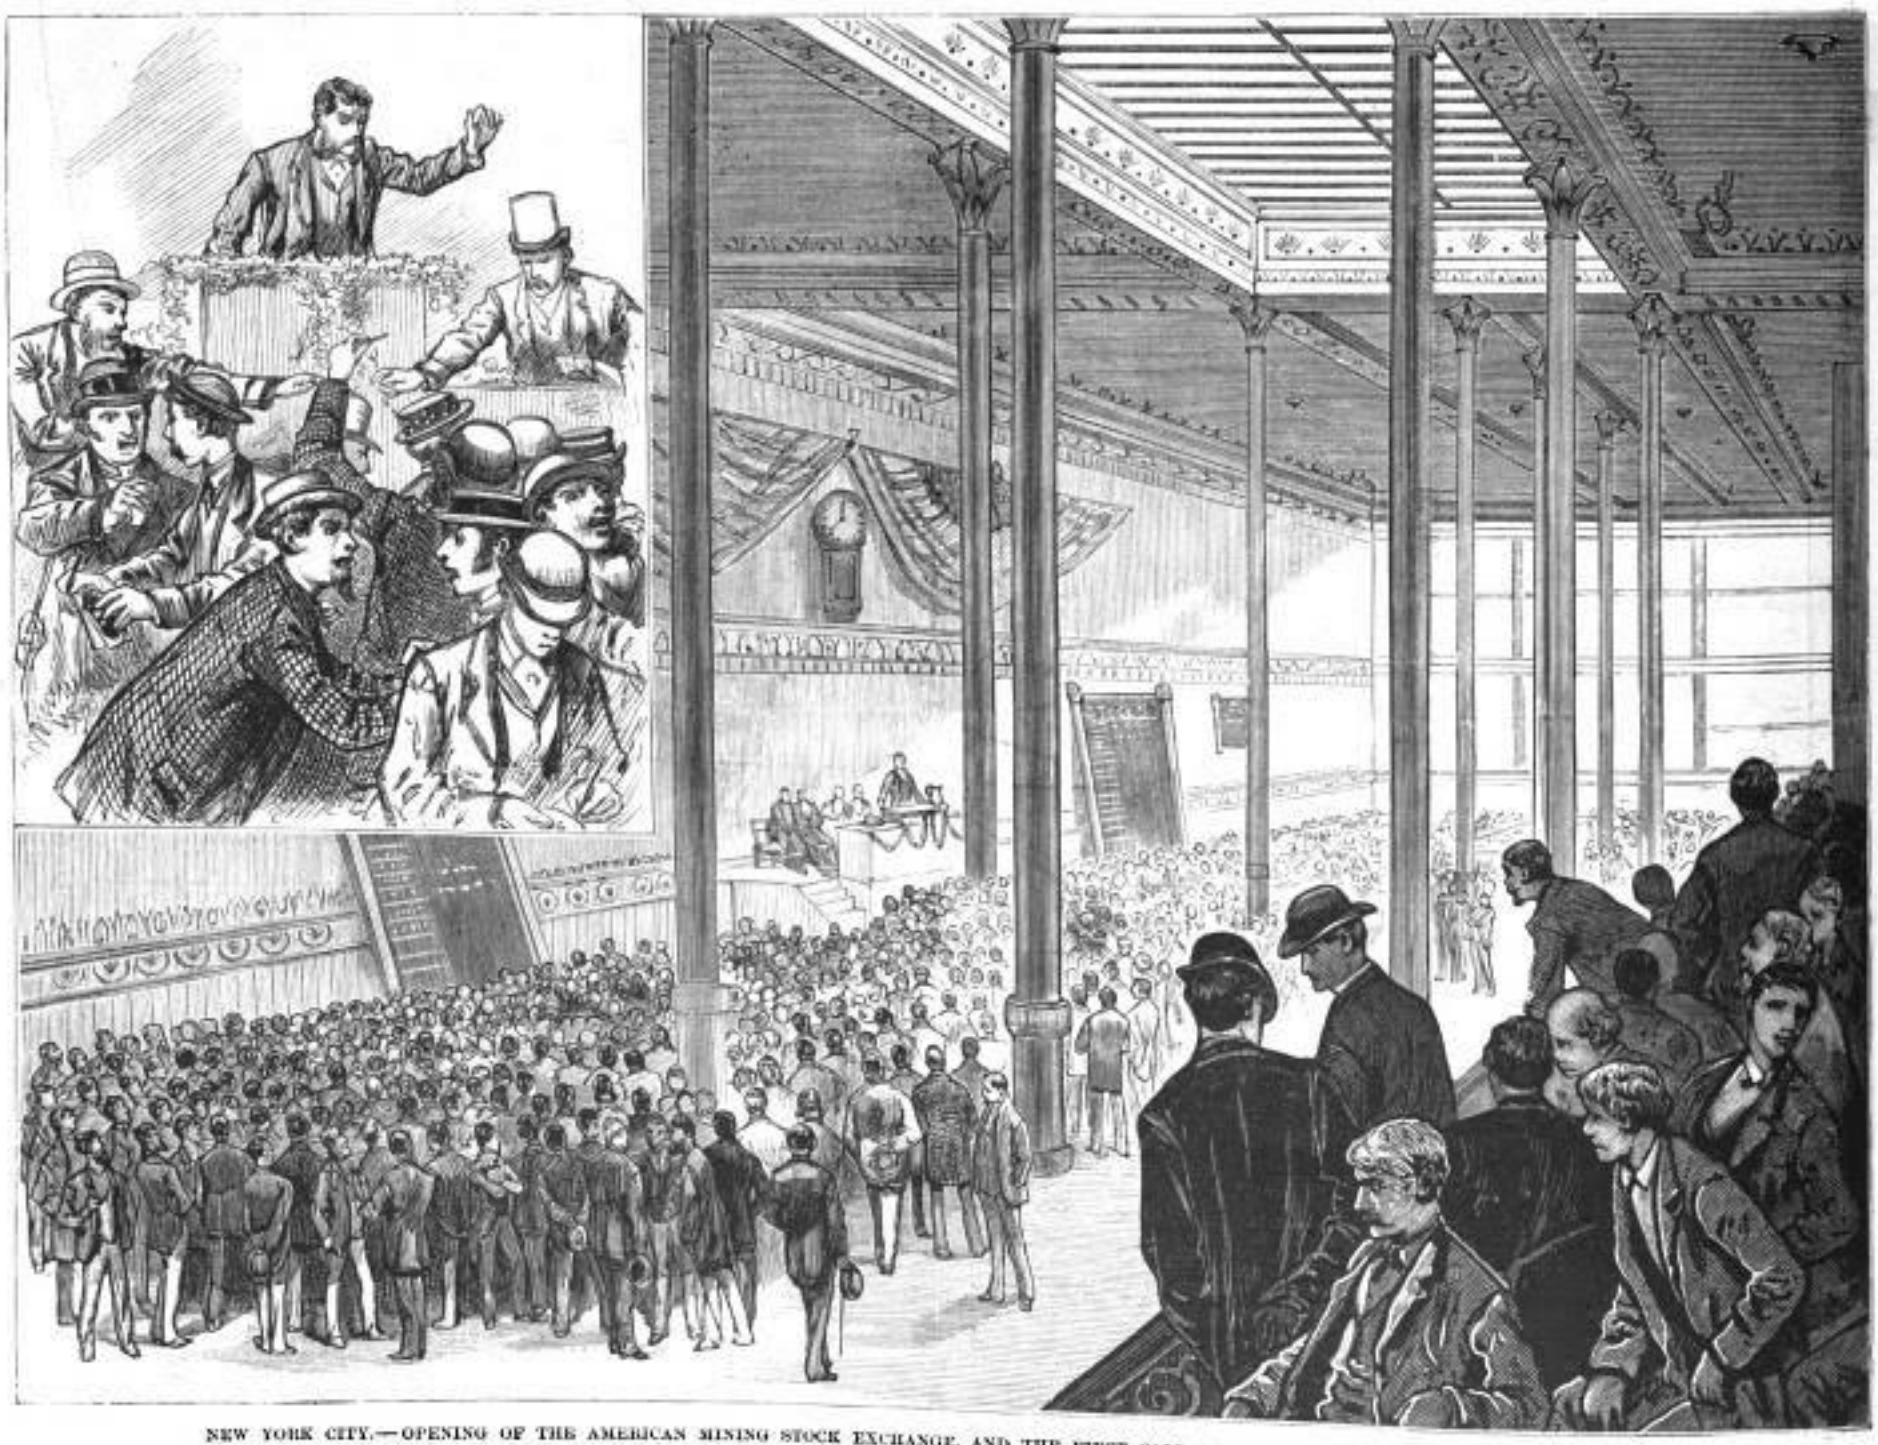
THE KINDERGARTEN SYSTEM IN MUSIC.



ANY one who has ever painfully accompanied a young beginner on the pianoforte through the early stages of finger exercises and "practicing"—word of horror to how many a parental ear!—must hail with joy a new era in musical instruction. A class has been held during the past Winter at the German-American Institute, in Fifty-second Street, by Professor S. M. Wolfsheim, where children of all ages, from four to ten or twelve, have been thoroughly taught the rudimentary steps, according to his original and very simple method, and young ladies, qualifying themselves for Kindergarten teaching, have received the necessary instruction in this new branch. Looking in at one of these classes in full progress, we were practically shown the advantages of Professor Wolfsheim's system, which may be described in a very few words.

The first step is, of course, to make acquaintance with the keys and notes. The teacher, seated at the piano with the class gathered around, strikes the notes as indicated on a large sheet of card before him, and names each one in succession until the children have become so far familiarized with them as to be able to pick them out with their own little fingers, striking correctly each note on the key-board as the teacher points it out upon the printed sheet. Then come the finger-gymnastics which help to give flexibility to those stubborn members, and impart the correct movements of the hand and wrist; the class standing in a row and counting in time to a simple accompaniment played by the teacher, while they go through with the exercise in concert. The third lesson brings into play dumb key-boards, at which the children sit, striking and calling off the names of the notes as the teacher points to them on his large card. This gives the necessary finger-exercise, and the proper positions of the wrist, elbow, etc. Fourthly, the key-boards are removed and the pupils take their first lesson in marking time, which is done with the two hands, alternately and together, upon the desk or table—and done, like all the other exercises, con amore. Lastly comes a march to some lively air played by the teacher, the children marking time with the feet and by striking dumbbells, while they count aloud, alternately, two, four, three and six.

It will be seen how readily, by these simple exercises, the youngest or the dullest child can master unconsciously those rudiments which, by the old method, are only imparted at the cost of trouble and disgust to the teacher and weariness to the pupil. To each step, taken separately, the little beginner is able to bring undivided interest, and when the time comes for combining and utilizing the knowledge and facility acquired, half the battle is already won. The child almost without knowing it has gained a correct touch, ease and freedom in the use of the hands, and is thoroughly drilled in time-keeping.

At this point, reached with one-half the usual expense of music lessons according to the old method, the child is ready for a second course, comprising the knowledge of the ledger-notes, a more complicated drill in time-keeping, and simple four-hand exercises on the piano, the children taking primo and secondo parts alternately. A bright and apt pupil, however, may be prepared by the first course for the lessons of a regular teacher, after the orthodox method.

OPENING OF A NEW EXCHANGE.

THE American Mining Stock Exchange, organized under the auspices of the Mining Trust Company, was formally opened for business on June 1st. The Board room of the Exchange is in the rear basement of the building, No. 63 Broadway, with large windows opening on New Church Street. It is 120 feet in length by 38 feet in width, and its height is that of two stories, the basement and first floor having been thrown into one. In the centre of the ceiling is a large skylight, extending to the roof, which, with the rear windows, affords light and ventilation. On the northern side of the room, and directly in line with the main entrance, which is reached by broad stairs from the Broadway hallway, is a gallery with two rows of chairs. This is intended for the use of brokers and dealers, and is separated from the main floor by an iron railing. Over this is the public gallery, which is on a level with the Broadway street floor. It contains also two rows of comfortable chairs upholstered in red leather. On the opposite side of the room is the rostrum, which is flanked on each side with large bulletin boards for the business of the Exchange. The walls and ceiling are decorated in gold and neutral colors picked out with brown and red. The space of the main floor is broken by twelve tall pillars which support the beams of the ceiling. They are painted a dark color. In honor of the opening ceremonies the rostrum had been decked with festoons of smilax, and on each side were baskets of cut flowers. Looped in graceful folds on the wall back of the chairman's desk hung American flags.

The initial ceremonies were attended by an immense throng. Mr. George W. Smiley, the chairman, delivered the inaugural address. He said that within thirty years the production of precious metals had added over $1,000,000,000 to the wealth of the country. Within two years upwards of $70,000,000 of Eastern capital had been invested in mines and mining properties. The total amount of dividends disbursed to shareholders in the mines west of the Sierra Nevada Mountains since 1859 was, in round numbers, $136,825,600. Of this the Comstock Lode furnished $120,229,400. During the same period the assessments levied on the same mines aggregated $73,070,000, leaving a profit of $63,755,500 above all expenses. The mines of Leadville yielded within two years over $13,000,000. One mine in the Bodie District distributed among the stockholders nearly $1,750,000, without one dollar having been levied in assessments.

The regular list was then called for the first time. It includes thirty-two stocks, and the bidding on some of these was very lively. Subsequently speeches were made by Hon. Milton S. Latham and C. T. Christensen. Mr. Latham, in the course of his remarks, said: "In this city alone the several mining companies are disbursing over $1,000,000 monthly in the way of dividends. In less than a year from to-day there will be disbursed in this city $25,000,000 per annum in the way of dividends." The exercises of the occasion terminated with an enjoyable lunch.

THE NEW RIVERSIDE DRIVE.

THE newly-opened Riverside Drive, running on the crest of the hill overlooking the Hudson River, from Seventy-second to One Hundred and Thirtieth Street, is the most beautiful of all the admirable drives around New York City. The city acquired the right to the land in 1872, and in the following year the Legislature gave the necessary authority for laying out the drive and the contiguous parks. Although the drive south of One Hundred and Twenty-second Street was completed some months ago, and the finished work had been accepted by the Department of Public Works, the contractors claimed that they had received no payments on account. Unwilling that the city should enjoy the work it had ordered, but had not paid for, the contractors erected and maintained at the intersection of all the graded streets connecting with the drive substantial barriers of wood and stone, being careful, however, that no excavations or other dangerous places existed. Early on the morning of May 7th every obstruction on the line of the drive was removed, the occasion for the haste being an injunction granted by Judge Lawrence restraining the city and the contractors from erecting or maintaining any of the obstructions alluded to.

The contractors for this splendid work are Messrs. Decker & Quintard, and they have certainly reason to be proud of their achievement.

Turkish Harem Life.

EVERY Turkish house is divided into two distinct parts, the selamlik and the harem, the former being reserved for the men, the latter for the women. This division exists in the palaces of the sultan as well as in the houses of the simple artisan. In public carriages, tramways or trains, women have their reserved places, protected by a curtain from the gaze of the people. The thousands of women who are in the harems of the sultan and of the princes of the imperial family are all slaves. There is not a single rich or well-to-do family in Turkey that does not possess a certain number of women and girl slaves. There are black and white slaves: the former, from Central Africa and Nubia; the latter, are Circassians, sold by their parents. This latter commerce is altogether free. As to the commerce of negresses, it is under the surveillance of the different consulates, and more especially of that of England.

The white slaves were formerly bought in Georgia and Circassia. Russia since she has conquered Circassia has prohibited this commerce; but many families have emigrated to Turkey, and they bring up several young girls to sell them as slaves. There are no longer public markets of slaves, and young girls are no longer bought as formerly at the bazaar, but there are houses known by the authorities where they are exposed for sale. Children of some years old are sold by Circassian families; the price varies according to the beauty of the children, from some hundreds to thousands of piastres. In an ordinary time girls of fifteen to sixteen, and who are really beautiful, are sold for about a hundred thousand piastres, over a thousand pounds. The ugly women are employed for domestic work, while those who are pretty are taught to sing, dance and write.

The question of slavery is well understood by the different embassies at Constantinople. Ambassadors' wives visit the harems of the sultan, of pashas and beys. They pass a whole day there sometimes, breakfasting and dining in the harems, being waited upon by slaves. Often on the very day that their wives are visiting the harems, the ambassadors send in a protest against slavery, having noted the arrival of a ship full of black slaves from Africa. As to the hundreds of thousands of white slaves who make up the harems, nothing is said of these. This slavery is one of the sources of the decline of Turkey. The law authorizes every Turk to marry four wives, and to have as many concubines as his purse will allow him. The sultans, having renounced political marriages with Christians and with daughters of their subjects, only live with slaves. Those slaves who become mothers are raised to the rank of cadine, but never to the rank of wife, for the sultan does not marry. In his quality of khalife, he is too much above a slave to contract a marriage with her. Abdul Hamid has four cadines. Besides, the Sultan Abdul Hamid has, according to custom, for his attendants, forty young girls chosen from among the most beautiful. They dress and undress him and accompany him to the bath; the cadine who displeases most is deposed. These ladies-maids bear the name of "odalisques," or "odaleuk" in Turkish. Those that become favorites with the sultan are called "ikbal." The other slaves of the palace perform all interior duty; some are trained to dance and form a corps de ballet; others to sing, who are kept for that purpose only. Cooking is generally performed by men in Turkey, at the palace as well as in private houses the cooks are for the most part Armenians. The Sultan Abdul Hamid is too fond of the harem, like his brother the ex-Sultan Mourad, and like his father the late Sultan Abdul Medjid.

As to the princesses of the imperial family, custom gives them the power of choosing their own husbands. They often go out in carriages and walk out; they thus have every opportunity of selecting a husband, who is, generally speaking, a young "bey" of good family. Very often the youth learns his fate when it is decided that he is to marry a princess. When the princess has selected some one she informs the mother of the sultan, and the latter informs her son. The young "bey" is not always pleased, but he must pretend to be so; if he shows any signs of displeasure, he is exiled and his family ruined. From the very moment that a young man is selected by a princess, his life cannot be called his own. He is raised to a high rank, in the army generally, as Turkish princesses have a weakness for uniforms; but he must be very careful in his behavior, for all his actions are noticed up to his marriage, which takes place several months, sometimes two years, afterwards. A young man of seventeen was chosen by a princess, and he was made a General of Division. Three days after he paid too much attention to a young girl, and for having done so he was degraded. He left the country and lived in Paris. On his return to Constantinople he was so badly received by every one that he started for Egypt, and would not now return to Constantinople for worlds.

The gardens of the harems are protected by walls raised to a great height. The doors of the harem, as well as those of the selamlik, are never locked. In the daytime no beds are to be seen; they are only got ready at night. The bed is most simple—a mattress laid on the floor, and two sheets and a pillow. The next morning these things are placed in a room on purpose; there are no cupboards of any sort. The general aspect of the harem is triste, there being nothing to relieve the eye. The sons of pashas, beys and effendis marry young. Living in the harem in their infancy, when they are fourteen years old they demand an odalisque, who is, generally speaking, a slave from the harem of their father. The young girl at once is freed from all want, dressed in the choicest of dresses, and, should she later on give birth to a child, she becomes a "hamoum." If, on the contrary, she has no child, she is sold again at a loss to the original owner. The young man takes another slave, and continues doing so till he becomes a father. The wife of a pasha has the title of hamoum effendi; her authority in the harem is great, almost absolute. The master of a house, pasha, bey or effendi, and his children are, like the sultan, served by slaves, who attend them while they take their baths, and render all manner of other service.

The child of a slave has a share in the fortune of its father. Infanticide is in no way punished in Turkey, though there are thousands of cases in the country. Out of twenty marriages in Turkey fourteen are made with slaves, and the other six with free daughters of Mussulmans. It is somewhat rare to find a hamoum who is able to read well; they, for the most part, know only how to sing, dance, and play on some instrument. They only really care about their toilet.

The lower classes alone in Turkey have preserved their virtues; the upper classes are all more or less depraved. The Vizir Fuad Pasha once said, in pointing to the wall of a harem, "As long as that wall lasts we shall remain unfitted for modern progress." What is too true unfortunately in all this is, that neither the sultan, pashas, beys nor effendis have the desire or the wish to accomplish this reform, for they are too fond of the harems.

A Prophetic Dream.

THIS story of a prophetic dream comes from California: Amasa Wilsey, of Petaluma, dreamed last Autumn that he would die on the 1st of May, 1880. The occurrence oppressed him, although he affected to attach no importance to it, and he took out policies in three insurance companies so as to leave his wife provided for in case of his death. On the 1st of May he was apparently in perfect health, and preparations were made to give a dinner to his friends in the evening, to celebrate his escape from the fulfillment of his vision. The party had just gathered, however, when he fell from his chair, stricken with heart disease, and died in a few minutes.

The Slave Trade in Egypt

A LETTER from Cairo, under date of May 30, says: "The slave trade in Egypt has lately been 'booming.' Within the past three weeks no less than five convoys of slaves have arrived from Kordofan, Sennar and Darfour. On April 20th, a caravan openly entered Assiout—a town of 80,000 inhabitants, situated on the left bank of the Nile, some two hundred and fifty miles south of Cairo. Assiout is the metropolis of Upper Egypt—the Thebaid—and is the southern terminus of the railway connecting that region with Alexandria. This caravan was the property of about fifty different slave dealers, and was composed of 500 camels and upwards of nine hundred slaves. By far the greater number of these slaves were girls and boys between the ages of seven and eighteen years. The more youthful and promising of the boys narrowly escaped being mutilated by the Coptic priests and barbers of Assiout, whom long experience in former years has rendered expert in the performance of the surgical operation necessary to create eunuchs—that neutral sex who are at once the guardians and indispensable parasites of the Oriental harem. The arrival of convoys of slaves has recently become a matter of common notoriety here. There are five bureaus established in Egypt for the suppression of slavery, but it should be remembered that slavery is regarded by the entire population as an institution sanctioned by immemorial custom and by the Koran. In some quarters of Cairo no one can hire a house who does not possess at least one female slave; this fact at once gives a color of "respectability" to the proposed lessee. Some strong motive power is required to cause the Egyptian officers to interfere with an institution so inwrought in the domestic and social life of the country. The consular agents of the foreign Powers south of Cairo are, moreover, with but one or two exceptions, Copts, who often have family ties with the slave-dealers or priests, who formerly enjoyed the monopoly of creating eunuchs. These consular agents are consequently of a most passive nature. To put in motion the slave suppressing machinery of Egypt some eager enthusiast is required. Such a man has come to the front in the person of Mr. Roth, a Swiss subject, and teacher in the American mission school established at Assiout. When the slave caravan arrived at Assiout on April 20th, Mr. Roth not only reported the fact to the Egyptian authorities, but laid information before the French and English Consuls-General. The result was, that on April 25th the Egyptian Government sent Ahmed Pasha Deremelly and Hussein Pasha Sirri to Assiout, for the purpose of investigating the matter and bringing the slave-dealers to punishment. These pashas were accompanied by the First Dragoman of the British Consulate and a company of infantry. Late at night, after the arrival of the troops, the camp of the slave-dealers was surrounded. Only sixty-eight slaves were found—thirty nine girls and twenty-nine boys. The dealers had made the most of their time, for the rest of the 900 slaves had already been disposed of in Cairo and elsewhere. Only fifty-seven of the slaves could be proved to have been sold. In one of the tents of a dealer two slaves were found buried in the ground, with only the mouth and nostrils exposed to the air to enable them to support life. Thirty-six slave-dealers were captured, and are now in Cairo undergoing trial."

Railways of the World.

IN a recently published technical work a table is quoted from Professor Sturmer, of Bromberg, which shows the length of railway in several of the chief countries of the world and its proportion to the population. The original tables give the length of line in kilometres, and it may be as well to preserve this, as the proportion is the most interesting point in the table. In Europe it appears that, on the average, there are 4.9 kilometres of railway to every 10,000 inhabitants; Greece has the least proportion to the population, having only 0.08 kilometre to every 10,000 of the population; next comes Turkey, with 1.6; Portugal, 2.3; Roumania, 2.4; Russia, 2.8; Italy, 2.9; and so upwards in the scale, France having 6.3; Germany, 7.1; Great Britain, 8.1; and Sweden heading the list with 19.8, though its total mileage is not a fifth of that of Great Britain; in Asia it appears that only 0.16 kilometre is averaged to every 10,000 inhabitants; and in Africa the proportion is only 0.17; in the United States the proportion is heavy—32.9 to every 10,000 of the people; while the whole of America has the average of 17.2; and in Australia the proportion is already 10.6. The thinly peopled countries necessarily come to the front in this instance; but the table is of some interest as showing the effect of a large or small length of line in effecting comparisons of this nature, and also of indicating the comparative density of population to that of the facilities for its conveyance by rail.

The Tide of Immigration.

THE arrivals of immigrants at this port during May, according to the official returns, aggregated 55,083 persons. The largest previous month on record was May, 1873, when 51,317 were landed. The total arrivals between January 1st and May 31st, inclusive, were 135,336, against 40,569 during the corresponding period in 1879, 27,148 in 1878, 24,268 in 1877, and 118,382 in 1876. The last-mentioned year was the heaviest of the past 25 years. The arrivals aggregated 294,581. The total arrivals from May 1st, 1847, when Castle Garden was opened as an immigration depot, to January 1st, 1880, were 5,857,025, of whom 2,196,398 were from Germany, 2,042,046 from Ireland, and 1,619,581 from all other countries.

Dense Population of Interior Africa.

ALTHOUGH we have not, nor are we likely to have for years, any accurate statistics of the population of the interior of Africa, there is very little doubt that we have greatly underrated it. Much important information has lately been gathered on the subject, especially concerning the distribution and density of the inhabitants of that far-off land. In the great lake district, for instance, there are territories as thickly settled as many European states, relatively small areas possessing millions of people. The negro regions are by far the most populous, while the desert portions are the reverse. A French geographical society gives the estimated figures of various subdivisions of that Continent as follows: In the Soudan the population is 80,000,000, or about fifty-three persons per square mile. The town of Bida, on the Niger, for example, contains fully 80,000 inhabitants. East Africa is rated at 30,000,000, and equatorial Africa at some 40,000,000 souls. A late authority on ethnology sets down the negroes as numerically 130,000,000; the Hamites, 30,000,000; the Bantus, 13,000,000; the Foulah, 8,000,000; the Nubians, 1,500,000; the Hottentots, 80,000—making a total of 172,580,000. These figures—only approximate, of course—are considered too low by both German and British geographers, the former estimating the population as high as 200,000,000. Much hope has been repeatedly expressed of the future of Africa, which is rich in mineral products, and capable of maintaining a prosperous commerce with other parts of the globe. Along the coasts and caravan roads the chief trade has been, and continues to be, in slaves. It is thought that recent effort will yet do much toward abating the odious traffic, as the natives are capable of something better. Many of the tribes are above the condition of savages. They have fixed habitations, though merely mud huts, defended by stockades, and have some laws or customs favorable to commerce. Among several tribes the native merchant is greatly esteemed, and his property is safe even during war. The land is cultivated, the inhabitants wear dyed cotton clothes; gold and iron are ingeniously manufactured, and a certain kind of intelligence seems to be slowly spreading. What Africa most needs is free commercial intercourse with the outer world, and that must arrive. Who knows but that, in the coming cycles, the highest civilization may be found where the first civilization arose.

Pneumatic Clocks in Cities.

THE latest Parisian novelty is the introduction of arrangements for obtaining exactly uniform time through every part of the city. Passing along the boulevards, you see, at brief distances from each other, huge clocks planted in the centre of the street, facing in four directions, and brilliantly lit up after sunset with gas. These boulevard "horologes" are specimen arms of a new system of pneumatic clocks which are rapidly finding their way into the public offices, the stores, the banks and mercantile offices, and the hotels and private dwellings of Paris.

The clocks are worked from a common centre, and give the same identical time in all parts of the city, being regulated from the Public Observatory. To supply the whole of Paris three or four central clocks are required, designated "Directing Normal Clocks." These are placed at convenient centres, and connect with the ordinary or "Reception Clocks" of their system or district. Each of these central clocks is connected with a system of pipes, including, first, those running through principal streets; next those branching therefrom into the minor streets; next, those running from the streets into the buildings; and, finally, smaller ones running as required in the interior of the buildings.

The central clocks are provided with a small engine, worked by steam or gas, which every minute sends a pulsation of compressed air through the entire system of pipes, and acts upon every clock in the circuit, advancing the hands on the dial of the clock by one minute. The clocks are of the simplest construction possible. They cost but a trifle; and the company either furnish them free of charge, got up in a variety of handsome designs, or place their own works in clocks already owned by those who desire the service. The pipe attachments are got up in good taste, and their introduction into buildings involves no more inconvenience or disfigurement than does that of an ordinary telegraph wire, being of about the same calibre.

The system has also been established on a large scale in Vienna, where it appears to have proved as great a financial success as in Paris. A London banker recently bought the rights from the Paris company to use the patent in England, paying for it $250,000. The patent is also in process of introduction in Brussels, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and in cities in Italy and Spain; so that it bids fair to be generally adopted in the large cities of the world.

Sanskrit for Harvard.

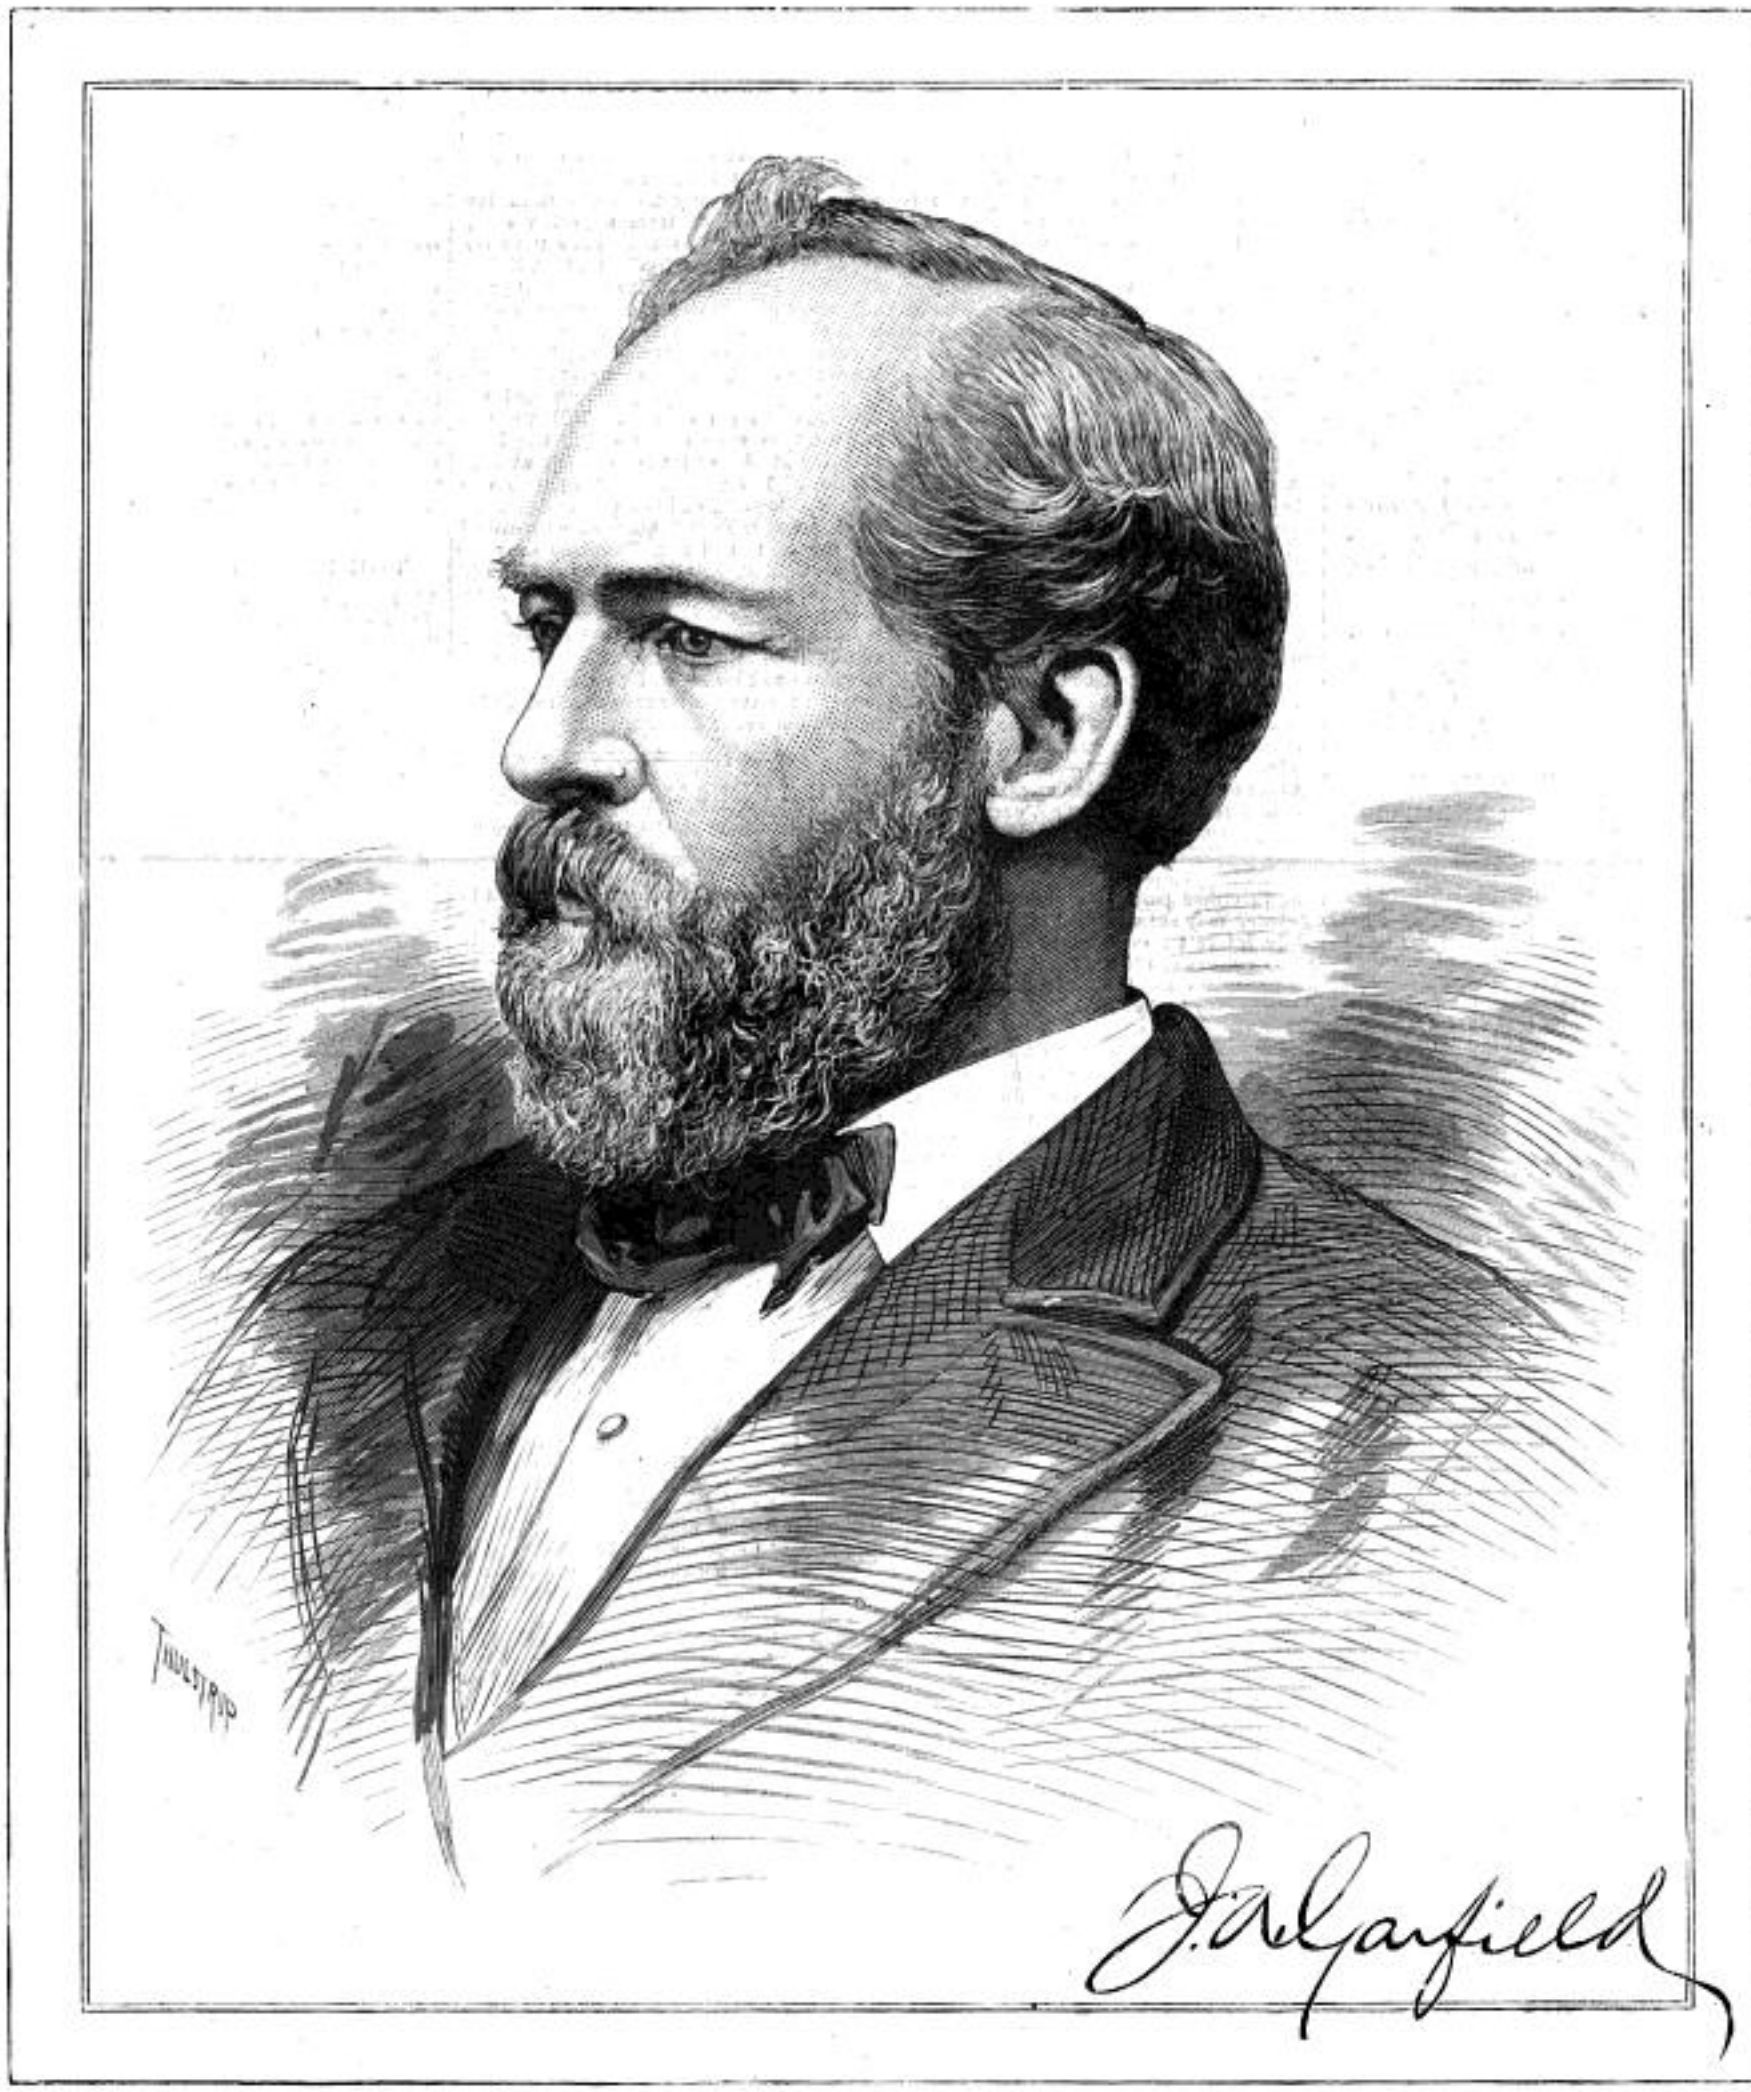
HARVARD COLLEGE has established a full and permanent professorship of Sanskrit, and called thereto Professor Charles R. Lanman, of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. The honor has been accepted. Professor Lanman is a native of Norwich, Conn. He was graduated at Yale in 1871, took a postgraduate course at the same university for two years more, and spent three years at German universities at Berlin, Tubingen, and Leipsig, giving particular attention to Sanskrit. In 1876 he became a Fellow of, and a year later was chosen assistant professor of this tongue at, Johns Hopkins University. Since that time he has written several papers, which have been read at various meetings of philological societies, and published a work on "Noun Inflections in the Vedas." He is also preparing a reader, to be used as a text-book. Although Professor Lanman has barely finished his thirtieth year, it is believed that Professor Whitney, of Yale, whose health is greatly impaired, is his only equal among American scholars in this particular department of philology.

Facts as to Yellow Fever.

AT the meeting of the American Medical Association in this city last week, a paper was read by Dr. J. S. Lynch, of Baltimore, in which the important facts established by experience with yellow fever in Memphis, in 1879, were rehearsed at some length. Observation, he said, had punctured many unfounded theories, hitherto accepted as true by members of the profession, and given the color of probability to views which not long since would have been considered wild and improbable. The facts that he considered so fully established at date were: First, that yellow fever germs may lie dormant for many months during the cold weather, to be reawakened to destructive vitality by the recurrence of the temperature at which they flourished best; and, secondly, that the lowest temperature which prevails in the South is incapable of completely destroying them. The fact that the fever broke out in foci which it had established the preceding season, and radiated from such foci as centres of infection, he regarded as tending to substantiate the view that the germs of the disease, while rendered inactive by the temperature of frost, were by no means permanently disabled by a degree of cold which had been heretofore reckoned destructive of their virulence.

Dr. Lynch cited the case of the Plymouth as a classical illustration of the point he wished to impress upon the minds of the Fellows of the association—that yellow fever germs may have their activity stated, but are not destroyed, by low temperatures. Built in 1868, on a cruise in sub-tropical and tropical waters, the disease broke out among the crew and raged with violence, notwithstanding hygienic regulations. The vessel proceeded to Boston for repairs, and lay in that port during an extremely severe Winter—severe even for Boston, for the mercury fell to 17 deg. below zero Centigrade. Having been overhauled and repaired, she shipped a new crew from Boston near the end of the Winter, and started again upon a cruise in Southern waters. Only a few days after her departure from a non-infected port—having been subjected for some weeks to a temperature supposed to be destructive of bacteria, and having stopped at no port where the disease prevailed—and while upon the high sea, leagues from any possible centre of infection, the fever broke out on board and raged with great severity. Was not this, asked the speaker, an unquestionable proof that, while cold might suspend the vitality of disease germs, freezing was by no means synonymous with disinfection?

Another case which Dr. Lynch cited was, he thought, equally as conclusive respecting the germ propagation of yellow fever as the case of the Plymouth was of the inutility of low temperatures for disinfection. In 1877 a family, formerly resident in Augusta, Ga., removed to Fernandina, Fla., where the fever had never prevailed. They took with them a trunk in which clothing was packed. They were free from the disease, and were presumably safe from the destroyer. Some time after their removal, the trunk was opened, and, strange to say, after this event, in due season, but with a period of incubation unusually prolonged, the members of the family were attacked with yellow fever, marked as such by the unfailing phenomenon of black vomit. From this and other cases which the doctor cited, the inference was drawn that yellow fever poison may be transported from one point to another like any other physical entity, retaining its potency for evil and manifesting it even in climates in which the disease seldom or never appears, and which are unfavorable to its development in the epidemic form.



The next point advanced, as a necessary conclusion from the facts furnished by the recent epidemics, was that yellow fever is essentially an infectious, but not, in the proper acceptation of the term, a contagious disease. It may be transported hundreds of miles in clothing, or other vehicles capable of subsisting it, to develop its own inherent virulence in a new centre, but it is not communicable from person to person, as small-pox and measles are. Contact with yellow fever patients was not, the reader of the paper argued, perilous, but rather the reverse. The germs, whatever they were, must undulate under favorable circumstances for a certain length of time before their virulence was developed. They did not constitute in themselves a dangerous contagion, but were susceptible of development into an infection.

THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE.

THE nomination of General James A. Garfield as the Republican candidate for President affords another proof that the people are stronger than the politicians. It postpones, too, if it does not entirely avert, a disaster which at one time seemed certain to overtake the party. Admitting all that may be said for General Grant, it still remains true that his nomination would have invited sure defeat. He was not in any true sense the choice of the Republican masses, or of the great body of independent voters. He was the candidate, distinctively and conspicuously, of the machine politicians—of a class of men whose counsels and influence in his previous administrations were altogether pernicious, and who, having the party organization largely in their hands, sought his renomination now, not for any high purposes of patriotism, but in order that they might again wield, for selfish ends, the enormous power and patronage of the Government. His rejection by the Chicago Convention, notwithstanding the splendor of his military record and the popular confidence in his personal integrity of character, puts an effective end to the dominance of these influences in the public administration, and for all time establishes, on foundations so strong that it will never again be assailed, the unwritten law of the Republic that no man, however colossal may be his renown, shall be permitted to occupy the Executive office in practical perpetuity; that, in other words, "what sufficed for George Washington must suffice for the greatest of his successors."

Of General Garfield, summoned so unexpectedly to the leadership, it can be said with entire truth that he represents the best impulses of his party. A Republican all his life, his career has never been marked by that excessive partisanship which too often impairs the legitimate influence of great minds; indeed, his peculiarly judicial temper has more than once betrayed him into attitudes which the party "whips" have condemned; but it is precisely this quality of independence which will most commend him to the popular confidence. In Congress he has always kept fully abreast of public opinion as to all questions of national importance. Born poor, he has remained so, comparatively, amid all the temptations of public life; possessing in his early childhood only the slenderest educational opportunities, he has come, by his own efforts and the closest study, to rank as the most scholarly of our statesmen; he is, in a word, a self-made man, in every respect a typical product of our free institutions.

Will he be elected? That will depend largely upon the action of the Democratic Convention. That Convention has a great opportunity. It is possible for it to nominate a candidate who would command success. It is also possible for it to select a nominee who would be more objectionable than General Garfield to the moral sense of the country, and to place him upon a platform still less satisfactory than that laid down at Chicago. The one overshadowing issue is that of the national finances and the maintenance of the national faith. Upon that question the Republicans have, in the main, occupied no uncertain attitude. To them we owe the policy of Resumption, with all its beneficent results, and the defeat of all the perilous schemes for the debasement of the currency and the unsettling of the foundations of the public credit. In the struggle in Congress over this issue, General Garfield has been foremost in resisting the paper money delusions which for a time flourished so luxuriantly, and in urging specie payments and the exact fulfillment of the nation's obligations to its creditors. If, as to this paramount question, the Democracy shall assume a position of antagonism to the existing order of things, and so imperil the results already achieved in the direction of financial and industrial rehabilitation, then the canvass for General Garfield may be crowned with success. Another urgent and important question is that of the preservation and enforcement, without limitation as to State lines, of the rightful constitutional authority of the Federal Government, touching every subject whatsoever which is national in character, and analogously of the prerogatives of the Executive, as clearly settled and defined in law. Upon this question the Republicans occupy ground which the judgment of the country has repeatedly approved. If the Democracy shall continue to insist upon the doctrine they have heretofore maintained on this and relative issues, and their candidate shall represent the so-called Bourbon element of the party, then disaster may again overtake them. The country demands stability in finance as necessary to prosperity in business, and faithful adherence to the Constitution and the laws enacted under it, as essential to tranquillity and progress in the State; and it might even choose rather to face the consequences of continued Republican supremacy than to brave the risks involved in the success of a reactionary candidate and a revolutionary policy.

As for ourselves, wearing no man's collar, we shall follow no party flag, except as it may represent principles and ideas essential to the maintenance of the national unity and honor. Whatever may be commendable in either party, we shall commend; whatever may seem to us to threaten vital public interests, or tend to rekindle the fading embers of old animosities and exasperations, we shall condemn, no matter where it may be found, or in what guise it may be presented. Having no partisan entanglements, we desire that the country shall be placed before and above mere party, and we shall be on the side always of those men and measures which seem to propose the highest safety to social order, and the protection, under the sway of law, of the persons and liberties of all the people without doing violence to the rights of any.

THE EXODUS FROM EUROPE.

AT no period has the tide of European immigration ran so high as at present. This port is the chief receptacle for foreigners seeking a home in the United States. The official returns of the Bureau of Emigration, at Castle Garden, show that from January of the present year to the close of May, the arrivals have numbered 135,336 persons of both sexes and all ages. For the corresponding period in 1879 the number was 40,589; only 27,145 in 1878, and 24,293 in 1877. During the first four months of 1872, 118,382 immigrants landed at the Garden, and 294,581 during the year. The total of immigrants arriving at all the ports in that year aggregated 449,483. The nearest approach to this at any preceding period was in 1854, when the number reached 427,833. In 1873 the total arrivals were 437,004, and this stands second in rank to 1872. But the present year bids fair to surpass all that have gone before. The number landed at this port in the month of May was 55,317, and from present indications, no less than 50,000 will arrive during the present month. It is more than probable that from now until cold weather begins this remarkable exodus from Europe will be kept up, and that the accession to population from this source will equal, if it does not exceed, half a million of souls.

English, Irish, Germans and Scandinavians, make up this moving tide to this country. The narrow limits and depression of agriculture in England have been productive of widespread discontent; in Ireland the sufferings begotten by the famine have furnished an additional stimulus to the migratory movement; the Germans have a growing distaste for the military system of their country, and so hasten to get beyond its reach. As for the inhabitants of Scandinavia, an irresistible impulse to try their fortunes in a new land seems to have seized upon them in masses. It may be said, further, that the facilities for crossing the Atlantic are constantly improving and increasing, while those who find comfortable homes in this country almost uniformly urge their friends and relatives, whom they have left behind, to follow their example. The immigration of one single member of a family generally ends by the transfer of the remainder to our shores.

The Government records furnish no accurate statistics of European immigration to this country until the year 1820. It is estimated, however, that from 1790 to 1820 the immigrants numbered about 250,000. During the succeeding thirty years, ending with 1850, the number was 2,464,200. If we estimate the number to be returned the present year at 500,000, the total from 1850 to 1880, the latter inclusive, will be 7,873,082. The foreign immigration, then, for a period of ninety years, exceeds 10,587,000 souls, which, at this time, represents an aggregate in excess of one-fifth of our whole population. Of the entire number landed upon our shores, 5,857,025 have disembarked at Castle Garden since May 1st, 1847. Of this latter number 2,195,398 were from Germany, 2,042,046 from Ireland, and 1,619,581 from all other countries. In 1870 the census gave the number of persons of foreign birth, then living, as 5,767,229. The present census will probably show an addition to that number of at least one and one-quarter millions.

From official sources we learn, looking to the entire immigration, that up to 1850 the Irish contributed 43.5 per cent. and the Germans 26.4 per cent. In 1870 the two nationalities were nearly equal, the Irish standing at 33.3 and the Germans at 30.4 per cent. The percentage of English was only 13.9 in 1850, and but 11.2 in 1870. In the latter year British-Americans furnished 8.9 per cent. and Scandinavians only 4.4 per cent. But the census of 1880 will add materially to the Scandinavian percentage. A century hence the population of this country will doubtless exceed that of Europe, and in the meantime the ethnologist may speculate as to what will be the characteristics of the composite race which will then inhabit our broad domain.

LIFE INSURANCE FIGURES.

THE magnitude of the life insurance interest of the country is scarcely appreciated by the general public. Statistics show that the life companies authorized to do business in New York had, on the 1st of January last, assets amounting to $401,527,059, with total liabilities of $336,174,206, showing a surplus for policyholders of $65,352,853. The total income of these thirty-one companies for the year 1879 was $76,170,953, while the amount paid to policy-holders for losses by death, etc., reached a total of $55,744,326. The benefits conferred by the diffusion of this vast sum in the various channels which received it cannot well be over-estimated. The total amount of insurance carried by the companies in question at the date named was $1,439,961,165. Since the beginning of the year thirty-two companies, according to a table in the Underwriter, have paid death claims amounting to $6,210,652, and endowments amounting to $2,504,225. These figures, it should be added, do not include the payments of several important companies, whose payments would swell the total by several millions. The Commercial Bulletin assumes, in view of these figures, that "the regular life companies of the country are, this very year, sheltering from poverty a large body of widows and orphans at a rate which involves the distribution among them of some $30,000,000 to $35,000,000." Certainly a business that can exhibit such colossal results as are here specified may fairly be regarded as resting upon solid and substantial foundations, and as fully deserving of the popular confidence which it increasingly enjoys.

SHOOTING AND HAZING.

THE Texas schoolboy who shot the Ohio schoolboy at Highland Falls some days since, has, doubtless, heartily repented by this time of his hasty act. A prison-cell has something in its atmosphere which induces to serious meditation. As the practice of schoolboys using revolvers on one another is not viewed with favor in this part of the country, the chances are that Master Buck, of Texas, may pass the next few years of his life under a discipline more rigorous even than that of the Military Academy which he was expecting to enter, and amid much less agreeable surroundings. Should Thompson, the Ohio boy, die of his wound, it will be likely to go hard with young Buck.

Yet there are several things to be taken into consideration. The Texas boy had heard and read of the hazing practiced at the Point, and had come North resolved to defend himself against it to the last extremity. The Principal of the Highland Falls school thinks that Buck had an "exaggerated idea" of the nature of this hazing. We don't know about that. While hazing is sometimes merely silly and harmless, it is not seldom something very different. A party of half-drunken boys, egging one another on, will sometimes do things that they do not find pleasant to remember the next day or on any future day. Whether his notions of hazing were exaggerated or not, this young fellow had made up his mind, it appears, that he would not be hazed if he could help it. He presented himself at the Highland Falls school, a feeder of the Military Academy. He was poor, indifferently dressed probably, rough in manners certainly. He talked loudly, bragged, swore, and ate with his knife. He was insulted at the school table, as appears from the principal's statement; at least one attempt was made to play what the principal considers "a harmless practical joke" upon him in his sleep; his fellow-students opened his trunk in his absence and took from it a pistol, which they gave the principal and which he still retains. None of these things were likely to improve the Texas boy's temper, naturally none too amiable, or to make him less distrustful of the other boys. When one of these used language to him which in Texas would have meant either humiliation or fight, he seems to have put the Texas construction upon it, and to have replied, Texas fashion, with a pistol-ball.

We are not belittling young Buck's crime. Having committed it, he must take the consequences of it. We merely point out the fact that the fault is not all on the one side, and that this homicidal schoolboy—oaths, brags, hot temper, revolver and all—is such as his training has made him under the stimulus of real or supposed provocation.

THE FISHERIES QUESTION.

WHILE members of our Congress are discussing the question of the abrogation of the fisheries clause of the Treaty of Washington, and the adoption of measures to secure indemnity to our citizens for the Fortune Bay outrage, the British Government has taken an important step towards preventing future collisions in the Newfoundland waters. Three British war-vessels are now actively patrolling the fishing banks off the Dominion coast, the commanders being temporarily invested with judicial powers, to be exercised in the same manner and to the same extent as by regularly constituted justices of the peace. These vessels will continue, during the whole of the fishing season, to cruise around the coasts, paying especial attention to those parts of the shore where differences have arisen from time to time among rival fishermen, and where future troubles might at any time assume serious proportions. The presence of the ships-of-war will, no doubt, be beneficial in subduing the warlike propensities of the pugnacious fishermen, and in amicably adjusting quarrels arising out of intense competition in the prosecution of concurrent rights of fishery. Had like precautions been adopted earlier the outrages which have occasioned so much feeling in this country would no doubt have been prevented.

This display of vigilance, however, on the part of the British Government will not cause a suspension of the negotiations which contemplate the settlement of this whole question on a new basis. The American sentiment on the subject is too strong to admit of any mere shilly-shallying. That sentiment is well expressed in a report recently submitted to the House of Representatives, in which it is declared that at best "we got but little by the Washington Treaty, and that little is taken from us by unlawful violence, apparently sustained by the British Government. We gave a great deal in return, part of which has already been finally paid and is beyond our recall; but a portion of the consideration is in the opening of our markets to the Canadian fishermen free of duty; that privilege they are still enjoying to their great gain and our great loss," and the treaty should, therefore, be abrogated as the only course consistent with proper national respect.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE Liberal Ministry in England is already plunged in numerous difficulties. Not only have the members of the Cabinet who sought re-election been defeated, thus showing the discontent of the nation with the first acts of the Administration, but even the Liberal press is attacking their policy. The principal charge that is brought against Mr. Gladstone refers to the retention in office and to the support granted to Sir Bartle Frere. The part which he took in bringing about the Zulu war, the difficulties which he contrived in the South African colonies, and his violence and imperialism, were constant topics for denunciation by the Liberals while in opposition. The Conservative Government even went so far as to defend its policy by stating that Sir Bartle Frere had exceeded his authority. It is possible that Mr. Gladstone may have found that this was not altogether true, and that Sir Bartle was obliged to plunge into the war with Cetewayo and the horrible mess made of the Transvaal annexation. However this may be, there can be no doubt that Frere was a willing agent, and his continuance in office is loudly blamed by even Mr. Gladstone's own followers. Nor is it likely that the new financial policy will be a popular one. It is found that the estimated surplus left by Sir Stafford Northcote, the Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer, has been swallowed up by the supplementary estimates, and it is proposed to add a penny to the income tax. Such an addition is always most unpopular in England where people will stand any amount of indirect taxation without complaining, but at once are indignant when their purses are directly taxed. It is also proposed to reduce the tax on wine, in accordance with the negotiations which have been in progress between France and England for a reciprocity treaty. The tax on malt is to be taken off, and instead of it a tax is to be levied directly on beer. None of these measures are likely to increase the popularity of Mr. Gladstone, and some of his other measures will probably stir up a good deal of ill-feeling. The Burial Act, which proposes to do away with the difference between consecrated and unconsecrated ground in churchyards, will, no doubt, be pleasing to the Nonconformists; but they are always Liberals in politics, while it will probably alienate the High Church Party which gave the Liberals much useful support in the late campaign. Again, the wisdom of allowing the Peace Preservation Act in Ireland to lapse is very doubtful. Ireland is evidently in not a very peaceful condition, and law is often opposed by force. Shillelaghs and stones may break bones and crack skulls, but firearms will do much more mischief and will not tend to improve the condition of the Irish peasant.

Some time ago Blanqui, the Communist, received a plurality of votes for the Assembly from the good people of Lyons. Fortunately, according to French law, a majority is necessary to elect a candidate, and on the second ballot a Conservative Republican beat Blanqui badly. As Lyons is one of the greatest strongholds of Communistic principles this defeat is of great political importance. The Communistic meeting in Paris was quickly suppressed, and the strikers at Roubaise and Rheims were at once kept in order by the interference of the military. The Government seems determined to enforce law and order and procure the respect of all classes for the republic.

The decrees against the Jesuits and other religious communities are not likely to be submitted to without a struggle. The Society of Jesus pretends, whether justly or unjustly remains to be seen, that it has acquired a vested interest in its churches and houses, that successive governments have acknowledged the legality of its tenure by the visits of official inspectors, and that the laws under which the present decrees have been issued are obsolete. The Society proposes to try the legality of these decrees in the courts of law, and will not give up without a fierce attempt to hold its own. At the same time there are some Republicans—not many it is true, but still some—who are opposed to the decrees. They say, with some justice, that when the number of captains to instruct young soldiers is insufficient, the sergeants must be employed, and the present movement is to suppress the sergeants without having a sufficient complement of captains to instruct the youth of France. Whatever harm education in Jesuit establishments may have done, it is certain that the education they give is better than none at all.

While the religious party is being thus "bulldozed" in France, Prince Bismarck has received a most decided check in Prussia by the rejection of the Church Bill by the committee of the Prussian Landtag to whom it had been submitted. Bismarck has now been defeated upon the Budget, the Army Bill, the Socialistic question, and the Church Bill, and his influence must be somewhat on the wane. Prince Hohenlohe has adopted a new policy at the Foreign Office, and the meeting of the Congress at Berlin takes place under very different auspices to those under which it met some years ago.

Mrs. Gladstone has held her first large reception at her husband's official residence in Downing Street, and all the Liberals in town loyally flocked thither. Lord Granville has given a number of small dinners, but none as yet of any public significance. It is generally expected that Lord Hartington will renew the famous festivities at Devonshire House, where a reception used to mean an assembly of all the wit, beauty and rank of London. The Duchess of Norfolk gave a grand reception in honor of Cardinal Newman, who happened to pay London a flying visit. It was very magnificent, and a large crowd, mostly women, was present. The fair sex were very effusive in their worshiping of the saintly man, and a cynical bystander remarked that most of them kissed the hand instead of the ring of the Cardinal. Another fashionable amusement is amateur musical performances. The musical tastes of the late Prince Consort have been bequeathed to the Duke of Edinburgh, the great friend and patron of Arthur Sullivan, of "Pinafore" notoriety. His Royal Highness plays the violin with considerable skill, and accompanied Marie Roze in a violin obligato in a selection from Gounod. At another concert his sister, the Princess Christian, played a pianoforte solo and a duet with Mr. Goldschmidt, the husband of Jenny Lind. They both showed a little nervousness at first, but soon warmed to the work and became quite self-possessed. The Queen herself is contributing some drawings to a monthly magazine, and the Princess Louise and several other members of the royal family are conspicuous for their artistic ability.

DENIS KEARNEY was one of the shining lights of the National Greenback Convention held at Chicago last week. A body of men who can find satisfaction in the drivel of this arrant demagogue can never possibly achieve any higher result than the demoralization of our politics.

THE feeling in favor of the nomination of Horatio Seymour as the Democratic candidate for President appears to be growing. The party could not have a better candidate, and it ought to be wise enough to seize its opportunity, notwithstanding Mr. Seymour's disinclination to accept a nomination.

THE friends of tariff reform will be disappointed by the failure of Congress to act upon the revenue measures brought before it. The efforts of the high tariff lobby, together with the desire of a good many members to escape a vote on the question in the present posture of political affairs, have proved more than a match for the reformers, who, it must be added, have at no time managed their case with the highest wisdom.

IT is stated on good authority that the cotton crop in the South this year will amount to 5,600,000 bales, valued at $300,000,000, which is much the largest crop ever raised. If the Southern States will now extend the cotton manufacture already so prosperously begun, and so retain in its own hands the full advantages of the great production of which it is capable, its industrial and commercial future will be unquestionably assured.

THERE are intimations that Mr. Tilden may decline the Democratic nomination for President in favor of Henry B Payne of Ohio. Possibly this may prove to be the fact, but Mr. Tilden is not in the habit of abandoning a purpose once formed, and it can scarcely be doubted that, believing himself to have been really elected four years ago, he has a desire to vindicate his claim by again trying conclusions with the enemy.

THE Chinese Minister to the United States, who has just returned from a visit to Europe, proposes shortly to visit Peru for the purpose of establishing an embassy for the protection of Chinamen in that country. As to the Chinese in the United States, he thinks the whole number does not exceed 120,000, over half of whom are in California. He says that the contract system has been entirely broken up, and that the few Chinamen who now come here come in the same way as other immigrants.

GOVERNOR CORNELL of this State has entitled himself to public approval by striking out of the annual Supply Bill, items amounting to $948,036. He has also vetoed all of the special appropriations in the Canal Bill, of which there are thirteen, amounting in all to $75,735. The Supply Bill is only too frequently a cover for wasteful extravagance, and this wholesale application of the pruning-knife can scarcely fail to be productive of good in arresting the tendency to reckless appropriations on the part of legislators.

THE Chinese plank of the Republican platform, designed to catch votes on the Pacific slope, does not seem to afford any greater satisfaction in that section than in the East. All the leading San Francisco journals characterize it as failing altogether to come up to the demands of the situation, and the indications are that it will alienate rather than attract votes to the Chicago nominees. As a piece of unmitigated demagoguery, that is precisely the verdict which ought to be passed upon the schemers who perpetrated it.

A RESOLUTION has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr Cox, of this city, which will scarcely command the approval of M. de Lesseps. The resolution recites the statement that $40,000,000 are alleged to have been offered by the citizens of the United States to foreign parties to assist them in carrying out the scheme of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, and declares that any attempt on the part of such citizens to prejudge the question by extending the assistance of their capital to any such foreign undertaking is unpatriotic and unwise.

THE General Synod of the Reformed Church, after a debate of nearly a week, finally decided last week that a Freemason may be a Christian, and that the church cannot apply as a test of membership that a person seeking admission shall not belong to a secret order. The debate on the subject showed that many of the Reformed clergymen are members of the Masonic order. Masons generally will view with deserved contempt the effort of a few narrow and bigoted minds in the pulpit to array the church against an order which is everywhere the efficient ally of Christian brotherhood and personal morality.

THE crop prospects in the Pacific States are said to be full of promise. It is estimated that the acreage sown to wheat this season will aggregate 2,500,000 acres, and that the average yield per acre will be not less than 14 bushels. The barley and corn crops also promise well, while the hop crop will be fifty per cent. greater this year than last. As to the business outlook, it is said to be improving every day, the demands for wares and merchandise being notably large from the adjoining Territories, where the railroads are constantly opening up new markets for home products as well as an increased requirement for imports of all descriptions.

THE railroads of the country are annihilating both time and distance. The other day an express train on the New (Bound Brook) Line, between New York and Philadelphia, made the distance of 89½ miles in just 97 minutes, and it is said that this extraordinary time will be made regularly after the completion of certain arrangements now in progress. Some time ago the Fort Wayne and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroads put on fast trains between Chicago and New York, and it is now understood that both the Lake Shore and Michigan Central will follow suit, running trains from city to city in twenty-eight hours and a half, a gain of seven hours and a half over the ordinary schedule time. But even this time will, no doubt, be eclipsed after a while, in obedience to the clamor of travelers, who consider thirty-five miles an hour entirely too slow for this fast age.

TELEGRAPHY pays. The report of the Western Union Telegraph Company shows that the net profits of the fiscal year will amount to about $5,300,000, or over 11¼ per cent. on the capital stock, after deducting fixed charges for interest and the sinking fund. Out of this, 8 per cent. in cash dividends will have been paid to the stockholders, and $1,543,000 invested in new property. Extensive constructions and purchases of telephone exchange properties have been made during the year, and of 3,500 miles of new pole lines, and 24,500 miles of additional wires of a larger size than ever before used in this country, especially adapted to quadruplex use, have been constructed.

THE French Government adheres tenaciously to its anti-Jesuit policy. The prefects of departments in which Jesuit establishments are situated have been instructed that they must make a clear distinction between Jesuit and other unauthorized orders. Jesuits are not to be invited, like others, to have themselves authorized, but are ordered to dissolve, and on the 30th of June the Company of Jesus must disappear and evacuate the establishments it now occupies. For teaching establishments, however, the respite is prolonged till the 31st of August. The other unauthorized orders will be officially required during this month to declare whether they intend submitting to the decrees, and the test of strength will come, as elsewhere stated, when they shall refuse, as they are expected to do, to comply with the Government demands.

THE country owes a debt of gratitude to Senator Blaine and Secretary Sherman for their sturdy fight against the third-term idea. Their motive may have been a selfish one, but the result is none the less gratifying to the great body of the people. As to Mr. Blaine, while he has failed in his ambition to be President, an analysis of the votes in the Chicago Convention shows very conclusively that he was the really first choice of the distinctively Republican States. Of General Grant's votes during the first day's balloting, 177 came from the Southern Democratic States, 52 from the Northern Democratic States, and 70 from the Republican States. Blaine had 35 votes from the Southern Democratic States, 62 from the Northern Democratic States, and 182 from the Republican States; Sherman had 47 from the Southern States, 9 from the Northern Democratic States, and 40 from the Republican States.

THE Chicago Convention so far recognized the demand for reform in the Civil Service as to adopt a resolution calling for the co-operation to that end of the Legislative with the Executive departments of the Government, and demanding that "Congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper practical tests, shall admit to the public service." This is all very good as far as it goes, but it has no more significance than other declarations, equally as strong and explicit, which have been wholly disregarded by the party making them. Civil Service Reform under the present Administration has been the veriest farce, and yet President Hayes was, no doubt, at the outset honestly desirous of elevating and purifying all branches of the public service. He failed, because the influential political managers and some members of his own Cabinet were against him, and so every other President will fail, no matter what or how many laws may be passed by Congress, so long as partisanship is stronger than patriotism in our politics.

A PECULIAR sort of balloon was seen soaring over Lake Michigan last week, just after the adjournment of the Chicago Convention. It was labeled "Third Term," and was in a very dilapidated condition. The basket was occupied by a person who seemed overcome by some peculiar sensation, either of disappointment, chagrin or grief; even the insignia of "imperialism" which surrounded him did not seem to afford any real consolation. The cable of the balloon, which was marked by some legend about a "unit rule," seems to have been prematurely broken near the ground, and there is a rumor that at the time the balloon "went up" three distinguished Senators were seen to be making frantic efforts to clutch the vagrant rope. Some say, indeed, that they were left with the small end of it in their hands, and that they consider the ascension to have been entirely too "spontaneous." If the stray balloon shall not be heard of speedily, the country will be likely to conclude that it has started on a "trip around the world." At any rate, it is certain it will never come down.

A DISPATCH from Portland, Oregon, says M. C. George, Republican, for Congress, is elected by from 1,000 to 1,500 majority. Three Republican Supreme Court Judges have average majorities of over 1,000. The Legislature is doubtful, with the chances in favor of the Republicans.

EL VAQUERO.

"AVE MARIA," a herder said,
One eve in sight of Santa Fé,
Where ground and blanket were his bed
And all around his cattle lay.

"Ave Maria, full of grace—"
How strangely solemn were the words,
In such a wild and dreary place,
Beneath the stars, among the herds.

"Santa Maria, Mother of God,"
Angel-like breezes came to take
The words thus spoken from the sod
To yonder sky while yet he spake.

"Pray for us sinners now," said he,
With earnest hope to be forgiven;
While distant hills all seemed to be
Steps leading from the plains to heaven.

"Pray for us in the hour of death,"
And softly still the murmuring came,
Until at last the lisping breath
Ceased with the sweet and holy name.

"Ave Maria" no more he said,
That eve in sight of Santa Fé;
When morning came a herder dead
Was found there where his cattle lay.

J. C. BURNETT.

WINIFRED'S FLOTSAM.

IT was not because he was a woman-hater that Guy Averill, at seven-and-twenty, was still a bachelor and heart-whole. Until this Summer he had never been rich enough to support a wife; it was almost more than he could do to take care of himself, so he did not feel justified in paying attentions to any lady seriously.

Although he was industrious and talented, clients were few and far between—were almost unknown to the deserving young lawyer until he did not so sorely need them. One week—such is the perversity of fate—after he got news that an uncle had died and left him his sole heir, and found that he was sure of an income of nearly two thousand a year, then the world suddenly realized that young Averill was a very promising lawyer!

Having a good income and prospects of plenty of remunerative work, Guy Averill began to think seriously of matrimony, and rather eagerly accepted an invitation to accompany his chum, Cassius Barclay, to the little town of New Myrtle, where said chum's fiancée lived.

For this fiancée, Helen Tremaine, had two sisters, and Mrs. Averill agreed with Cassius Barclay that there were not three such girls in the world as the three Tremaines. Mrs. Averill had met them one Winter in Washington and afterwards had spent six weeks at their house; hence Guy's invitation, though he had never seen one of the family.

He knew them all by description. Helen was not pretty, but was domestic, accomplished and very charming; the next one, Winifred, was a great rider, swimmer, skater, archer—in fact, "awfully fast," though magnificently beautiful; so Guy felt a strong presentiment that while he would like Helen, and tolerate Winifred for her sake, he would be very sure to fall captive to the charms of nineteen-year-old Marcia, the gentle, fair, lovable girl whose picture he had so admired.

When he first saw Marcia he was a little disappointed; her picture flattered her; but he soon forgot that in contemplation of her graceful figure, her gentle voice and her quiet womanly ways. He loved to see a woman all womanly, thought a needle and not a pen should be her tool, believed that the fireside was woman's sphere, and so on; all of which conditions Marcia filled.

"Your sister rides beautifully!" exclaimed Guy, a few hours after his arrival at Mrs. Tremaine's.

"Yes," answered Marcia, sweetly. "She ought to, she spends hours on her horse."

"Do you ride?"

"Not much. I don't care for such—such violent exercise. In fact, I don't have much time for it. I have a good deal of sewing to do, and—" Marcia hesitated and shook out her work rather ostentatiously.

"I didn't know you had any little folks in the house," said Guy, his attention thus drawn to the small apron in her hand.

"Oh, we haven't! This is for some of our poor Sunday-school children. When I am at a loss for employment I always know where to turn, in a manufacturing town like this there is so much suffering."

"Do your sisters aid you?"

"Helen can't, her trousseau keeps her busy now; and Winifred—well, I'd laugh to see her doing such work."

"As what?" asked Winifred, who had just entered.

"Sewing or embroidering," answered Marcia, not quite truthfully; but Guy, not knowing the difference between embroidery and plain sewing, was none the wiser.

"What is absurdly known as 'fancy' work I utterly abominate! It seems to me a great waste of time to pass hours and hours in making hideous tidies and mats, or high art curtains out of ticking and such stuff."

"Don't you ever sew?"

"Not if I can avoid it; certainly not for amusement."

"Not for the poor?"

"The poor?"

"Yes, as Miss Marcia does."

"O—h! No, I don't work for the poor—as Marcia does," was Winifred's contemptuous reply.

And Guy was disgusted. How was he to know that the little apron in Marcia's hands would never have been thought of if Guy Averill (whose mother had written of his love for womanly women) had not been there to see and hear of it?

But though he was disgusted with this athletic young woman's sentiments, he was by no means so with her. Her dark-blue riding-habit showed her supple form to perfection, her soft brown hair was ruffled by the wind, and her cheeks with health and vigor, and she was a great contrast to her pale home-keeping sister.

And as the days passed, Guy was compelled to change his first opinions of the sisters. Winifred's health, spirits and temper seemed to be perfect; Marcia, on the other hand, sometimes forgot her would-be gentleness and showed a snappish petulance that amazed Guy.

"What a helpful, cheery woman she would be!" meditated Guy, but not of Marcia. "No headaches, no sulks, no sharp speeches! But there, in a wife one needs domestic virtues as well as a good disposition; her ability to dance and ride, skate and swim, shoot and drive, will not keep my clothes in order, will not direct the household. Fancy this lovely young Amazon trying to cook a steak if there should be a rebellion in the kitchen!"

But though Guy thought he was fully determined to marry some one more like Marcia, yet Winifred ruled his dreams by day and night. At last he got to this pass:

"Will such a girl ever consent to settle down to domestic life? Will she not laugh at me if I dare to speak of love?"

One day Helen and Cassius went to a neighboring town on business, and Marcia, Winifred and Guy went rowing on the river, a narrow, deep and rapid stream. Just after the girls had landed, Marcia spied an empty basket floating down the stream and declared that she wanted it, so Guy rowed out alone to get it.

Suddenly, they never knew why, the boat capsized, and Guy in trying to regain it was carried yet further down the stream.

"Never mind the boat!" shouted Winifred. "Swim ashore, the current is very strong."

Which Guy at last concluded to do. When nearly in-shore he was suddenly seized with cramps and could swim no further. Marcia shrieked and wrung her hands, and cried:

"Oh, he'll drown—he'll drown!"

"Hold your tongue! Run to Patterson's for help," cried Winifred, peremptorily, and at the same time sprang into the river herself.

In a few seconds she was beside the sinking man, clutching him firmly by the arm with one of her strong hands she struck out slowly but surely for the shore. Guy was tall and well proportioned, and it took all her strength to get him to land, but she did it and none too soon, for her own strength was giving out.

"The heavens be praised!" cried Jim Patterson. "It is lucky for poor Mr. Averill that he wasn't alone with Miss Marcia! It's a strong arm and a courageous heart you've got, Miss Winifred! Come, Joe, lend a hand and we'll carry him home. Faith, but he's heavy."

The doctor was summoned, and Guy's inopportune cramp proved to have been caused by a disordered system, consequently he was quite ill for some days.

His mother was sent for, and he had the best of care, though he would rather have had Winifred with him more. It was always Marcia who fanned him and read to him in his mother's absence, though Winifred always brought him his meals, and somehow the heretofore-admired sweetness began to pall. He sighed for a little breezy chat, as on a warm Summer afternoon one will sigh for an invigorating sea-breeze.

"Mother," said he, suddenly, the first day he was able to sit up, "which do you like best, Winifred or Marcia?"

"Just the question I have intended to ask you," was Mrs. Averill's diplomatic reply.

"Marcia is very gentle."

"Very; and so quiet."

"Winifred is strong, mentally as well as physically."

"She is an admirable girl."

Clearly he would get no decided opinion from his mother. He began again:

"The fellow that gets either of them for a wife will be lucky!"

"Very true. Is there any prospect that my boy will be so lucky?"

"I wish there was"—with a sigh. "But I fear not; she is so—so strong-minded."

"Thank fortune, it is Winifred!" thought Mrs. Averill. But she said: "Who? Marcia?"

"Marcia! Oh, mother," he laughed. "I never thought you'd be so sarcastic! No, I mean Winifred, of course. Dear, courageous girl! I owe my life to her bravery!"

"Indeed you do."

"What I fear is that so grand, so large-hearted a girl—one so full of vigorous life—will never consent to settle down in the quiet way in which my wife may have to live for a little while, for two thousand a year is not limitless. Fancy Winifred pottering over domestic details, regulating the servants and ordering the dinners! Fancy my queen in a dark, dirty kitchen!"

"Winifred Tremaine will never permit her kitchen to be dirty! Guy, who do you suppose has prepared your tea and toast, your beef-tea and toast, your blancmange and wine-jelly, your dropped eggs, your little dainties of all sorts, these three weeks past?"

"Why, the cook, of course!"

"By no means. Winifred has herself prepared every mouthful she has brought you; she makes every loaf of bread and cake, every pudding and pie, that is eaten in this house."

"You amaze me!"

"Why? Because she don't make a show of her work? Because she enjoys out-door life after attending to her domestic duties? She is not only a good rider and all that, but she is thoroughly and practically domestic."

Guy didn't say any more then, but he did considerable thinking. A week later he said to Winifred:

"I have never yet thanked you for saving my life, Miss Tremaine——"

"Please say no more!" she cried, hastily. "What else could I have done?"

"And I am not going to thank you until I know whether my rescued life is to be one of happiness or misery. Winifred, I love you very dearly! Can you love me a little? Can you consent to be my wife? If not, if you give me no hope, I shall blame you for not letting me drown that day. Just one word, darling!"

"I—I—I don't like to be blamed."

And Guy didn't blame her.

Cassius Barclay always calls his wife's brother-in-law, "Winifred's flotsam," and says: "Helen, your sister's flotsam really is a little too good to have been left as food for the fishes."

THE PASSION PLAY IN 1880.

OBERAMMERGAU AND ITS ATTRACTIONS—THE CHARACTERS IN THE PLAY, ETC.

OBERAMMERGAU, May 17th, 1880.

THE curtain has descended upon the awful realism of the piteous Passion Play, the tragedy of tragedies, and I feel as though I had just returned from "the blood-stained Hill of the Cross," outside the walls of Jerusalem. I am awed, bewildered, dazed! Have I gone back eighteen hundred years, and has my life with its paltry gleanings been but a dream? Am I now only awakened? Do Mary, and Magdalene, and St. John, and the disciples mourn beside me? Is the blood shed for the redemption of man not yet dry upon the wood of that ghastly cross? Are the footsteps of Christ, as he staggered beneath the weight of his unendurable burden, still fresh on the Via Dolorosa? I ask myself all these things as I sit pondering over the strangest, most marvelous and the most awe-inspiring and most gruesome sight it is possible for man to gaze upon. I have been to Calvary. Satis est!

Before describing the Passion Play at Oberammergau, the first representation of which I have this day witnessed, I shall briefly state that I left New York on the 30th of April in the good ship Herder, of the Hamburg line, in command of the lynx-eyed Captain Brandt; that we reached Hamburg on the 12th of May; that I went thence by train via Berlin to Dresden and Munich, where I encountered the first evidences of the forthcoming Passion Play in the enormous posters announcing special trains, etc. From the Bavarian capital I took the route by rail to Murnau, the nearest station to Oberammergau, reaching the latter place by a carriage, drive of a few hours. The road among the mountains was enlivened with vehicles of all sorts, shapes, sizes and descriptions.

The village, which I approached on foot, I found to be rich in deep-eaved houses, all-unexpected galleries and gables, and coignes of cupid, and brave and coquettish in new coats of paint, whitewash and varnish. Reaching it, I sought the Burgomaster, and in him I found a—donkey. Armed with a brief authority, he railed and ranted at the pressure put upon him to find shelter for the incoming pilgrims, as though rehearsing the part of Caiaphas, which, to do him justice, he acted "excellent well" upon the following day. I quitted him in disgust, and proceeded to work out my own pattern within my own rights and privileges. I repaired to the house of Herod, but he wouldn't listen to me. St. Peter denied me admittance. Judas refused my pieces of silver. Pilate washed his hands of me. Joseph of Arimathea was three deep, and, after a weary searching, I found sanctuary in the house of the worthy Frau Krach, to whose daughter Anastasia was cast the part of the Virgin Mother in the coming play. My apartment I could not whip a cat in. It was only to be reached by passing up a ladder through a hole in the ceiling of the principal sitting-room. My bed—ah, that bed! Talk of the rack of the Inquisition! of the instruments of torture exhibited to awe-stricken visitors to the Tower of London! and yet I slept on it—not much though—and it was neat as the collar of any Puritan maiden ever put on canvas by Boughton. My pillows were square, and flat, and hard as cricket-balls, while my quilt was of balloon shape and inflated by feathers. It lay on my chest like a warm plaster, but at every movement of my tortured frame, it rolled or floated to the floor. Then, uttering full-flavored language, I was compelled to fish for it in the darkness, to clap it on my chest only to insure its instant removal. Around the apartment hung representations of the supreme moments in the agonies of the personages mentioned in Fox's Book of Martyrs, and, in one corner—oh, Chickering! oh, Erard!—a piano—yes, a piano with wooden keys, with strings to operate the pedal, and which, when played upon, emitted a gasping, wheezing jingle, suggestive of music in its very last throes. The ceiling was low, and if my head—I am six feet in my stockings—were to be examined by a skilful phrenologist at this blessed moment, I have little doubt but that he would endow me with every development, abnormally extensive, known to his mysterious and yet unsatisfactory science. What did I pay for this accommodation? Please to remember that the village was swarming with tourists to whom reckless expenditure upon creature comfort had developed into a necessity. Two marks! Fifty cents! If Frau Krach had demanded as many marks as Judas received from the Sanhedrim, I would have paid them over without a murmur. I was in a Christian country at last.

Having deposited my impedimenta, I sallied forth to satisfy the inner man, and repaired to the Gasthof Stern, where I partook of a liver soup and a veal cutlet worthy of Delmonico, washing them down with copious libations to Gambrinus. Let me advise Americans about to visit Oberammergau to try this hostelry. I heard many murmurings against the fare in other hotels; none against the Stern. Tourists everywhere, from the Vienna swell to the London 'Arry; from the meek Irish priest to the port-wine-nosed Anglican prelate, endeavoring to conceal the "fat living" behind a giddy Tweed suit and a disreputable wide-awake. Vainly did I seek for piquant and perfect toilets from Fifth Avenue, and for the dainty chaussure which distinguishes the daughters of America wherever they set their tiny feet; vainly for the irrepressible "down-Easter," or the rough-and ready representative of the West. Not yet. There were not half a dozen Americans at the first representation of the "Passion Play." The French element was conspicuous by its absence, and, with the exception of the correspondent of the Paris Figaro, the land of the Gaul was unrepresented. Of English there were about one thousand. They did not seem to fraternize, and the Browns kept haughtily aloof from the Joneses, while the Robinsons gazed stonily at both. Peasants from the Tyrol, from the neighboring villages, came flocking into the village, attired in quaint and picturesque dresses; but, alas! that I have to write it, the tide of progress is washing away national costume all over the world, and a great wave would seem to have swept over Bavaria. Few were the men in short jackets and knee-breeches and elaborate gaiters and conical hats; fewer still the women in black satin corsets, scarlet skirts, vivid hose, pointed shoes and gold-bedecked headdresses. The large earrings still remain; but one might as well be in a village on the Hudson as on the Ammer, so far as similarity of costume is concerned. The Bedouin Arab will soon change his burnoose for an ulster, and the ladies of a Coptic harem their yashmaks for hats and Gainsborough.

What a quantity of beer was consumed on that Saturday night! but all in good humor and good fellowship. What a number of Brat-Wurst—those dumpy, dyspeptic-looking sausages which the Bavarians love not wisely but too well! Every long-haired man was treated with marked respect, as he represented some character in the Passion Play, while all hats were raised whenever Joseph Meyer, the Christ, passed on his way. The Great Tragedy was the one universal theme, and tiny children lurked in quiet corners rehearsing their parts for the coming tableaux.

On Sunday morning I repaired to the church and assisted at a High Mass magnificently sung. Colonel Mapleson should hear the soprano. The manner in which the acolytes served the Mass gave me a foretaste of the exquisite grace of the actors in the play, while the mode of the responses to a litany by the congregation evinced a superb and faultless training. In the churchyard I encountered Anastasia Krach, the Madonna, and accompanied her home. Up to two months ago she was a domestic servant in the village. She is a modest, starry-eyed girl of eighteen, with a bright sweet smile, and a general I know not what of guilelessness about her that eminently fits her for the high rôle she has been selected to play.

"Oh," she exclaimed, "I love the part. I feel so holy, so good when I am acting, it seems as if I was in the House of God and before the altar. I cry very much at the Calvary—I cannot help it. The tears are in my eyes all the time I am playing. I am utterly exhausted when it is over, but I feel—oh, I cannot tell how I feel." I had many conversations with this girl, and her whole soul seemed wrapped up in the glorification of being elected to play the Madonna. I may say that she is a very poor actress, and her voice is far from being musical. The theatre is close to the village, and is a structure of very unpretending exterior. It is built entirely of boards, and is partly open to the sky. Considered in its relation to architectural beauty the interior presents nothing of importance except its simplicity. The auditorium has in width 118 feet, and in depth 168. It occupies an area of nearly 20,000 square feet, and is capable of conveniently seating an audience of from five to six thousand people. The stage has been treated at considerable length by most writers on the Passion Play. Some have found in it traces of the ancient classic theatre of Greece. To others, again, it presents traces and a more perfect form of the mystery theatre of the Middle Ages. The spectator sees, in all, five distinct places of action for the players—first, the proscenium for the chorus, for processions and the like; second, the central stage for the tableaux vivants and the usual dramatic scenes; third, the Palace of Pilate; fourth, the Palace of Annas; fifth, the streets of Jerusalem. But, oh, the background, did any theatre ever possess the like? That glorious wall of softest green towering to the sky, the pines standing like needles against the azure! That green plush mantle fringed with foliage which Nature has hung out to be kissed by the sun. On the left the vale of Ammergau, with its flower-dappled meads and its solemn stream stretching away in the distance; behind, the cross-crowned Kofel two thousand feet sheer above the nestling village.

It was while I was engaged in inspecting the theatre, that I met Joseph Meyer, the Christ. He was smoking a very bad cigar. Having replaced it by a genuine Victoria Regina, I entered into conversation with him. He is tall, slight, graceful, humble, and very civil. His eyes are not as large as I could wish them to be, nor as sweet, and his hair and beard are almost black. Now the wine-color that Guido loved to paint has ever been branded in my imagination as the true Nazarene, consequently I felt disappointed in Meyer's general appearance. He is supremely but calmly elated at being permitted to play the leading rôle. He performed it in 1870 and 1871, and the King, in order to save Meyer's hair during the Franco-German war, ordered him to be detailed on orderly duty in Munich instead of being sent to the front, as was poor Simon of Cyrene, who was killed at Sedan.

"I feel as if I should like to die on the cross like my Lord and Master," said Meyer. "I feel as if the bloody sweat was pouring from me when I kneel in the Garden of Gethsemane, and I wish that I were really scourged. I feel faint when I bear the cross to Calvary; and when I utter the last words of Him, it is as if my soul was going away from me." Becoming more natural, and in reply to an inquiry of mine: "I remain twenty minutes on the cross. I am sustained by a loop attached to a pair of corsets, just like a woman's; my left heel rests on an iron step on the cross. Come with me and I'll show you the cross."

I went behind the scenes and examined the mechanism by which the cross is elevated, and the other appliances and "properties" connected with the drama. I may mention that when I met Meyer this evening, after his eight long hours of masterful performance, he was the same humble, retiring individual, and was nowise elated at his supreme success. The English ladies surround him, nay, absolutely mob him, and one enthusiastic dame, although she dropped her h's, could not be induced to drop his hands, to which she clung with the tenacity of a cupping-glass. Magdalene I found, like Werther's "Charlotte," engaged in cutting bread and butter. She is a bright, intelligent, laughing girl, not by any means pretty, who takes a childish delight in talking about the forthcoming performance.

"Won't you watch me when I pour the ointment on His head," she exclaimed, "and on His feet. That is the part of the play I feel most inspired in."

Magdalene lives at home and takes care of her brothers and sisters. The father is a musician, and sub-leader of the church choir. My last visit was to Gregor Lechner, the Judas. He has played this part since 1850. He is considered the best actor in the drama. Like Meyer, he is a carver in wood. The former excels in crucifixes, the latter in groups. I found him posing opposite a very fair copy of Leonardo da Vinci's celebrated picture of the "Last Supper." He is a man of sixty, with a low, cunning expression and a restless, furtive eye. He had dyed his hair and beard to a rich purple, which seemed to render his appearance even more repulsive to me.

"I am the shadow, as Christ is light in the play," he said. "I feel myself to be the veriest wretch and traitor all through the piece. I loathe, abhor myself; and when I kiss my Master I am ready to hang myself. The kiss is my great point; I threw all my dramatic talent—for I do possess dramatic talent—into that action. See," he added, pointing to the Judas in the "Last Supper," "look at that pose, that expression! Watch me see," and Lechner in a second assumed the hideous, anxious cunning, as depicted by Da Vinci on the face of the traitor of traitors.

A Church of England service was announced for eleven o'clock at a gasthof, the entire façade of which was concealed behind the enormous posters of an enterprising excursionizing firm, to the great disgust of the inhabitants. The congregation numbered forty, and the collection, a very generous one, was handed to the curé of the village for distribution amongst the poorest of his flock. Having gladly accepted the invitation to dinner from the Graf von Pappenheim, I walked out to Ettal. The road was literally blocked by incoming vehicles, while the sidewalk was equally crowded. That delightful evening at the monastery will live in the very heart of my brightest recollections. The high-bred courtesy of the Grand Marschal, the winsome grace of the countess, who is a sister of Count Schouvaloff, Russian Ambassador at the Court of St. James, and the supreme beauty and elegance of the ladies Katrina, Anastasia and Edith, daughters of a hundred—nay, a thousand earls. That wondrous old dinner-room, with its oak panelling and emblazoned trophies, wax-lighted, the charming heads of the young countesses in delicate relief against the grim, dark wainscot. The post-prandial promenade in the red brick-paved cloister, lighted by a few quaint oil-lamps and the tender beams of the young May moon, and the Alps, like giant phan-tions, over-leaning all. The music in the salon—zither and piano; the recitations by the Lady Katrina; the wondrous old tunes and priceless bric-a-brac; the wild student songs of the counts, Max and Ludwig, up in an apartment once the cell of a bloodless Benedictine! What a picture to frame in one's memory!

I could have slept on Sunday night, and slept soundly to boot, but for the chattering of a bevy of "strapping wenches," who had anchored their long, white canvas-roofed wagon—a prairie-ship—right beneath my window. These damsels laughed and chatted all through the short night, and I was just on the threshold of my forty winks when, boom went the first gun, announcing that the performance of the Passion Play of 1880 would commence in three hours—namely, at eight o'clock. Masses were celebrated in the church from midnight, and a procession, with a band—headed by the fire brigade, five in number, very brassy as to helmet—marched bravely through the village at six o'clock. Everybody was up, and everybody looked fresh, rosy and expectant. By half-past seven every available place in the theatre claimed its occupant to the number of six thousand, while upwards of three thousand Passion pilgrims failed to obtain admittance. In order to foil the artful designs of certain speculators, it has been ordered that no person can obtain a ticket for the performance until he has registered as a lodger in the village, his landlord standing sponsor. This should be borne in mind by such Americans as resolve to "take in" Oberammergau during their Summer wanderings.

One word about the origin of the play ere the curtain rings up. In the year 1633 a fearful pestilence broke out in the neighboring villages; so fearful, indeed, it was thought everybody would die. In Kohlgrub, distant three hours from Ammergau, so great was the ravages made by the disease that only two married couples were left in the village. Notwithstanding the strict measures taken by the people of Ammergau to prevent the plague being introduced into this village, a day laborer named Caspar Schuecher, who had been working at Eschenlohe, where the plague prevailed, succeeded in entering the village, where he wished to visit his wife and children. In a day or two he was a corpse; he had brought with him the germs of the disease, which spread with such fearful rapidity that within the following thirty-three days eighty-four persons belonging to the village died. Then the villagers in this sad trial assembled and solemnly vowed that if God would remove the pestilence they would perform the Passion tragedy in thanksgiving every tenth year. In 1634 the first play was performed. The decaded period was chosen for 1681, and the Passion Play has been performed every tenth year with various interruptions since that time. The great training-school for the Passion Play has been all along the village church, with its purely Catholic ceremonies, its processions, its music and its song. To the Gemeinster—Rath Daisenberger—the play at Oberammergau owes its supreme success. This venerable man—he is now eighty-five years of age, formerly a monk at the Monastery of Ettal—has for the last fifty years educated his flock for the performance. He has rewritten the play and some of the score. The addresses of the Choregus are written by him after the Greek model of Strophe and Antistrophe. He was present to-day and announced himself as thoroughly delighted with the acting of the corps de ballet. A dead silence fell upon the vast audience as the third cannon boomed, and the chorus of Schutzgeister or Guardian Angels stepped slowly and solemnly forward from recesses on either side of the proscenium, taking up their position across the whole extent of the theatre and forming a slightly concave line. They number nineteen, ten of whom are women. Each is dressed in a white robe with a flowing mantle of rich color, save immediately before the Crucifixion, when they assume black. A golden tiara is worn on the head. The play is in eighteen acts, each act containing a series of dramatic scenes complete in itself, prepared by one or more tableaux vivants, the subject of which is taken from the Old Testament. These tableaux stand in the closest connection with the dramatic part of the performance, being so many symbols and prophecies of the scenes from the life of Christ, which they are intended to illuminate. After the chorus has assumed its position, the Chorypæus or Prologue gives out in a melodramatic manner the opening address, or prologue, which introduces each act: the tone is immediately taken up by the whole chorus, which continues either in solo, alternately, or in chorus, until the curtain is raised in order to reveal a tableau vivant. At this moment the Chorypæus retires a few steps backwards, and forms, with one-half of the band, a division on the left of the stage; while the other half withdraws in a like manner to the right. Thus they leave the centre of the stage completely free, and the spectators have a full view of the tableau which is thus revealed. These spirit-singers prepare the audience for the approaching scenes, and, while gratifying the ear by delicious harmonies, they explain and interpret the relation which shadow bears to substance, the connection between the type and its fulfillment, and, as the name implies, they must ever be present as guardian spirits, as heavenly monitors, during the entire performance. The main object, the whole extent and scope of the Passion Play, is exhibited in two tableaux. The first type represents the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Eden—symbolical of the fall; the second, the Adoration of the Cross—typical of Redemption. The first verse of the intoned prologue fell with powerful intensity upon the ear, and the silence was almost painful. The sun shone upon the mountains and valley and river; upon the streets of Jerusalem; upon the homes of Annas and Caiaphas; and, to add to the realism, birds flew swiftly about, blithely twittering upon the house-tops. A tiny child, clad in dead green, bare legged and shading its eyes with its hands, came suddenly into the blazing daylight from out a house in Jerusalem. This was the first performer who appeared in the Passion Play of 1880. I can but refer briefly to the performance of the action of the Passion. The first dramatic act is Christ's entry into Jerusalem. From the distance beyond the city, as it were, sounds of rejoicing, of glad shouting, of singing, are heard. Down the slope of Olivet comes the Messianic procession, and we hear the singing and rejoicing of the crowds of Passion pilgrims, and the people of Jerusalem, who welcome Jesus to the Holy City. From the side streets bands of Hebrew children, led by their parents, come forth to join the throng that has already collected about Christ. The crowd opens, and Christ appears seated on an ass, His disciples immediately following. When Christ appeared, the audience uttered a murmur, which died as quietly as it was born. There was over five hundred persons on the stage, each waving a palm-branch. Such a combination of color I have never seen—such sage greens, and dead yellows and blues and purples!—such artistic groupings, such realism! The bare-legged, bare-footed children, frisking as children frisk, everybody gazing at Christ and not at the audience. The Saviour was attired in a dove-colored flowing robe, with a reddish-purple mantle. The portrait was intensely Nazarene, and seemingly transferred from the canvas of an old master. Yet no painting ever brought to my mind so complete a realization of my ideal as this dramatic delineator, whose life has been one of years of preparation for his task. No spectator could have gazed upon the Saviour as represented by Meyer and remain untouched by the solemnity and grandeur of the scene. Meyer's action was full of marvelous grace, while all through the performance his exquisite humility was painfully sympathetic. St. John was a vivid and beautiful picture in his green and red, as was also Peter in blue and yellow. Judas wore a gaberdine of pale yellow, with a mantle of reddish brick color.

Next followed the scene in the Temple, where Christ drives out the money-changers, overturning the table. Here we had a number of real doves let loose, while jars were smashed and coins plentifully scattered on the ground. In this act of the Passion Play we see the germ of the conspiracy that leads to the final catastrophe. The second act reveals the High Council, or scene in the Jewish Sanhedrim. The priests composing the assembly are seated on benches about the room, Caiaphas and Annas presiding, the former impersonated by the Burgomaster, whose breast is graced with the most sublime of all Jewish decorations—namely, the shield or breastplate containing twelve precious stones, with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. Caiaphas was so energetic in this scene that he subsequently became as hoarse as a raven. The third act, fearfully realistic, represents the anointment. It is the house of Simon in Bethany. Christ and His disciples take places at the table, and Martha waits upon the guests. Magdalene enters, and, casting herself at the Saviour's feet, anoints them. The waste of this precious salve disturbs Judas, and his role now commences. This entire act is one of supreme interest and importance in the Passion Play. In act fourth we have Christ's last journey to Jerusalem. The Saviour, with His disciples, pass before us on the brow of Olivet. Before them lies the Holy City. Christ weeps over its doom. The second scene is the temptation of Judas. The next act, the fifth, was devoted to the Last Supper, preceded by the fableau of the rain of manna in the wilderness. Leonardo da Vinci's picture was represented in the most minute details—the positions taken at the table by the Lord and the twelve, the grouping—all, everything. Jesus proceeds to wash the feet of His disciples. The acting here was wonderfully impressive and realistic, as the Saviour, ewer in hand, attended by a servant with an earthen pitcher, bent over each foot, unwillingly unsandaled by the disciples, and gently laved it. After this followed the institution of the Holy Sacrament. Christ here broke the bread, and gave a portion to each of His disciples in turn. Judas shrinks as he receives his. Then the Saviour raises the cup, uttering the words of eternal life. At John presses his Master to tell who it is that will betray him; to which the Saviour replies, "He it is to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it." The moment the Lord gives the sop to Judas, the latter rushes from the apartment. In act sixth Judas appears before the Sanhedrim and consents to betray his Master. When the blood-money—the thirty pieces of silver—come to be counted out to the base traitor, he chinks them one by one to test them, and here, for the first time, the vast audience gave expression to their wrought-up feelings by laughter—yes, laughter! and it grated horribly on the ear. In fact, Judas is regarded by the Bavarians as the comic man of the piece, and even when he retires to hang himself, his exit is followed by laughter. Act seven brings us to the Garden at Gethsemane. Jesus enters, followed by His disciples. He prays while the others sleep, and, when He raised himself from the ground, a bloody sweat was on his forehead. A murmur ran through the entire audience at this piteous sight. A laugh was raised when Peter, drawing his sword, cuts off the ear of Malchus; but this was instantly repressed by an indignant "Hush!" Meyer's acting in this scene was perfect. When the act concluded—at twelve o'clock—the Burgomaster stepped forward in plain attire and announced a recess of one hour and a half. A vast majority of the audience retained their seats, while the remainder repaired to the village for dinner. Those who remained picnicked, the sausage and white wine de pays serving as the al fresco meal.

Precisely at half-past one the second division of the Passion Play commenced, which comprises from the captivity in Gethsemane to the Resurrection and Ascension. It was in act eight, when Jesus appeared on the balcony of the house of Annas that occurred a weird and wondrous and awful scene. Christ was standing before Annas and had just been struck on the face by Malkus, when suddenly the heavens became black as ink—"a noonday night"—causing the gigantic mountains to stand out in horrid distinctness, and a flash of the most blinding lightning blazed across the glorious face of the man-God. Then came a clap of thunder that crashed with the crack of doom among the Alps, followed by the rolling of heaven's artillery, the artillery of the Great Captain! It was a moment of paramount grandeur. An awful accessory to the awful tragedy, an awful setting to an awful picture! In act nine Christ is led before Caiaphas, looking divinely beautiful. In this act Peter denies his Master, and the performer to whom was intrusted the crowing of the cock acquitted himself so admirably that all the roosters in the village seemed instantly to reply. Act ten is devoted to the despair of Judas, who utters his unendurable torture in masterly words and with superb action. On the stage is the elder-tree on "the field of blood," and as the arch-traitor flies to it to fling away his accursed life, the audience, I regret to write it, burst into loud and continued laughter. Christ is led before Pilate in act eleven. In act twelve the Man of Sorrows is brought before Herod, and in act thirteen takes place the scourging and crowning. This was horribly realistic, and as the great gouts of blood slowly trickled down the divine forehead after the crown of thorns had been pressed upon His head, a thrill of awe vibrated through the spectators as if on the same heart beat. The resignation in the scene was a marvel of acting. Meyer never allows the dignity of Christ to suffer, and when pushed off the stool to the ground, he falls so as not to detract from His dignity, and the intended degradation of maltreatment reflects upon His accusers. In act fourteen Christ is sentenced to death. Even the rôle of Barabbas, who held the stage for a brief moment, was admirably impersonated. The bearing of the cross to Golgotha, after the picture of Paul Veronese, in act fifteen, is one of the most marvelous scenes of this most marvelous and piteous spectacle. Over six hundred people come upon the stage—a very magic of color combination. Christ, meekly bearing His unendurable burden, appears in the street to the right, followed by the Roman soldiers and the populace. On the left, Mary and Magdalene and John stand in the street, unconscious that the Man of Sorrow approaches. The captain of the guard is mounted. Jesus stops opposite a house the owner whereof tantalizingly bids him press on to Calvary. The Saviour regards him for one second. That man is doomed forever to walk the earth as the Wandering Jew. St. Veronika meets the Lord and offers him a linen cloth. He wipes the bloody sweat from his brow and hands the cloth to her. It is impressed with his divine image. Simeon of Cyrene takes the cross upon his stalwart shoulders. Never shall I forget the expression of Christ as he turned to the poor carpenter, uttering the "glad tidings of great joy." "The blessing of God be upon thee and thine." The sobbing of the spectators was the only sound now to be heard as the procession wended its way along the Via Dolorosa. The Crucifixion was a ghastly, a terrible, an awful realism. The curtain rose to the hideous sound of the hammer, and the three crosses lay upon the ground, each laden with its victim. Those of the two thieves were first set on high, then came that of Christ, the inscription having been nailed on at the last moment. I dare not attempt to describe this scene. Any words that I could pen would fail to afford the faintest idea of the soul-awing spectacle. Jesus, as in Rubens's great picture, hangs suspended before you, the divine head gently reclining on the naked breast, the hands pinioned and bloody, the feet lacerated and bloody. When the soldier pierces His side with a lance, and the blood gushes forth, a short, sharp cry of agony came from the spectators, and a thousand faces paled. The whole scene of that bloody sacrifice is enacted, even to the breaking of the limbs of the malefactors. The Descent from the Cross was a marvel of affectionate reverence. Never did the real personages in the Great Tragedy perform the harrowing office with more pious care, more delicate handling. It was an exact copy of the great painting at Antwerp of Rubens. In act seventeen we had the Resurrection, and in the last act the Ascension.

Having witnessed the Passion Play, I believe it to be the outcome of the pure enthusiasm of believing minds. I no longer look upon it as an interesting relic of the past, long distant, out of keeping with the times, lingering on a threatened existence; but as upon the most marvelous and elevated dramatic exhibition of our epoch, and the perfection of the religious drama. I quitted that rude theatre awed, bewildered, subdued, and I pray that the impressions left by the play, so simple, so powerful, so grand, may be never erased from my heart.

NUGENT ROBINSON.

AN EXCURSION OF PHYSICIANS.

THE convention of the American Medical Association, which closed its session in this city June 4th, was an occasion of great interest to the profession generally, and to the participants was most enjoyable throughout. Not only were members of the convention—some 1,200 in all—formally received and entertained by Mayor Cooper and others, but, after the adjournment, they were given an excursion on the steamer Grand Republic up the North River to the Palisades, up the East River to Long Island City and thence to West Brighton Beach. It was estimated that there were 1,800 people on the boat. Many of them, particularly the ladies, soon became hungry under the invigorating influence of the sea air. No provision had been made for feeding the excursionists on the boat, but two reporters, having discovered a barrel of "hard tack" in the steward's room, the steward soon found himself overrun with customers, who bought the crackers at five cents each. At West Brighton Beach the excursionists fared somewhat better. Apart from the drawbacks attending the feeding of such a multitude, the excursion was very enjoyable, and, during the home trip, a meeting was held and a vote of thanks was tendered to William Wood & Co., who paid the expenses of the entertainment. We illustrate some of the incidents of the trip on page 281.

Gladstone and his Physician.

IT is stated that Mr. Gladstone has taken office in direct opposition to the advice of his medical advisers. This is probably the case. Other men have been Prime Ministers when past seventy, but they have not combined the functions of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that, too, after such a terrific strain as the Midlothian campaign. Lord Palmerston only worked hard at very long intervals, and took excellent care of himself. Lord Russell had a wife who kept him in cotton-wool, nor did he, after he was sixty, do any very exhaustive work. Had Mr. Gladstone been content to take office as Premier, with a seat in the Lords, there is no saying how long he might not have held the position so far as health is concerned, but it is highly improbable that he will now be able to do so. About seventeen years ago he broke down in a manner which for a brief while occasioned great alarm to his friends, and although very little was publicly said about it, he showed one evening painful symptoms of an overwrought brain. Many of his friends hope, for the interest of himself and his party, that after this session he will be induced to resign the Chancellorship of the Exchequer.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Prince of Wales at Truro.

It was in the double capacity of Duke of Cornwall and Grand Master of the English Freemasons that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales performed the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the new cathedral of Truro. The proceedings were conducted with magnificent pomp and splendor, and the day being gloriously fine, the term of thousands of visitors who flocked into the town from near and far throughout the country were amply gratified with the spectacle afforded them, and the festivities in which they took part. The bishop commenced the ceremony with the religious service ordained for such occasions; and then the Prince, advancing, went through the imposing rites of the Masonic ceremony, speaking the solemn words and performing the semi-mysterious rites of the craft with a dignity befitting the occasion. He used the mallet belonging to Old St. Paul's Lodge, to whom it was presented by Sir Christopher Wren, and which was handed by Charles II. when laying the foundation-stone of St. Paul's Cathedral.

The Charlemagne Statue at Paris.

The equestrian statue of Charlemagne which is to be erected in the court of the Church of Our Lady in Paris is the work of the Rochet Brothers. One of them, Louis, died from the effects of a too severe application to the modeling of the statue and the preparations for the casting. The Rochet Brothers had previously designed and cast the equestrian statue of William the Conqueror, erected at Falaise, and that of Dom Pedro at Rio de Janeiro. But Charlemagne is considered the greatest of all their works. The pedestal which is to support the magnificent sculpture was designed by Viollet Leduc a short time before his death.

The Wreck of the "Alabama."

One of the most curious naval accidents on record recently occurred to the English steamer Alabama, which sailed from this country with a load of grain for Havre. She ran upon the breakwater at the mouth of the Seine at high tide, and, as the tide fell; no precaution having been taken to prevent the strain, she parted in the middle just in front of the smoke-stack. Brown Brothers, English engineers, undertook, with the aid of M. Letellier, a French engineer, to transport the parts of the Alabama to Havre and solder her together. This bold project has been carried out, and we show the arrival of the bow at Havre. The stern is there long before this. The cargo was, of course, easily removed, and the opening temporarily covered with diagonal planking.

African Chiefs in Buckingham Palace.

On Friday, May 14th, Queen Victoria gave an audience to three Uganda chiefs, special ambassadors of King Mtesa. The object of their visit is to see England and the English in order to carry back a report to their sovereign, who is undoubtedly the most enlightened monarch in Central Africa, of the power of England and the friendliness of its people. They are also bearers of a message of good will from King Mtesa to England, and are sent to bear testimony to the progress of Christianity in the centre of Africa. These chiefs were received by Her Majesty at Buckingham Palace in order to present a letter from King Mtesa, being introduced to the Queen by General Sir Francis Seymour, K. C. B., the Master of Ceremonies.

Dupuis Street and Gate, Ha-Noi.

France acquired a foothold in Cochin China in 1861, and in 1874, by the treaty of Saigon, obtained from Tu Duc, Emperor of Anam, the cities of Ha-Noi and Hai-Phong in Tonquin. The people of this latter province wish to throw off the yoke of Anam and restore their kingly line under French protection. The street and gate at Ha-Noi are constantly called by the people the Dupuis Street and gate, to honor a French officer of the name, who did much to secure their liberty. At this gate Dupuis barricaded himself when the brave Frenchman Garnier was massacred here by the Annamites. The picture gives an idea of the difference between China and Tonquin. The houses, as roof and arrangement, are more European, although the gates and sheds and verandas, as well as the dress of the people, remind us of China.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE Nihilist agitation in Russia is said to be declining.

—THE army-worm is causing great destruction to the crops in New Jersey and on Long Island.

—ACCOUNTS from all parts of Ireland regarding the state of the crops give the highest promise of abundance.

—THE Greek Government is collecting war material and preparing, when the right time arrives, to occupy the new territory claimed by Greece.

—PRINCE RATTAZ has delivered to Austria an invitation to send a representative to the Berlin Conference, which is to meet on the 16th of July.

—COLONEL PASHKOFF, the leader of the new evangelical movement in Russia, has, at the instance of the Holy Synod, been ordered to quit Russia forthwith.

—THE London Standard confirms the report of a civil war in the Argentine Confederation, and that Buenos Ayres is in the hands of a provisional government.

—THE French Chamber of Deputies has fixed as the national fête day the 14th of July—the anniversary of the taking of the Bastile—instead of the Imperial day, the 15th of August.

—THE gavel used by the presiding officer at the Chicago Convention is made from wood taken from Lincoln's home, the handle being a cane grown on the Mount Vernon estate. It was a handsome souvenir for Senator Hoar to carry home with him.

—THE German Technical Naval Commission have decided almost unanimously against making any alterations in the steering orders for mercantile ships, in consequence of the new regulations on the subject issued by the Admiralty for the Imperial Navy.

—THE opening of the Mount Vesuvius Railway took place on June 6th, and was celebrated by a splendid fête. Several successful ascents were made. The time occupied in the journey from the foot of the mountain to the terminus of the railway was eight minutes.

—THE German defense tax Bill, which is estimated to yield $3,000,000, provides that those in receipt of an income under $250 shall pay $1 a year, while those having $250 to $1,500 will be subject to an additional tax of from $2.50 to $25. The tax on incomes from $1,200 and upward will be at the rate of three per cent. for every $250 of income.

—THE English torpedo ship Hecla has been ordered to Bantry Bay to carry out, with the ships at the Channel Squadron, an extensive series of experiments in submarine mining and torpedo attack. A new system of defense is to be tried, and in choosing Bantry Bay as the scene of these experiments the Admiralty desire to keep it from being made known.

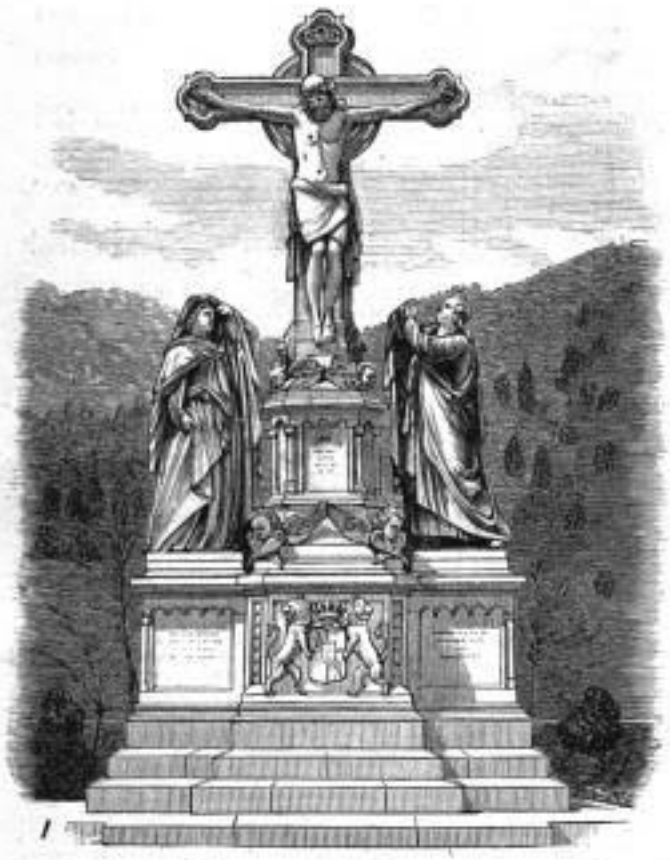
—IN case of the mobilization of the German army, each soldier receives two salicylic acid plugs of different dimensions, which he may, if wounded, himself introduce into his wounds. These plugs consist of a piece of gauze 15 to 16 square ctm., in which is rolled one or two grammes of a salicylicial wadding. They are made loose so as to take any form.

—EAST of the River Jordan there is an Arab tribe which has embraced the Catholic faith, and is ministered unto by a native Italian priest. These Arabs wander about from place to place with their flocks of sheep, and when their tent is pitched in any place a temporary building to serve as a church is put up. Other Arab tribes, it is said, are disposed to follow this example.

—PETROLEUM is now used for the illumination of all except three of the lighthouses of the coast of France. A portion of the money saved by this change has been expended in augmenting the illuminating power of the lanterns. Experiments have lately shown that petroleum may safely be employed for floating lights also, and a light of this kind in the Bay of Biscay is now maintained by it.

—ORDERS have been sent to General Sir Donald Stewart, the British commander at Cabul, to withdraw his forces with the least delay compatible with the health of the troops. Cabul is to be evacuated by the end of October. The surplus members of General Stewart's staff and the surplus war material are to be returned to India forthwith. It is believed that Gandamuk and the Shutargardan Pass will be the extreme points of the British occupation.

—THE Prussian Parliamentary Committee on the Church Bill is gradually approaching the end of its labors. The positive result of its deliberations hitherto is not very gratifying to the Government, and when the Bill comes again before the House it can only present the appearance of a legislative torso. Whether Prince Bismarck will acquiesce in the changes suggested by the committee is very doubtful. Meanwhile he seems to take a most gloomy view of the internal situation.



—THE American trotters now being imported into England are attracting much attention among stud-masters on the other side. This new revelation in the science of horse-breeding will, it is anticipated, be likely to create a change in the attributes of English sport. The Prince of Wales is said to express the greatest interest in this new breed, and has become the purchaser of one or two of the fastest horses brought over, one of them being able, the Court Chronicler says, "to cover a mile in 2 minutes 13¼ seconds."

—THE freight agents of the various ocean steamship lines at this port report that there is no falling off in business, but that on the contrary all the room at their disposal is fully taken up. In many instances the offerings have to be refused for want of space. The different dairy products are going abroad in quantities, and there is a noticeable increase in the movement of cheese. The fresh meat and live stock traffic keeps up on a liberal scale, and nearly all the steamers leaving for European ports have more or less of either kind on board.

—A SINGULAR recommendation is made by the Philadelphia Grand Jury. It is the re-establishment of the whipping post. The local prisons are overcrowded with an idle, shiftless class of inmates, who persist in committing minor offenses in order to get a comfortable lodging and tolerably wholesome food without being obliged to do any work. Wherefore the Grand Jury would have them soundly whipped, and not lodged and fed at the public expense. We should be sorry to accept this recommendation as indicative of the real standard of enlightenment in that community.

—TOM DALE, Captain of the Canadian Cricket Club, who has been arrested for desertion from the British army on his arrival, with his team, in England, owes his trouble to too much matrimony. He left a wife in England when he came to America, but soon afterwards married a woman of Natchez, Miss. The English wife followed him across the ocean, and had him arrested for bigamy; but she succeeded, for pay, to his getting a divorce from her and marrying the Natchez wife over again. She secured him, also, that she had obtained a promise from Sir Garnet Wolseley that he could visit England without danger of punishment for desertion. This representation seems to have been false.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,
AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.—A MAD ACT.

TWO o'clock in the morning, and Gypsy, decidedly cross, waits up in her parlor for Jack. Just as her fierce impatience has culminated in a fierce resolve to lock him out, a knock sounds at the door. Having long ago dismissed the servants, she responds herself, and is confronted by Toboskie and Chetewood, who recoil in dismay at sight of her, while between them, and requiring all of their assistance to keep in a perpendicular position, is poor Jack. It is the first time that Gypsy has ever seen him in such a state of hopeless intoxication, and at first she is startled.

"What is the matter?" she says, sharply.

Chetewood, overwhelmed with confusion, maintains unbroken silence; therefore upon Toboskie devolves the necessity of replying.

"Your husband is not very well, Lady Ashhurst," he says. "The events of the day have been too much for him."

"Never—hic—felt better—hic—in my life," affirms that individual, with startling pronunciation. "Wasn't too much for me—hic—at all. 'Bookie, you mistake—hic. Could take three—hic—more, straight as a die."

Lady Ashhurst recoils in horror from him. Before this, Jack's man has always taken charge of him when in this condition, and by dint of exercise sobered him down, so as to present a decent appearance before his wife. But Mr. Tompkins, having unfortunately seized this evening to indulge in some sensuous peccadillo of his own, Chetewood and Toboskie, with the best intentions in the world, have fetched Jack up to his chambers, not dreaming of any possibility of being confronted by his wife.

In supreme silence, and feeling almost as guilty as their charge, they march him across the room, singing as he goes, to his bedchamber, and place him upon the couch.

"I'll try and find his man," says Chetewood, and, glancing sympathetically at Gypsy, leaves the room.

But Jack makes an affectionate lunge for Toboskie, and utterly refuses to permit him to leave. Thus pinioned, the ambassador seats himself upon the bed, and Jack soon drops into a deep sleep. In the meantime Chetewood thrusts his head in at the parlor door wherein sits Gypsy, with the information that the faithless Tompkins is still invisible.

An hour later Toboskie emerges from the bedchamber, where Jack is sleeping the sleep of the innocent. From the distant shadows Gypsy comes forth, all the soft peach bloom faded from her cheeks, and under her eyes dark circles; but never has she looked more lovely. Her long, loose robe, opening far down at the throat, is a marvel of beauty, and shows to advantage every perfect line of her beautiful figure.

It is just such a loveliness that would appeal to a man's senses, even were he the famous Joseph. But Toboskie steadies himself as she comes forward with clasped hands and upraised face.

"Is he sleeping?" she says, with a shudder.

"Yes, madam. And it is needless to assure you that I regret exceedingly having been the means of disclosing your husband's condition to you."

Gypsy makes an angry, petulant little gesture like an irritable child.

"If Jack makes a beast of himself," she says, while her eyes flash mutinously, "why shouldn't I know it?"

Toboskie is silent, and, when finally he speaks, it is on a different subject.

"Do you join the excursionists to-morrow?" he says.

"Yes, I suppose so"—carelessly.

"Then, madam," Toboskie's tones are clear and distinct, and every word falls like ice upon her heart—"then, madam, I will make my adieus to night."

Gypsy grows even paler and puts out one small, jeweled hand as if to ward off some blow.

"Make your adieus?" she says, and her voice quivers piteously.

"Yes, madam, I start to-morrow for Liverpool, whence I shall sail in a few days for Russia. I would like to tell you how much I appreciate your own and your husband's kindness to me, coming as I did in your midst a stranger. I am very grateful and regret that I cannot bear more substantial evidence of my gratitude than mere words. But if ever you come to my country you will find me and all I possess at your command."

Gypsy has not heard a word that he says; a great, blinding pain has seized her, and in mute agony her azure eyes look up at him with a gleam in their soft depths like unto some dumb thing wounded to the heart.

There is in her nature no strength or endurance to brace her up under suffering and temptation. In this moment her pride and womanly dignity—her husband's honor—are furthest from her thoughts. She only knows that he is going away from her—this princely man with a front like ice and passions of fire—this man whom she has grown to love in the short days of their acquaintance with all the strength of her nature, which, in reality, has but one strength, and that the power of loving.

Never in her life has she exercised the slightest control or self-denial. Therefore, she is the less prepared to battle with this fierce pain and passion that have assailed her.

"And you will never come back?" her pallid lips scarcely move as the words break from her. "Never come back?" There is a rising inflection in her voice that shows how intense is the excitement under which she labors.

"Possibly, madam, unless my country may again see fit to send mean a representative to your sovereign," he speaks with studied coldness, for he sees her emotion, and is bitterly conscious that her ravishing loveliness is again firing in his veins a weak emotional sentiment for which he despises himself.

"But what makes you go so soon?" she mutters.

"It is rather earlier than I expected, but circumstances have changed. I must see my friend who is condemned to exile. I may yet be able to serve him in some way, and if I do not hasten it will be too late."

She takes a step nearer him; the sweetest, dearest selfishness ever witnessed in mortal being sits in her face with its dazzling loveliness.

"Do not mind for him," she says, and her old graceful tyranny stamps her manner. "He is a man, strong and powerful; he is already condemned, therefore, what can you do? You, yourself said you 'had done all that was possible.' Then why should you hasten? I am a woman, and I bid you stay!" It is the most adorable sophistry man ever listened to, still Toboskie makes a desperate effort to keep his senses.

"You honor me, madam," he says, icily, "but it is impossible!"

"It is not impossible if you have the inclination to remain. Stay but one week—only seven little days!" she pleads, and draws still nearer him. Her eyes burn with a passionate light; her full, rich lips are parted; through the loose robe, intended to be donned only in her chamber, he sees her white breast heaving like an unquiet sea.

He feels a fierce, mighty gust of passion sweep over him, showing how dangerous this will be when combined with love. Still he struggles with his weakness.

"I will bid you good-night," he says, still sensible enough to know that his only safety lies in flight.

But before he can execute his intentions, there is a flutter of dainty garments, and in the next moment Gypsy has thrown herself upon his breast, and her bare arms are wound around the brown column of his haughty throat.

For an instant he is sobered and positively appalled. The silence around is oppressive. In the next chamber lies the man whose wife he holds—that man, whose hand he has taken in friendship and at whose table he has broken bread. Never, through all the excesses of a necessarily worldly career, has he sullied his honor. Against that, hitherto, his bitterest enemy could breathe no word of reproach. Now, the shame of his position smites him with a sudden horror, and he vainly essays to unclasp those clinging arms, while every touch of the soft, warm flesh but deepens the passion that runs rife in his being.

"Madam——"

The woman, literally mad, buries her face upon his shoulder.

"I will not listen!" she cries. "I will not hear you while that ice is in your tones!"

"But for heaven's sake, consider! Madam, that——"

"Ah! madam—madam!" moans poor Gypsy, bitterly. "Do I not tell you I will not have you call me by that? Is it possible that you have no feeling for me?"

"Quite possible," he says, desperately. "Madam—Gypsy, if you will!—for heaven's sake compose yourself! Consider; I am your husband's friend—this is dishonor! This——"

"Honor!" cries Gypsy, "it is a bauble; it is not honor I want, it is happiness! I will not allow a myth to wreck my life, and I cannot be happy away from you!"

"You are mad, Lady Ashhurst; you do not know what you are saying! You honor me, but for heaven's sake do not detain me!"

"I will detain you—I will not let you go!"

"But consider for one moment; if you should be seen thus, your good name would be ruined for ever!"

"I do not care!"

"But you should care for your husband's sake, and also your own. Think of your reputation. Not a lady in your order has a more unblemished character than you. I am amazed that a lady of your standing will give way to such madness."

"I do not care," again reiterates Gypsy. "In the past I have been all that is right because I have had no temptation," and she speaks an ungarnished truth. "It has always been amusement; I never cared for any man more than I cared for Jack. Now it is different. I never loved before—really loved—and I would risk anything rather than be separated. Is it a sin? I do not think it a sin to love. This may be wrong in the sight of the English whose veins are ice; but I am not English, I am of the South. I was born under warm suns, where love was an honor and a pride. My nature has never troubled me before; now it cries out against our being separated. If you must go to your own country take me with you." The words break from her rapidly, and all the soft rich color has flown back to her face; her eyes, lustrous with a maddening passion, look straight in his own with a piteous prayer; her ripe, red lips are parted and over them comes her warm breath in soft gusts, which smite his swarthy cheeks; he feels the rapid beating of her heart against his own, and the quivering of her form as she offers her great love into his keeping. Her ardent Creole nature speaks in every word, in every glance and gesture.

He were more than mortal to withstand this woman in such a moment.

With a reckless abandonment to the delirious passion that fires his every vein, he wraps his arms around her slight form and crushes her to his heart. Again she holds his strong and haughty soul fast bound in the manacles of passion. And while he holds her to his heart with fierce strength, she throws far back her head and looks him in the face. She sees that his eyes burn with a lurid glow, and that his breath breaks from him in labored gasps. Over her countenance flashes the sweetest light that ever shone in mortal face, and her eyes burn with the triumph of love. With a low, glad cry she lays her cheek back against his breast, and with a mighty impulse he bends his regal head, and his lips, dry and scorching, meet hers in a burning kiss, the first and the last that ever comes between them.

"Ah, you do love me!" she whispers.

Her voice breaks the spell that binds him in the thraldom of her beauty. With all his force he flings her from him and she reels and falls upon a divan. With eyes flashing with something akin to positive hatred, he glowers at the soft dazzling loveliness that has betrayed him. He has sold his honor for a woman's kiss. And in that moment an utter loathing of her fastens upon him, equaled only by his bitter hatred of himself.

"No," he says, and his voice is clear and sharp. "I do not love you, Lady Ashhurst. For a moment, be it said to my eternal shame, you held me fast in the chains of a passion which is not love. To an honest man's soul there is something deeper and grander than mere sensuous animal life. The higher and baser instincts of a man's nature may be in direct variance, and a sensuous emotion may briefly fasten upon him in which his nobler instincts may have no sympathy. And, again I say, madam, such an emotion is not love. After what has passed to-night it will be better if we never meet again. Once more I bid you adieu!"

Despite his brave words, something in the stricken, white face of Gypsy holds him motionless. She lays like a beautiful statue upon the silken couch, her gaze fastened upon him and her small hands locked tightly in her lap.

Then into the beautiful eyes fastened upon him Toboskie sees a shrinking pain and terror gather. There is such a marked change in their expression that he is amazed. Not a particle of the sensual fire remains, and, though still fastened upon him, they seem to be looking far beyond—into another world. Then, apparently without any volition of her own, her head turns slowly, steadily towards the door. He is himself aware of some new and powerful element introduced, and, following the direction of Gypsy's glance, he sees Valentine standing in the doorway, her eyes, filled with magnetism, fixed upon Lady Ashhurst.

With a haughty bow he turns and leaves the room, knowing that no word that he can say will lessen the shame of their position, which Valentine reads at a glance.

CHAPTER X.—A FRIENDLY PARTING.

TOBOSKIE has made his adieus to all of his friends; still he hangs aimlessly around the doors and open windows. He has assured Jack, who is to accompany him to London, that he is not in the slightest hurry—that if they miss one train they can, without difficulty, take another. In consequence of which, Jack, with not the slightest trace of the dissipation of the previous night, loiters over his breakfast, he having risen late, probably owing to his recent debaucheries. Still, an idly-eaten breakfast cannot last all the morning, and to Toboskie's dissatisfaction, he sees that Jack's will soon draw to an end.

Be it said to his eternal shame, the Russian ambassador has wasted this morning which he had intended to devote to travel—wasted it ignominiously for a child! With a half-angry, disappointed gleam in his eyes, he turns, and, in gloomy contemplation, looks away to the Channel. Suddenly across his cold face breaks an expression of doubt and joy commingled; then, thrusting his head in at the dining-room window, he tells Jack that he will be back in a moment, and starts across the sands at a breakneck speed. In a few moments he comes up to Maize, who stands alone upon the beach, her impressionable maid having given over her heart into the keeping of a tall and melancholy footman, with whom she is now in sweet converse a short distance off.

Maize is not aware of his approach until he stands before her, then she looks up with a start.

"Does Gypsy want me?" she says, and starts towards the hotel. But he puts out his hand and detains her, and, for the first time, she fails to resent his friendly overture. There is an expression in his eyes—a mighty will—that masters even her indomitable spirit.

"No," he says. "Gypsy does not want you, that I know. I have not seen her this morning. Still I have had the courage to seek you, even after my experience with your temper."

He speaks slowly, banteringly, and looks down in her eyes, which surely hold a shadow of graciousness. And as the pastaweeps back to her, around her mouth quiver certain lines which one is sure are the forerunners of laughter. He looks at her silently, and somehow a feeling of rest steals over him. After the madness and shame and duplicity of the night before, it is an inestimable blessing to stand surrounded by the purity of a child. Finally he again speaks.

"I am going away," he says, slowly.

"Yes. Gypsy is, too," replies Maize, placidly. "That is," bethinking herself, "if she is able."

"If she is able?" he says, questioningly.

"She was not well this morning."

Toboskie is guiltily silent.

"Where is Lady Ashhurst going?" he inquires, after a pause.

Maize looks up in surprise.

"On the excursion," she says.

Then Toboskie is suddenly struck with their position. Even though he has come to say good-by, her reception, which shows such a marked cessation of hostilities on her part, has roused in him a sense of elation equal to a boy's. He regards her in comical anxiety.

"Are you quite well?" he says, seriously, but with a wicked gleam in his magnificent eyes.

"Eh?" says Maize, slightly bewildered by this sudden solicitude.

"Are you sure that you are not sick?"

"Yes, I am!" a trifle cross. It is not a pleasant sensation to feel that one is being laughed at.

"Ah! I am glad to hear it," with evident relief. "I was afraid this sudden civility of yours might indicate approaching illness or even dissolution. If you will consider for a moment—I think you have actually spoken a dozen civil words to me."

Maize draws herself erect and looks severely dignified, though seized with a violent and disgraceful desire to laugh; disgraceful, considering her sworn hostility to this man.

"You said you were going away," she suggests, freezingly.

A cloud passes over the dark, delicate face of the ambassador.

"I had actually forgotten," he says, with a forced smile. "Yes, I am going away for good, and I came to see if you would bid me 'God speed!'"

"Are you going to Russia?" she inquires, calmly.

He curses himself for a fool; still a wave of inestimable disappointment sweeps over him at her manifest indifference. He asks himself what more he would have of a child; yet all the same he is mortally wounded.

"Yes," he says, quietly, while he looks steadily, almost yearningly, downwards in her glorious eyes. "Yes; I am going to Russia. I suppose I shall never come back to England; or, if I do, it will be many, many years hence, and then you will be a young lady," he speaks slowly to occupy time, and all the while his dark eyes, at times partially fierce, study every line of the small, Greek face. She stands as when he first saw her, her small feet buried deep in the sand, and back of her glinting the smooth waters of the channel. The full flood of the morning sun streams in her countenance, but all the damaging and inquisitive light cannot reveal the slightest blemish. It is dazzlingly perfect, and in the glimmer of her golden hair that shines like the sun looks unearthly beautiful. Yet it is a face that bears misfortune in its loveliness.

He can never disabuse his mind of the impression that for her the future holds its mystery and its pain. There is a spirit in her eyes that must be drawn forth through martyrdom—a pure and priceless metal to be purged through fire. He knows that there is a royal heroism in her nature, though it now may be slumbering—that she could gird her soul with a lofty endurance though assailed by injustice and calumny, or made to suffer the torments of the rack. And he knows, too, that such strength will not go untried.

Yet he never dreams that through him shall fall the sword that shall cleave her haughty womanhood—that through him shall be swept upon her the direst wrong that ever mortal man did woman!

Not a shadow of the miserable future comes between them, as they stand there upon the beach, gazing steadfastly into one another's eyes. Suddenly his mind reverts to their first meeting upon the strands.

"Will you tell me," he says, abruptly, "what was the matter between you and the woman that first day? and will you tell me why it is that you have always hated me?"

Again, and for the last time in many years, he sees that proud uplifting of the golden-head—that same head that he shall some day look upon in the gloom and shadows of the dungeon, whither he has sent her—and her face flushes, while in her eyes gather that old, defiant light.

"Yes; I will tell you, since you are going away," she says, proudly. "Celeste was angry because I played with some tradesmen's children; but they were very nice children, and I gave them some money as I did not think they had much for themselves and I had more than I wanted. Celeste treated them very impudently, and it made me very angry. She wanted to compel me to go home and I would not go. That was all!"

Looking down in her proud eyes that are calm and steady as a saint's, he knows that she has spoken truly, and an utter shame sweeps over him as he remembers how mercilessly and unjustly he judged her. And, now, too late, he has found his error. It is a trifling thing, but it pains him strangely. In his haughty supremacy, in his world-wide distinction he has grown to believe himself omnipotent, his judgment infallible, and yet in that trifling thing has he erred.

"Why did you not tell me this before?" he says, lowly.

She lifts her calm and haughty eyes to his disquieted face.

"Why should I have told you? You were nothing to me!"

He is staggered.

"Besides," she continues, "you doubted me from the first; you took sides with Celeste. After that I would not trouble you with an explanation. If you believed her lies it was all well. But that is the reason why I hated you, and why I would not be friends with you. You doubted me, and I was innocent; and I never will be friends with one who does not trust me."

Important words from a child of tender years, no doubt. Yet they come very naturally from her, and it never occurs to him that there is anything in their conversation bordering on the ludicrous. Never in all the years of his haughty and perfect manhood has he felt so near the level of the general standard as now. With a strange humility he, the Russian courtier, reaches out his hand to the small form planted like a rock before him, and his voice is low and humble, for it is the spirit always that he sees, and not its form.

"Will you forgive me?"

She looks up in his dark face and sees in it shame and pain and humility; then, without a word, she lays her hand in his. In these few last moments peace has come between them—peace, when it is too late. Yet through all the future he knows he shall carry with him her picture as she stands now upon the beach.

CHAPTER XI.—IN WHICH WE ARE IN RUSSIA.

THE sun, low in the west, streams upon the gilded roofs of St. Petersburg, where the palaces of the noble tower in palatial contrast to the hovels of the serf, and where reigns the bitterest tyranny, under the guise of royalty, that ever existed on the face of the earth.

From the arched and deep-set doorway of the group of massive buildings in whose sacred depths are projected the mysteries and intrigues of the Russian Government—where the wily statesmen of the Emperor mingle in deep and secret conclave, holding the helpless populace in the palms of their hands, that have known no touch of labor, no deflation of toil—step two men; and the rays of the setting sun stream fair in their dark and high-bred faces, as they pause for a moment in deep converse under the shadow of the projecting doorway, before descending the long flight of stone steps leading to the street.

One we will instantly recognize as Count Raoul Toboskie, despite the fact that ten years have intervened since last he was presented to the reader upon Brighton Beach. Time has been lenient with him, and, so far from deteriorating his personal appearance, has increased his attractiveness. As he stands wrapped to the chin in his heavy furs, one could pronounce him a royal-looking man, without being accused of exaggeration. His face, dark and swarthy as a Moor's, is cold and haughty, and holds deep lines of a powerful will. His eyes are even keener than of old, and scintillate with a steely light. It is a countenance far removed from all semblance of earthly weakness—strong, proud, dominant. And as in person he has improved, so has he ascended the ladder of fame and distinction, until at forty he is the confidential friend and adviser of his sovereign, and the most powerful statesman of his country.

By his side stands his friend, Count Nicholas Lagors, who once held a commission in the body-guard of his sovereign. The count is tall and slender, with something of the subtle grace of his youth still clinging to his slight figure. He is a man fifty years of age, with a thin, dark face, bearing deep lines of passion, and eyes that burn with a repressed but never-dying fire.

His appearance is indicative of extreme melancholy, which, however, may not reach further than the skin, and to which is added a gloomy discontent and cynicism. His fiery eyes are ever restless, and it would seem impossible that a smile had ever broken up the moody severity of his dark countenance.

Yet, despite all this, and a shadowy reputation in younger days, Count Nicholas, like his present companion, is, and always has been, one of the most popular and courted nobles in the Russian capital. Count Lagors is also fabulously wealthy, being the possessor of three hundred thousand heads of cattle, an hundred thousand acres of corn-land, and as much wheat, besides innumerable well-trained serfs.

The two nobles descend the steps, at whose foot are crouched a few miserable, down-trodden members of the people, who, exorted by years of injury and oppression, have dragged themselves hither to present their humble petitions, and sue for rescue from their tyrannical masters—their only opportunity being in intercepting the statesmen as they leave the palace.

As Toboskie and Lagors reach the pavement they cluster around them, and, falling upon their knees, petition their assistance.

Lagors looks angry and disgusted. Toboskie, too, is somewhat annoyed, though a certain rough pity shines briefly in his eyes.

"My friends," he says, resolutely, "I can do nothing for you."

A howl like that of a pack of hunted, starved wolves, breaks from the poor, abject, friendless creatures. And one, bolder than the rest, whose hollow cheeks and burning eyes tell their own story, clutches the furs of Toboskie and half raises himself, where he kneels upon the ice-bound stones.

"My lord," he says—and his tones hold a shrill wail—"my lord, help, help! They say you are good and merciful, and have power with the Czar; in the name of mercy, beseech him to give me aid. I will be your lowest servant; I will slave for you night and day. But in the name of the holy Mother! take me from the man who is starving us to death, and living on our heart's blood."

Toboskie's pity and annoyance increase; he pushes the miserable wretch aside with his foot; but the action is destitute of the slightest roughness.

"I have told you that I can do nothing for you," he says, sternly.

Still the trembling, bony hands retain their desperate clutch upon the priceless furs of the noble, and the great, hollow eyes stare up with a piteous prayer.

"Help!" he cries in a hoarse voice; "oh, help, for the love of God! My wife and little ones are down with a fever; they have come to this through labor and starvation. Yet the lord will give me no rest, no food, no medicine. Buy me from him; set us free."

"It is the estate into which you have been born. I cannot aid you," replies Toboskie. And as he speaks he takes from his pocket a handful of coins and scatters it among them, which they pounce upon like vultures, and the peers make their way on.

"Poor devils!" says Toboskie, with a shudder. It is the only comment upon the painful scene just past.

"Are you going out this evening?" asks Lagors, after a brief silence.

"Yes," is the brief reply.

"Is the engagement imperative?"

"It is, unfortunately. The day has been unusually busy, and I confess I am not in the mood for visiting: but an hour hence must see me at Lord Ashhurst's."

"Your English friends?" inquires Lagors, with polite interest.

"Yes. By-the-way, you must know them. Lord Jack is one of the finest fellows that ever lived, if adversity has not soured his disposition."

The count gives a yawn.

"Men!" he says, with a shrug. "My friend, I do not care much for men."

"Of that I am aware," replies Toboskie, with a smile, "and, as an inducement, I have two of the most beautiful women in the world to offer; provided——"

"Always a proviso!" interrupts Lagors, who nevertheless is brightening.

"Provided Jack Ashhurst's wife is as lovely as once she was, and the child has developed all the rare promises of womanhood. Will you go with me this evening?"

"With greatest pleasure," promptly replies Lagors, who, despite his moroseness and melancholy, is noted for his fondness for women. "And now, since you promise me two lovely women, who are these people?"

"These 'people,'" says Toboskie, quietly, "are members of the English aristocracy. Jack Ashhurst owns one of the proudest, and, once, the richest peerdoms in England. But since I first met him he has been terribly unfortunate. In the first place, he has no idea of proper management, and, I suppose, has been reckless and extravagant. In the second, he has had an uncontrollable fondness for drink, in which, I am happy to hear, he is reforming. In the third, his money losses made him wild and reckless, and he made no effort at retrenchment, which, of course, but added to his misfortune. From his immense fortune he has still a considerable remainder; but to him, with his extravagant habits, it is but a drop, though it insures them from want, it being tied up so that he can spend nothing but the income, which is sufficient to maintain them in a quiet, and to some extent, luxurious manner. But this sort of thing will not suit Jack. So they, having tired of England, have come to Russia to claim an estate bequeathed them by some of their family, which, added to the remainder of their former fortune, will restore Jack's checkbook to its pristine power."

"And his wife is a beauty, eh?" observes Lagors, with his palpable weakness.

"Ten years ago she was considered the most beautiful woman in England."

Lagors looks up in obvious alarm.

"Ten years," he says. "Why, man, ten years is an eternity for a woman. If madame la peeress——"

"According to my reckoning," interrupts Toboskie, "Lady Ashhurst is just thirty years old."

The count appears relieved.

"I was afraid she was old. Thirty years! Why, she must have been a bride when you first met her?"

"To the contrary, she had been married five years."

"And the daughter?"

"Must be to-day one of the most magnificent women in Russia."

"I must see these English beauties. At what hour do you go?"

"An hour hence, or, if that does not give you time for your toilet, say an hour and a half sharp. I will call around at your place and pick you up, and we will go together."

THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN.

CONFERENCE OF THE GERMAN TUNKERS AT LANARK, ILL.

THE German Baptist Association, known in ecclesiastical history as the Tunkers, from tunken, "to dip," and colloquially as the Church of the Brethren, originated in 1708. Driven by the hand of religious persecution from their homes in the Palatinate, other parts of Germany and from Switzerland, they found a brief resting-place in Holland and Friesland, and finally, about 1719, emigrated to these shores in the hope of practicing religion according to their own peculiar tenets. They were a mere handful then, and came here in scattered groups. The doctrine of Seventh-day worship did not obtain among them until many years later, when the pioneer, Conrad Beissel, effected the change. For years he lived a recluse, inhabiting a cave on the banks of the Cocalico. His leadership was soon acknowledged, and one by one the members of the faithful flocked to his standard. They at first settled at Ephrata, Pa., where they founded a temle or saal for public worship. Almost a century and a half has passed over its peaked gables, but it still stands a marvel of quaintness, ingenuity, and strength. It occupies a bit of picturesque ground on the banks of the Cocalico, surrounded by a hundred acres of fertile land, from the cultivation of which nearly all the necessaries of life were obtained. To it is attached a large four-storied structure, known as the Sister House, which, as its name implies, was devoted to the exclusive use of the females.

By 1729, it is believed the entire church had been transferred to the United States. At the present day they are found in large numbers in Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and are supposed to aggregate 250,000 souls. The principal features of their discipline are: Baptism, by trine immersion, administered only to believers; Foot-washing, the Lord's Supper, and the "Communion," celebrated in the evening. The kiss of charity is given. There is also the laying on of hands and the anointing of sick with oil, when desired. Ministers are chosen from the deacons and laity. No special training is prescribed, and no fixed salaries are paid: but the ministers are supported and the poor provided for. The annual conference of the church at Lanark, Ill., called to consider questions relative to doctrine and church government, was opened June 1st.

About 6,000 members were present from various parts of the United States, besides 600 ministers; but as the principle of equality in doctrine and privileges is adhered to, Lay members participated as freely in the discussions as ministers.

A standing committee consisting of twenty-seven members prepare the work of conference; and questions are decided by a majority of members present. Among the most prominent questions before the meeting were those of granting divorce, church support, and missionary work. A board of foreign and domestic missions was created, and the members of the church requested to contribute to the support of the work of Evangelism. They have at present a mission in Denmark and a church of about forty members.

The denomination is composed for the most part of well-to-do farmers, who spend but little money injudiciously.

They build plain but substantial churches, and pay no salary to ministers. If what they save in costly buildings and salaries were invested in missionary work they would, no doubt, become a positive power in the broad field of religious labor. The members are tenacious of their church principles and adhere to them as firmly as the Catholics.

This gives strength and unity. It is probable that from Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia, west, between parallels 36 and 44, no religious denomination is gaining so much strength.

The tabernacle in which the conference was held was 100 feet in diameter, and had a seating capacity of 2,500. The dining-tent was 62 by 130 feet, and afforded room for 1,000 guests. Seventy waiters were in attendance, and so perfect was the system that in less than two minutes the tables were filled. Thirteen thousand pounds of beef, 1,000 pounds of bread, 4,000 gallons of coffee, and 400 gallons of tea were consumed; besides, butter, milk, etc.

It is estimated that 13,000 pepie were in attendance on the second day. The meeting closed the 4th inst., being regarded as one of the most successful conferences ever held by this people.

Perfect quiet and order prevailed. The Tunkers are generally known as an honest, industrious and harmless people, and though often unjustly regarded as ignorant and superstitious, seldom fail to win the praise of the civil authorities and the respect of those who know them best.

Until within a recent date not much progress was made by them as a church in educational matters. Their children being educated in other schools, turned much promising talent into other channels. They have recognized lately the importance of educational work, and now have three established colleges.

They have seven weekly and four monthly papers. Several religious works of considerable merit have been written by members, and the dissemination of tracts is becoming a work of recognized importance.

Our illustrations will give the reader, who may never have come into contact with the quaint communities of these people, a clear idea of their quiet, unassuming manners, even when engaged in the greatest of their church works—the annual conference.

THE FATAL COLLISION ON THE SOUND.

ON Saturday morning, June 12th, New York City was startled by the report that a collision had occurred between the Sound steamers Stonington and Narragansett the night previous, that the latter vessel had either sunk or been burned to the water's edge, and that a large number of lives had been lost. Later in the day the details of the disaster were received.

It appears that at about half-past eleven o'clock on Friday night the steamer Stonington, on her way to New York, sighted the Narragansett, of the Stonington line, close upon her starboard bow. In spite of all endeavors to prevent a collision, the stem of the Stonington completely crushed in the port side of the Narragansett, carrying away the wheelhouse, breaking the boiler and upsetting the furnace, thereby setting fire to the boat. The recoil caused the Stonington to fall back several hundred feet.

In the meantime the headway of the Narragansett carried her about a quarter of a mile from the Stonington, by which time she was enveloped in a complete mass of flame. As soon as possible under the circumstances the boats of the Stonington were lowered and sent to the rescue. Meanwhile the steamer City of New York, of the Norwich Line, bound for New York, came up and sent six boats to the burning vessel.

In an incredibly short space of time the Narragansett was burned to the water's edge. Owing to a lack of proper organization of the forces of the Stonington, much confusion existed, and an unreasonable time elapsed before the boats were lowered.

Owing to the dense fog scarcely anything could be seen except the burning wreck. The cries and shrieks of the affrighted passengers could be heard for a great distance. All the water surrounding the Stonington appeared to be black with drowning persons.

Upwards of 200 people are known to have been rescued. The purser of the Narragansett stated there were not more than 300 passengers on his boat, and that the loss cannot exceed fifty, as it is known that more than 200 were brought to New York in the steamer City of New York on Saturday morning, and large numbers were taken back to Stonington on the steamer Stonington. A great many women and children were aboard the Narragansett, and all might have been saved had not that vessel taken fire and sunk.

The City of Boston, of the Norwich line, took a portion of the surviving passengers of the Narragansett aboard on its up-trip, and the City of New York, of the same line, brought to her pier, No. 40 North River, over one hundred others. When she arrived her decks and cabins were filled with men, women and children, who had been taken from the ill-fated steamer, or picked up from the water. The interior of the steamer had the appearance of a hospital, and as the rescued began leaving the steamer, the dock was quickly crowded with people, who showed eager inquiries after relatives and friends believed to have been on board the Narragansett. It will be some days before the exact number of lives lost can be ascertained.

Mr. Schuyler is married to a sister of Miss Waddington, the American wife of the late French Foreign Minister.

A CHICAGO correspondent thus describes Senator Conkling's studied entrance into the hall of the National Convention at the early session: "Still later—very much later—Conkling made his awfully nice entrée, alone and unprotected for the space of twenty feet or more, where behind him followed a staunch and valiant guard. Mr. Conkling's gait, as pretty much everybody around New York knows, is suggestive of light boots and bamboo. When he advances up the aisle at the rate of about four steps a minute, with a fine rolling tread, accompanied by a shifting of the shoulders and swinging of the body, the galleries become very much elated, and the show of dignity and graciousness with which he favors them fully repays them, evidently, in amusement for the labor that their demonstrations cost."

PRINCESS MARIE of Hanover, youngest sister of Princess Frederica, intends, it is rumored, to follow her sister's example, and be married to a commoner; the fortunate man is Lieutenant-Colonel Vegeler. Herr Vegeler, like Baron Rammingen, was a friend and companion of the late King, the princesses' father. Princess Marie is said to have been secretly attached for some years to this gentleman, who did not hope to aspire to her hand until the example of Frederica, her elder sister, emboldened the two publicly to announce their engagement. The Duke of Cumberland, who, as chief of the House of Hanover, vainly protested against the misalliance of his elder sister, will be still more infuriated at the proposed union of Princess Marie with an untitled officer. The duke, who is now staying in Italy, has become so embittered by his continuous ill-fortune that intercourse with him is anything but agreeable. His wife has left him and returned with her infant to her parents at Copenhagen. People assert that the duchess will not return to her husband for some time.

THE Marquis Tseng, Chinese Minister to England, has started a drag, which he drives at afternoons to the amazement and admiration of the outside barbarian. Tseng is scarcely the Chinaman of the tea chest or the romance of travel. He speaks five European languages, plays the piano like Haïz, would hold his own at billiards with the best amateur, has contributed an article on Confucius to a London magazine, and takes to Western liquors as one to the manner born. Madame sits beside him. The Chinese coaching custom being blue and yellow satin to the principal articles of dress, with stuff of all the other shades in the accessories, it is a highly picturesque turnout. The Marquis is entertaining splendidly at the Chinese Legation at Portland Place, London. Three-fourths of the dining-out section of the London high world have already had a chance at his magnificent mahogany. His pay as ambassador is only $20,000 a year, but he has one of the largest incomes in the middle kingdom, his annual revenue being $500,000. The famous birds'-nests are invariably served at his table, and by no skill of a chef that they promise to become as fashionable a delicacy in London as they are in Paris, where another Oriental holds even more glittering state than his colleague in London. The Marchioness Tseng is a very beautiful woman for a Chinese, and looks quite fascinating in the gala costume of a grand lady of Pekin.

THE MARQUIS OF TSENG,

CHINESE AMBASSADOR TO PARIS AND LONDON.

IT is no trifling matter to be an Ambassador from the Celestial Empire, as is evinced by the case of the late Chinese Ambassador to St. Petersburg, who has been condemned to death for signing a treaty already injurious to the interests of China. The Marquis of Tseng-Y-Yong, known in Chinese literature as Kie-Kang, was born on the 2d day of the eleventh moon of the nineteenth year of the reign of Tao-Kwang (1838), in Chiang Siang, province of Hoopé. He passed the examinations admitting him to high dignities in the ninth year of the Emperor Tong Tché, and was appointed to a directorship in the Ministry of Finance. His father, Tseng-Wen-Tchang was President of the Council of State, Viceroy of the two Kiangs, and was the Minister who crushed the Taiping revolt and recaptured Nankin. He was made by the Emperor hereditary Marquis of Y Yong (brave and valiant), and on his death every province was ordered to erect a temple in his honor. His son, Tseng-Kie-Kang inherited the title, and after three years' mourning, was made honorary president of the ministries of the fourth order and decorated with the peacock feather. He arrived in Europe January 1st, 1879, as Minister Plenipotentiary to the two great powers, England and France. During the last year he was made President of the Tribunal of Rites, and has recently been appointed to the difficult post of Ambassador to Russia.

THE NEW BRITISH FLAGSHIP AT HALIFAX.

HER MAJESTY'S ship "Northampton," bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir Leopold McClintock, Knight, F. R. S., commander of the North American and West Indian Navy, arrived at Halifax, N. S., on May 15th, from England via Bermuda. The Northampton is the largest modern battle-ship which ever visited this side of the Atlantic, and is one of the finest in the British Navy, being lighted with patent electric lights, while bells and telephones communicate with all parts of the ship, and her compasses, steering gear and rigging are all of the most improved character.

The vessel is of strange appearance, certainly not handsome, but imposing, being painted white, and the hull standing over twenty feet out of water. Her portholes are so arranged that guns can be fired ahead, astern or abeam. The admiral's apartments are furnished with regal magnificence. The vessel is fitted with two engines of 6,000-horse-power, working twin screws, that give a maximum speed of fourteen knots. Her sail area is 24,166 square feet. She is armed with four eighteen-ton guns, eight twelve-ton broadside guns, six twenty-pounders, three nine-pounders, two Gatlings and six Nordenfeldts, being heavily armor-plated, and is divided into watertight compartments, carries 600 men, and is commanded by Captain Fisher.

Sir Leopold McClintock is a world-famed man, as being prominent in several Arctic expeditions. In 1857, when Lady Franklin and friends, unable to obtain any further aid from the Government of the day in what it considered fruitless search, determined at their own expense to fitout another expedition and make a final effort to obtain some tidings of the fate of the brave Sir John Franklin and his expedition dispatched by the Government twelve years previously, he was chosen as the most suitable officer to command the expedition, sailing from Aberdeen, September 1st, 1857, in the steam-yacht Fox.

His three years' absence resulted in a solution of the mystery so long surrounding the lost crews of the Erebus and Terror. For his service he was knighted, made an LL. D. of Trinity College, Dublin, and of Cambridge, D.C.L. of Oxford, and was presented with the freedom of the City of London. He is a good specimen of the old-fashioned British seadog, but very affable withal.

NOVA SCOTIA.—H. M. S. "NORTHAMPTON," FLAGSHIP OF THE NORTH AMERICAN AND WEST INDIAN NAVY, NOW AT HALIFAX. FROM A SKETCH BY H. E. TWINING.

SIR ALEXANDER GALT.

ALTHOUGH the leaders of the Liberal Party in England are pledged not to disturb the relations of the Colonies with the Mother Country, it is said at Ottawa, Canada, on the best authority, that within a year or two the incoming administration will alter the status of that country in some respects. The changes, which will be made with the full consent of the Dominion Parliament, will embrace the simplification of the present system and the appointment of the Governor-general from the ranks of Canadian politicians.

The appointment of a Canadian statesman to the Governor-generalship will enable the Dominion Parliament to cut down the salary of that office from $50,000 to $15,000 or $20,000 a year, to effect a large saving in the maintenance of Rideau Hall and in the general expenses connected with the vice-regal establishment. It is also proposed to reduce the militia expenditure, to form one of two skeleton corps of regulars, and disband the rest of the force. This will save close upon a million a year. These changes will be made gradually. The Marquis of Lorne will probably retire at the end of 1880, when his term of office is half completed, and his Canadian successor will be chosen by the Imperial Government. When Sir John Macdonald and other Dominion ministers were in England last year, this reorganization was discussed not only with Lord Beaconsfield and his colleagues, but also with Lord Hartington, Earl Granville, Mr. Forster, and other leading Liberals. The appointment of Sir Alexander Galt as Canadian High Commissioner in England, with official residence in London, was the direct result of these conversations.

Sir Alexander is well-known in the United States. He was selected by the late English administration to preside over the Halifax Fisheries Conference. The present mission he divides into three parts: financial, immigration and diplomatic.

With regard to the first, it is intended that the Dominion should take charge of its own finances in London.

The settlement of the Northwest, which is now regarded as the most vital of all points of policy, can only be carried through at a very considerable expense, and, to be successful, that expense has to be incurred at a very early date. Sir Alexander declares that it is only through railways that this immigration can be furthered, and that unless those railways are built through Canadian territory before the opportune moment passes away, all the emigration, which is certain to leave the British Isles, will be diverted to a foreign country, instead of being utilized and brought to strengthen Canada. Sir Alexander holds that, by the Confederation Act, the Canadians are now placed with reference to commercial questions on the same footing in respect to the Imperial Government as towards any foreign government.

In regard to any Canadian negotiations with foreign countries, it is believed that England will assist the Colonists with her good will and all the ability of her trained diplomatic staff. It is not proposed to attempt any independent negotiation, but the Canadians will have the Foreign Office to assist and support them in case they should.

SIR ALEXANDER GALT, CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSIONER TO ENGLAND.

HON. JAMES O. PUTNAM.

JAMES O. PUTNAM, who was nominated on May 24th to the office of United States Minister to Belgium, in place of Hon. William E. Goodloe, of Kentucky, resigned, was born in Attica, Wyoming County, State of New York, July 4th, 1818. His father, the late Hon. Harvey Putnam, was a leading lawyer of Western New York, and for many years a member of the State Senate, and served his district in the Twenty-fifth, Thirty-first and Thirty-second Congresses.

James O. Putnam entered Hamilton College in 1834. At the end of his sophomore year he visited the South, and was principal of the academy in Florence, Alabama, during the Winter of 1836-37. He entered the Junior Class of Yale College—the class of '39. He was admitted to the Bar in 1841, and has practiced his profession in the City of Buffalo. He was of the Henry Clay school in politics, and was appointed Postmaster of Buffalo by President Fillmore. In 1854 he was elected to the State Senate, and in the divisions of the Whig Party was known as a "Silver Gray." But during the struggle over the repeal of the Missouri Compromise he made a speech in the Senate in favor of instructing the New York Senators to oppose the repeal. His Senatorial career is best remembered by his Bill, and speech in support of it, on ecclesiastical tenures, requiring all church property to be vested in trustees under the Act relating to religious corporations. Mr. Putnam's speech is said by the papers of that day to have attracted very general attention throughout the country. He acted with the American Party in the canvass of 1856, and was the American candidate for Secretary of State in 1857. He took a leading part in effecting the union of the American and Republican parties in Western New York, which was consummated in his own city and county in the elections of 1858.

In 1860 Mr. Putnam was one of the two State Lincoln electors at large, the late William Cullen Bryant being his colleague.

He was appointed to the Havre Consulate by President Lincoln. While so abroad, he prepared the address of American citizens in Paris on the occasion of the death of President Lincoln. He also delivered the oration on the 22d of February, 1866, in Paris, at the first general celebration of Washington's Birthday in Europe after the opening of the war in 1861.

Since Mr. Putnam's return, in 1867, he has devoted his life principally to literary studies. A volume of his orations and speeches was published at the beginning of the present year.

The following is an extract from an article in the Buffalo Courier, the Democratic organ, commenting on his appointment: "Our citizens, without distinction of party, will be gratified to learn that the President has sent to the Senate the name of Hon. James O. Putnam, of Buffalo, to be Minister Resident at the court of Belgium, vice William C. Goodloe, of Kentucky, resigned. It is no flattery to Mr. Putnam to say that he is eminently fitted for this position, and would do honor to his country in the highest of the diplomatic places abroad. A gentleman of brilliant natural gifts and of liberal culture, yet withal a thorough American, he is just the kind of man by whom the American people should wish to be represented in foreign lands. We happen to know that he has not sought for office at the hands of the present Administration, and it is therefore all the more creditable to his old college friend, Secretary Evarts, as well as to Mr. Hayes, that they should have determined to draw him out of private life and into a branch of the public service for which he is so admirably adapted."

Joseph Meyer's Acting.

A CORRESPONDENT at Oberammergau writes as follows of the actor who essays the rôle of Christ in the Passion Play: "Joseph Meyer portrayed his sacred original with what seemed to be to the spectators a wonderful degree of verisimilitude; and, indeed, no one could have seen him hanging on the cross without being fairly amazed at the accuracy with which the traditional likeness in all things had been copied to the very life; but, nevertheless, there was a decided want of some element in his speech and demeanor which a bolder and more intellectual actor would essay to supply. At the second representation Joseph Meyer, if anything, had rather improved in his high part, every action in particular requiring the accompaniment of few or no words being executed with great ease and the proper degree of dignity. The washing of his disciples' feet, his agony in the garden, his meek submission to stripes and insults, his look and attitude before his accusers, the forcible expulsion of the money-changers from the Temple, and his bearing of the cross, as well as his pendent attitude thereon, were all exceedingly well performed in a way which, while proper in the dignity of the character, could not offend the most sensitive religious feeling. The taking down from the cross, on the other hand, is no inconsiderable triumph of what might almost be called engineering skill, nothing being wanting to invest the scene with vivid realism, though a sense of decided relief is felt when the central figure, with the flanking malefactors, is safely brought to the ground. The sound of a hammer behind the curtain is all that assists the fancy to realize the nailing to the cross. Probably the only marked instance in which Meyer successfully aims at dramatic effect is when, with a deep and agonized sigh, distinctly audible by all the audience, he drops his head and dies; and then his rigid suspension for about twenty minutes is admitted by all to be a masterpiece of gymnastic art, nor does the stiffness of his limbs relax while he is being wrapped in the costly linen cloth by Joseph of Arimathea—a well-played character—and carried to the sepulchre."

IMPORTANT TESTIMONY.

"THERE is no doubt," says the Boston Journal of Commerce, "as to the genuineness and positive results of the 'Compound Oxygen Treatment.' From what we learn of this new cure, we are well satisfied that its general use would annually save thousands from untimely graves, and give back to full or comparative health tens of thousands of weary or suffering invalids to whom life is now a burden." Our "Treatise on Compound Oxygen" sent free. Address DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard St., Phila., Pa.

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL.—To many people who are not enforced residents of this city for the greater part of the year, New York offers many attractions as a Summer resort. Not to speak of the cool sea breeze which it enjoys almost every Summer afternoon, not to speak of its parks, etc., it may be chosen as a central point from which to make many delightful excursions. And in New York no more central house may be selected than the well-known ST. NICHOLAS, in Broadway. It is not so many years ago that the ST. NICHOLAS was visited by all strangers as illustrating the highest level of hotel luxury. It still holds its own in comparison with its later rivals. The rooms, single and en suite, are comfortable and elegant. The house is famous, too, for its excellent cookery.

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR, which is so common nowadays, may be entirely prevented by the use of BURNETT'S COCOAINE. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handsful, and has never failed to arrest its decay and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is at the same time unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

THE SCOTT PAPER CO. (successors to T. Seymour Scott & Co.), No. 27 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., took the Grand Prize Medal at Great International Exhibition at Sydney, New South Wales, for their "PAPOLEUM," an article that looks like the finest oil-cloth, and just as durable, so said, but made of paper, and in elegant styles and patterns, resembling the finest oil-cloth. It is worth seeing and purchasing, and can be used as oil-cloth is used, and it is an "American invention," and deserves success.

RATIONAL TREATMENT, POSITIVE CURES.

DR. R. V. PIERCE, President of the World's Dispensary Medical Association, is in earnest in selling his medicines under positive guarantees, and if anybody who purchases and uses any of these widely celebrated remedies does not derive benefit therefrom, the Association would like to hear from that person with description of symptoms and history of case. Organized and incorporated, as the Association is, to teach medicine and surgery, and for the successful treatment of all chronic diseases, and managing annually thousands of cases through our original method of diagnosis without ever seeing the patients, and having also the largest sanitarium in the world for the accommodation of the more complicated cases, and also for surgical cases, the Faculty feel themselves prepared to undertake even the most discouraging cases. They resort to all the best remedial means known to modern medical science, neglecting nothing. Address, World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y., or Great Russell Street Buildings, London, Eng.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines—the Louis and the Baden Baden—covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.
The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.
The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.
The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.
The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.
For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 180 Broadway.

THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

JAMES A. GARFIELD FOR PRESIDENT,
CHESTER A. ARTHUR FOR VICE-PRESIDENT.

THE National Republican Convention concluded its six days' session on June 8th by the nomination of General James A. Garfield, of Ohio, for President, and the Hon. Chester A. Arthur, of New York, for Vice-President. The contest over the Presidential nomination was marked by unusual interest and intensity, the partisans of General Grant especially displaying an obstinacy of purpose and an audacious confidence which has rarely been matched. The supporters of Mr. Blaine apparently addressed their efforts to the one object of defeating Grant if they could not nominate their favorite, and, in the end, victory was to this extent theirs.

In the initial ballot on June 7th, the vote for the several candidates was as follows: Grant, 304; Blaine, 284; Sherman, 93; Edmunds, 34; Washburne, 30; Windom, 10. The balloting continued during the day and evening without any material changes, closing at 10 P. M. (on the 28th ballot) with 307 for Grant, 279 for Blaine, 91 for Sherman, 33 for Edmunds, 35 for Washburne, 10 for Windom, and 2 for Garfield. At that hour the Convention adjourned until the morning of the 8th, when it reassembled at 10:30, a conference having been meanwhile held by the friends of Mr. Blaine and Secretary Sherman. Balloting was promptly resumed. The first ballot (the 29th) of the Convention showed that each candidate had substantially the same strength as when the voting ended, the night before. Grant had 305 votes and Blaine 278. Sherman, however, had 116. The contest then went forward without the change of more than a dozen votes, until the thirty-fourth ballot was reached. On the thirty-fourth ballot Garfield, who had had one vote, suddenly received 17. On the next he received 50.

When the roll was called for the thirty-sixth ballot, the Blaine and Sherman States began to cast their votes for General Garfield from the beginning of the call. When Wisconsin was reached he had 361 votes. Three hundred and seventy-nine were necessary to a choice, and Wisconsin's 20 would send him before the country. The excitement was intense. Half the Convention rose to its feet, and the occupants of the galleries seemed wild with enthusiasm.

Leaders of all factions ran hurriedly hither and thither through the Convention; and, while the building was resounding with loud cheers for Garfield, there was a cluster of excited delegates about the General himself, who sat quiet and cool in his ordinary place at the end of one of the rows of seats in the Ohio delegation, having his own seat in the middle aisle near the very rear of the Convention. He wore the white badge of an Ohio delegate on his coat, and held his massive head steadily immovable. But for an appearance of extra resoluteness on his face, as that of a man who was repressing internal excitement, he might have been supposed to have as little interest in the proceedings as any other delegate on the floor of the Convention. There has been no such dramatic incident in politics, for a great many years at least, except possibly the nomination of Horatio Seymour in 1868. Entirely apart from all political considerations, it was an extraordinary and impressive incident to see this quiet man suddenly wheeled by a popular sentiment into the position of standard-bearer to the Republican Party, and possibly into the Presidency itself, with its great power and world-wide fame. All this while the crowd had been cheering, and the elements of the Convention were dissolving and crystallizing in an instant of time.

When Wisconsin gave her vote for Garfield, a tornado swept over the Convention. Delegates ran up the aisles with the banners of the States and Territories, and grouped themselves around Garfield. He sat beneath a forest of waving guidons, and received the congratulations of his friends. A uniformed sergeant of United States Artillery climbed out of a window from the gallery back of the platform, and the roar of artillery added to the great uproar. Men tied their handkerchiefs to their canes, and waved them over the heads of the excited delegates. The band struck up "Hail to the Chief," and the booming of cannon swelled the chorus. A Japanese flag floated from the northern gallery. The notes of "Yankee Doodle" were tooted on the cornets, and were followed by the music of "Rally Round the Flag." All joined in the chorus of "Freedom for ever, hurrah, boys! hurrah!

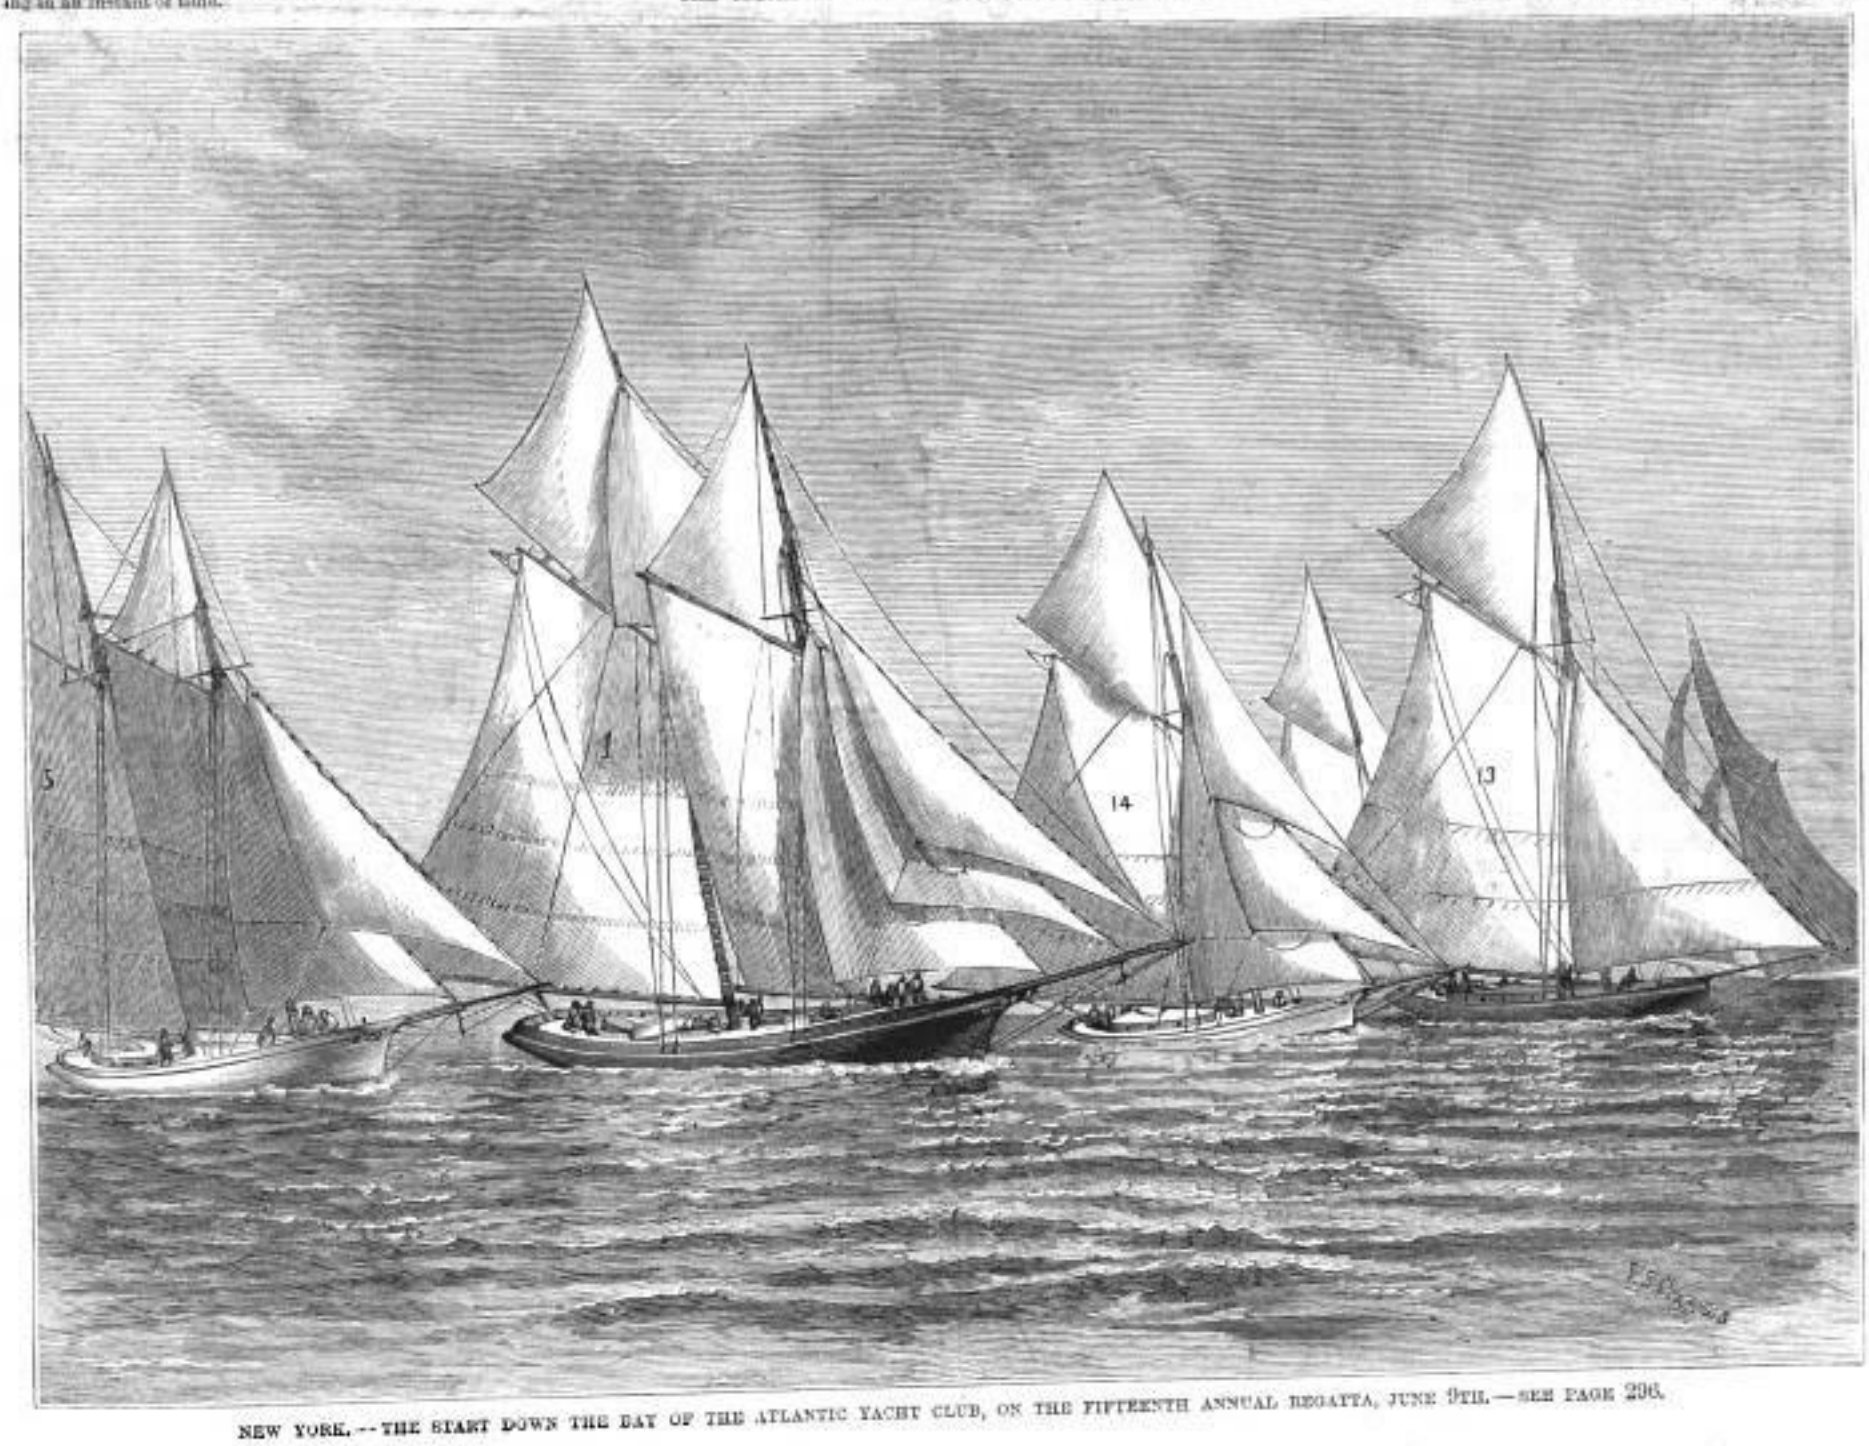
Down with the traitors, up with the Stars,
And we'll rally round the flag, boys, rally
once again,
Shouting the battle cry of freedom."

The bannerets danced time to music, and the effect was electric. It was a second edition of the Boston Jubilee. Garfield's friends swarmed about him, and nearly pulled his shoulder from its socket. For twenty minutes the uproar continued. Then the stage gubbins were again planted along the aisle, and the monotonous calling of the roll was resumed. The ballot resulted as follows:

Whole number of votes	755
Necessary to a choice	378
Grant	306
Blaine	42
Sherman	3
Washburne	5
Garfield	399

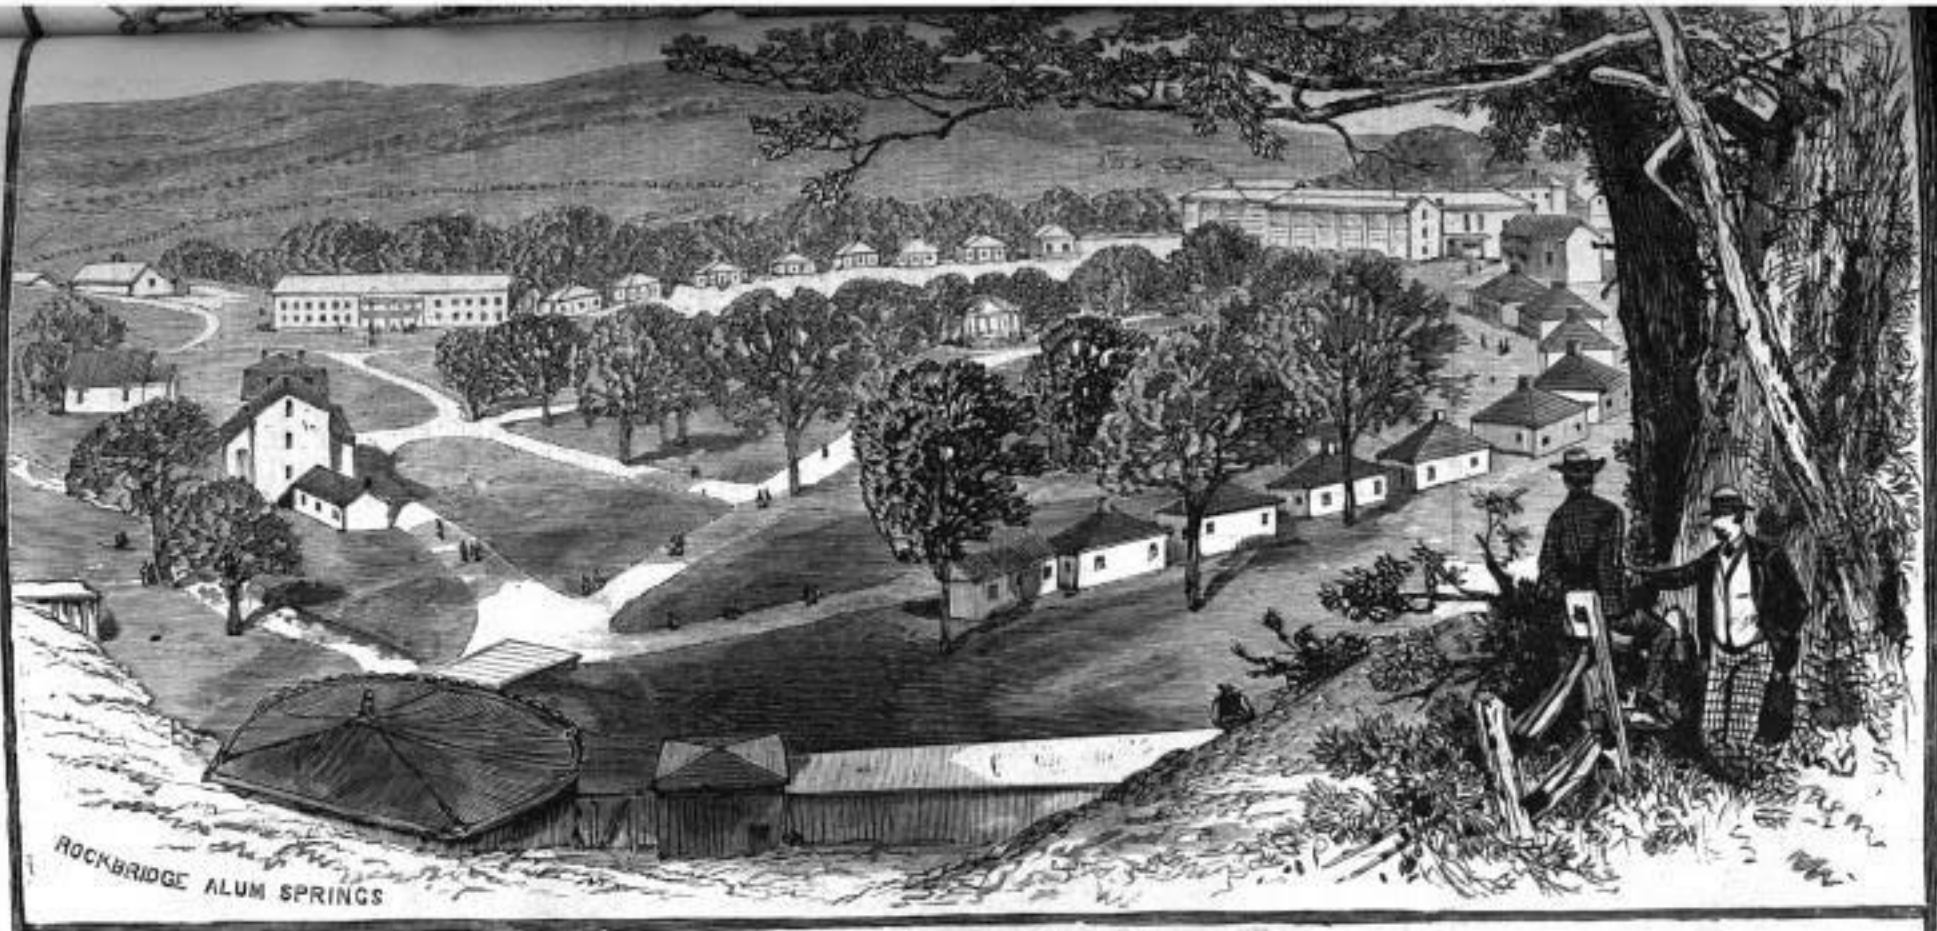
Upon the announcement of the result, congratulatory speeches were made by Messrs. Conkling, Logan, Beaver, Hale, Pleasants and others, and the nomination was made unanimous. After a brief adjournment the Convention reassembled, and nominations were made for Vice-President, the name of Chester A. Arthur being presented by General Woodford. One ballot was taken, resulting as follows:



Whole number of votes	743
Necessary to a choice	373
Washburne	193
Jewell	44
Maynard	30
Arthur	468
Bruce	8

The nomination was made unanimous. At 7:25 P. M. the Convention adjourned sine die.

General Garfield was officially informed of his nomination on the night following the adjournment of the Convention, and the next morning, with a number of friends, left for his home in Ohio. Crowds, with flags, cannon and bands of music, greeted him at several towns. At Toledo Junction and Cleveland the public receptions were on a large scale. At his home at Mentor his reception was peculiarly enthusiastic and gratifying.



THE CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT.

James Abraham Garfield was born November 19th, 1831, in the town of Orange, Cuyahoga County, Ohio. His father, who came from New York, was of New England stock. James was the youngest of four children, who were left fatherless when he was but two years of age. Mrs. Garfield was a woman of remarkable business qualities, and, with the aid of her three older boys, she managed to support herself and the family on the little farm left by her husband. James from his earliest years was obliged to aid to the extent of his ability in the general work about his home in the Summer, while during the Winter he worked at a carpenter's bench, using such opportunities for study as he could command. In his seventeenth year, wishing to earn larger wages, he determined to become a canal-man, and secured a position as driver of one of the boats on the Ohio Canal. His care and attention to his humble business attracted the attention of his superiors, and he was soon promoted to the more dignified post of holding the tiller of the boat. He continued in this business, saving what little of his earnings he could, for about eighteen months, when he entered the Geauga Seminary. His mother had some small savings, which she gave him, together with a few cooking utensils and a stock of provisions. He hired a small room and cooked his own food, to make expenses as light as possible. By working at the carpenter's bench mornings and evenings and at vacation times, and teaching country scholars in Winter, he managed to go through the academy, and saved some funds with which to make his way through college. He entered Williams College in 1854, and graduated in 1856, bearing off the metaphysical honor of his class, which is esteemed at Williams as among the highest within the gift of the institution to the graduating members.

Before going to college, he had joined the sect of the "Disciples," better known as "Campbellites," from their founder, Alexander Campbell. This sect had a numerous membership in Ohio, and all the Garfield family were connected with it. The "Eclectic Institute," in Hiram, was the college of this sect, and here Mr. Garfield became professor of Latin and Greek. During his professorship he married Miss Lucretia Rudolph. Two years later his political life began. His sermons had attracted attention to him, and in 1859 he was brought forward by the anti-slavery people of Portage and Summit Counties as their candidate for State Senator. He was elected by a large majority, and, young as he was, he at once took high rank in the Ohio Legislature, as a man unusually well informed on the subjects of legislation, and effective and powerful in debate. He seemed always prepared to speak, and always spoke fluently and well. When the secession of the Southern States began, Mr. Garfield's course was manly and outspoken, and he was among the foremost to maintain the right of the National Government to coerce seceded States. Early in the Summer of 1861, he was appointed colonel of the Forty second Ohio Volunteers, and took the field in Eastern Kentucky, and was soon placed in command of a brigade, and, by making one of the hardest marches ever made by recruits, surprised and routed the rebel forces, under Humphrey Marshall, at Piketon. He took part in all the operations of the army in the Southwest, his last conspicuous military service being at the battle of Chickamauga. For his services there he was made a major-general. It is said that he wrote all the orders given to the army that day, and submitted them all to General Rosecranz, save one. The one he did not write was the fatal order to General Wood, which was so worded as not to correctly convey the meaning of the commanding general, which caused the destruction of the right wing of the army.

The Congressional District in which Garfield lived was the one long made famous by Joshua R. Giddings. While Garfield was in the field in 1862 he was nominated for Congress in that district. He accepted the nomination, believing that the war would end before he entered Congress, but continued his military service until 1863. He first served on the Committee on Military Affairs, where, by his activity, industry, and familiarity with the wants of the army, he did as signal service as he could have done in the field. He soon became known as a powerful speaker, remarkably ready, and always effective in debate, while in the committees he proved himself an invaluable worker. His party redomi nated him by acclamation on the expiration of his term, and on his return to the House he was given a leading place on its leading committee—on Ways and Means. Here he soon rose to great influence. He studied the whole range of financial questions with the assiduity of his college days, so that he is looked upon to-day as one of the ablest of our national financiers. He stood by his party, and his party stood by him, re-electing him successively to the Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty second, Forty third, Forty-fourth, Forty fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses. During these several terms he has served as the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and of the Appropriations Committee. This last chairmanship he held until 1875, when the Democrats came into power. Two years later, when James G. Blaine went to the Senate, General Garfield became by common consent the Republican leader in the House, a position which he has maintained ever since. In January last he was elected to the Senate to fill the seat of Allen G. Thurman, who retires on the 4th of next March. He received the unanimous vote of the Republican caucus for this position, an honor never conferred before on any man by any party in the State of Ohio.

In appearance, General Garfield is very commanding and impressive. He stands six feet high, and is broad-shouldered and strongly built. His head is unusually large, and his forehead remarkably high. He wears light-brown hair and beard, and has light blue eyes, a prominent nose and full cheeks. He usually wears a slouch hat, and always dresses plainly. He is temperate in all things except brain work, and is devoted to his wife and children, of whom he has five living, two having died in infancy. The two older boys, Harry and James, are attending school in New Hampshire; while the two younger, Irwin and Abram, live with their parents. His only daughter, Mary, is a handsome, rosy cheeked girl of about twelve. His mother is still living, and forms one of his family. General Garfield has a house in Washington, where he spends his Winters, and a farm in Mentor, Lake County, Ohio, where he spends all his time when not engaged at the capital. His farm comprises 125 acres of land, which is highly cultivated, and here the General finds a recreation of which he never tires, in directing the field work and making improvements in the buildings, fences, and orchards.

THE VICE-PRESIDENTIAL NOMINEE.

Chester A. Arthur, the candidate for Vice-President, is a native of Franklin County, Vt., and is in the fiftieth year of his age. He received his education in Union College, Schenectady, being graduated when eighteen years of age in the Class of '48. Immediately after graduating he came to New York City to live, and prepared himself for the Bar. After being admitted to the Bar, he practiced both alone and with others as members of a law firm.

In 1852 Jonathan and Juliet Lemmon, Virginian slaveholders, intending to emigrate to Texas, came to this city to await the sailing of a steamer, bringing eight slaves with them. A writ of habeas corpus was obtained from Judge Paine to test the question whether the provisions of the Fugitive Slave Law were in force in this State. Judge Paine rendered a decision holding that they were not, and ordering the Lemmon slaves to be liberated. Henry L. Clinton was one of the counsel for the slaveholders. A howl of rage went up from the South, and the Virginia Legislature authorized the Attorney-General of that State to assist in taking an appeal. William M. Evarts and Chester A. Arthur were employed to represent the people, and they won their case, which then went to the Supreme Court of the United States. Charles O'Conor here espoused the cause of the slaveholders; but he, too, was beaten by Messrs. Evarts and Arthur, and a long step was taken toward the emancipation of the black race. Another great service was rendered by General Arthur in the same cause in 1856. Lizzie Jennings, a respectable colored woman, was put off a Fourth Avenue car with violence, after she had paid her fare. General Arthur sued on her behalf, and secured a verdict of $500 damages. The next day the company issued an order to permit colored persons to ride on their cars, and the other car companies quickly followed their example. Before that the Sixth Avenue company ran a few special cars for colored persons, and the other lines refused to let them ride at all.

On January 1st, 1861, General Arthur was appointed Engineer-in-Chief by Governor Morgan of this State. In this office he did very valuable service in the equipment of the volunteers of this State for the war, and on January 27th, 1862, in honor of these services, he was appointed Quartermaster-General on Governor Morgan's staff. Here he again worked with great energy to forward troops to the seat of war. He took great interest in politics, and gradually became one of the leaders of the Republican Party in this State. Upon November 20th, 1871, he was appointed Collector of the Port by President Grant to succeed Thomas Murphy. Upon the expiration of his four years' term, so acceptably had he filled the post, that he was reappointed in December, 1875. The nomination this time was unanimously confirmed by the Senate without reference to a committee as usual. This was a high compliment, usually reserved for ex-Senators. On July 21st, 1878, he was removed by President Hayes, and was succeeded by Collector Merritt.

Upon September 18th, 1879, he was elected Chairman of the Republican State Committee. It was largely due to his skilful management that the campaign was such a successful one—all the Republican candidates for State officers being elected.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

THE FAMOUS SPRINGS REGION IN VIRGINIA.

THE Summer season is now open. The yachts have taken on their spotless canvas attire, and careen saucily in the wind. The first dip in the ocean has been taken, the first stroll on the warm, white sand. Stout shoes press the mountain side. Faces are already bronzed. The delicious season of rest—so they call it—has come. What a misnomer is that word, rest! People tell us that after the laborious work of the Winter, after the fatigue of the ball, the opera, the theatre, the reception, they must seek the seaside, the mountain top, the health resort—for what? For recreation and rest. And how hard they do rest! No clerk at his desk, no financier in the money-mart, no woman of society, erasing one by one the engagements on her list, work half as hard as while seeking and participating in this popular recreation and rest. If man earns bread by the sweat of his brow, so society gains rest by exhilarating, but nevertheless hard, work. Still, it is the proper thing to undergo a vast amount of fatigue in the name of pleasure and health, and away we go with the earliest votaries of Summer travel.

That we may withstand the wear of a long season, a flitting to this resort, and a loitering at that, we propose to start out with the best equipment of physical energy, and to secure this we make our first trip to the wonderful region of springs in Virginia.

The chief points of departure after reaching the State line are Staunton and Lynchburg, because these cities are on extremities of a fork of railroads—the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Washington City, Virginia, Midland and Great Southern, dividing from the main stem of travel at Charlottesville; and it is this angle—one line running through Staunton towards the Ohio, the other through Lynchburg, Tennessee—which measures the Spring Region, and that section of the great mountain belt of the State most interesting in its display of scenery.

The Summer resorts on the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway comprise every variety, from the famous "Mecca," where Fashion's votaries make their yearly pilgrimage, to the quiet retreat where families find Summer homes. The ballroom, music, bowling-alleys, billiard-rooms, croquet grounds, and all of the many appliances to furnish pastimes to the pleasure-seeker, as well as waters which possess healing efficacy for every infirmity to which the human frame is subject, are found at Virginia Springs; and last, not least, for invalid and pleasure-seeker, at every fashionable watering-place and every quiet retreat, scenery of rare beauty and air unsurpassed for healthfulness are found.

The Warm Springs are situated in Bath County, and are reached by stages from Covington or Millboro' Stations, on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway. The road from Covington passes in view of the cataract of the Falling Springs, where a foaming mountain brook tumbles over a rocky ledge two hundred feet high; while on the Millboro' route, only fifteen miles from the springs, the traveler will be charmed by the magnificent view from the top of Warm Spring Mountain, and of the curious Blowing Cave, situated near the banks of the Cow-Pasture River. Of the many health-giving fountains in this region, the Warm Springs were the first utilized by invalids, the curative properties of the water having been discovered by the Indians. The water is very abundant, and is used both for drinking and bathing. There are two large baths, to which are attached private and smaller ones, both warm and cold.

The Gentleman's Bath is an octagon, about forty feet in diameter and one hundred and twenty in circumference. It is ninety-eight degrees in temperature, and is supplied with water, of which it holds forty three thousand gallons, by springs pouring forth one thousand gallons per minute. The Ladies' Bath is a circular bath fifty feet in diameter and one hundred and fifty in circumference. As a swimming pool it is very attractive, and many ladies learn to swim. The temperature, perhaps, is a little less than ninety-eight degrees, and is supplied with water, of which it holds sixty thousand gallons, by springs entirely distinct from any other bath, pouring forth fully twelve hundred gallons per minute. It has attached a handsome reception-room, twenty private dressing-rooms, private baths of the same temperature of the main bath—douche or spout baths, and cold water plunge or shower baths.

The best times for bathing are in the morning before breakfast, and on an empty stomach before dinner. Bathers usually go in twice a day, and remain in the water from twelve to twenty minutes at a time.

The Drinking Spring, as it is called, is near the baths. It is a very bold stream, as clear as a crystal, and its use materially assists the action of the baths in the treatment of most of the diseases for which they are employed.

The Healing Springs are fifteen miles from Covington, on the Chesapeake and Ohio road, and eight from the Warm Springs. There is a fine cascade in the vicinity of the buildings, which constitute quite a village. The waters of this spring are said to be almost identical in their chemical analysis with the famous Schlangenbad and Ems waters of Germany.
